The mint, at Philadelphia. The new and elegant building preparing for the mint will be in a fit state for the reception of the machinery in about two months. Mr. John Richardson, son of the late assayer of the mint, has received the appointment held by his father for a very long period.

The father of a child. An action was brought in Bucks county, Pennsylvania, which turned on the question whether a child could have for its father a person who had been dead ten months and fourteen days, and decided in the negative.

Markley, charged with the horrid destruction of Mr. Newey and his family, has been tried at Frederick and found guilty of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to death. He was a nephew of Mr. Newey, and had served five years in the penitentiary for a robbery of his uncle. To revenge this just punishment, he destroyed the whole family.

Bishop of North Carolina. The rev. Levi S. Ives, of St. Luke's church, New York, and son-in-law of the late bishop Hobart, has been elected bishop of the Protestant Episcopal church in North Carolina.

M. M. Noah, (U. S. surveyor of the port of New York) a few weeks ago, purchased one half of the New York Courier and Enquirer, which has since been published by Webb and Noah.—Within the last few days, however, the name of Mr. Noah has been withdrawn, without any cause being assigned for it, which has given rise to various conjectures among the New York editors.

John Norvell, lately editor of the Pennsylvania Inquirer, has been appointed post master at Detroit, in the place of James Abbott, turned out.

Money.—We learn from the Patriot that the five per cent. city loan of $50,000, reimbursable at the pleasure of the corporation of Baltimore after the year 1858, was taken on Monday by Messrs. Cohen & Brothers, at a premium of 3 per cent. Many other offers were made, which show an abundance of capital in market.

FOREIGN NEWS.

Arrivals at New York from London and Havre, bring papers from the former city to the evening of April 15th, and from Paris to the 16th inclusive.

FRANCE.

Capt. Clark, of the Havre packet ship and a passenger states, that on the morning of their sailing, the 18th April, they saw a letter from Paris announcing an insurrection in that city, and that the national guard was ordered out. In speaking of this affair the Moniteur of the 16th says:

"Yesterday some individuals clad as workmen appeared on the Place de Greve with a tri-colored flag, and raised seditious cries. They were, however, instantly and easily dispersed."

The Gazette de France has a paragraph of similar import, and adds:

The guard at the Town House took arms, and the disturbers immediately fled. The standard bearer and four others were arrested. This miserable attempt only served to prove signally the inability of the disturbers to produce any bad consequences.

Paris still remained in a feverish condition.

The electoral law was passed in the deputies on the 12th, by a majority of 300 against 57.

The chamber then took up the subject of granting to the ministry an extraordinary credit of 100,000,000 francs—upon which a warm discussion ensued.

A royal ordinance for a loan of 80,000,000, was issued by Louis Philippe on the 15th.

The French journals contradict the attempted escape of Polignac.

ENGLAND.

In consequence of the reported defeat of the Russian grand army and capture of Deibitsch, the commander in chief, stocks had risen in London.

POLAND AND RUSSIA.

It was rumored in Paris that Deibitsch and his army had been taken prisoners, and a letter is said by the London Globe of the 15th April to have been received by Estafette in the city from Paris, confirming the rumor; but the Gazette de France, of Paris of the 16th, says, that the report had no other foundation than supposition.

A despatch from the Polish commander in chief dated on the 1st of April, states, that his success has been fully as great as previously represented; that he could not exactly compute the loss of the Russians, but that 3,060 men had already laid down their arms, and that the number was augmenting every moment. The Polish army had captured the hospital of Minsk, in which they found 1,200 wounded Poles. News had been received, that the 95th regiment of Russian troops had deserted and joined the Poles. The Russian troops who have thus deserted amount to 4,000.

The Russians on the 30th of March attempted by means of fire ships to burn the bridge from Warsaw to Praga, but failed; two of their fire ships were burnt and a third run aground, and the shells beginning to burst killed some of the Cossacks and obliged the others to put back. A heavy cannonading had been heard in the direction of Willanow.

Up to 12 o'clock on the 2d of April, 7,000 prisoners had been brought into Warsaw, and more continued to arrive; and 11 pieces of cannon taken in the battle have also been brought in.

A very large proportion of the prisoners taken are from the provinces formerly belonging to Poland.

According to the latest accounts, the several Russian corps had collected in great forces between Kaluszyn and Siedlec, and a decisive battle was shortly expected.

The Russian government has invited the nobles of Courland and Esthonia, as well as all others who have the right to bear arms, and do not belong to any associations, to enter into military service.

Official accounts of the insurrections in Volhynia and Lithuania have been received and the grand duke Michael had marched with 4,000 of the guards for Lithuania. The Castilian count Plater is said to be at the head of the central government established by the revolutionists.

BRUSSELS.

It was stated in Paris that a deputation had arrived there from Brussels offering the chief command of the Belgian army to gen. Lamarque.

PRUSSIA.

The king of Prussia has just granted to the provinces acquired in 1815, the municipal franchise enjoyed by old Prussia.

The Berlin news of April 5, states that fifteen thousand Prussians are about to enter Luxembourg, all is prepared for war, and our activity will not be damped by the pacific assurances of the French ministers. Prussia has more need than France to assume an imposing attitude.

AUSTRIA.

A letter from Vienna states that the dutchess of Parma had taken two regiments of Austrian infantry into her pay, and that 10,000 men of the same army will be maintained by the pope for a limited period.

Another arrival at New York from Liverpool brings the London morning papers of the 17th April, being two days later than those previously received. The intelligence from the continent is not as late as that received from France given above.

ENGLAND.

The London Times betrays some apprehensions that the great measure of reform may be defeated. As the time for bringing it forward approached, its enemies were redoubling their exertions to ensure its rejection. It was reported that should the reform bill fail, the king would not agree to the dissolution of parliament. The report was however discountenanced, as it was generally believed that ministers had brought forward their plan with the approbation of the king.

In the house of commons on the night of the 15th of April, a provision was unanimously voted for the queen, in case of her majesty surviving the king. The sum voted is £100,000 per annum, and Bushy-park and Marlborough-house are to be assigned as residences.

The slave question has been again agitated in parliament.

Mr. C. Grant gave notice that in pursuance of act 53, Geo. III, he should move that the speaker give notice to the East India company that the public debt due to them should be discharged. This was a preliminary step which would leave the public the privilege of revoking the charter, and the house unpledged as to any further course.

PORTUGAL.

On the 25th March, Miguel went on horse back to the capital of St. George, and amidst acclamations of fidelity and gratitude, ordered the release of the prisoners arrested for desertion. He stood godfather to the child of an officer of the 5th regiment, tasted the provisions of the soldiers, and performed other popular acts, which have thrown the Lisbon Gazette into an extacy of admiration, and caused a general illumination and the display of flags from the fort to the palace of Queluz.

POLAND.

The London Times contains a letter dated Warsaw, April 2nd, on the subject of the Polish victory of the 31st of March. It is calculated to encourage the friends of the holy cause in which the Poles are engaged, whatever may be the result of the present contest. It says "our men fought like lions; our general flew from post to post, from rank to rank, directing, animating, and encouraging.—This is a glorious triumph! The barbarian has indeed felt

"The might that slumbers in a peasant's arm."

O! could you have seen our heroes,—could you have seen the burning zeal with which the recruit hurried on with the old soldier—and even the half recovered wounded of our great previous achievement—how they hurried to the field, you would have said, this people cannot die the death of slaves—they were not born for eternal bondage."

"We are tired of appealing to the great powers who were parties to the treaty of Vienna. They give us sympathy—well, our next treaty shall be inscribed in letters of blood on the field of battle—the condition is our country's freedom: we shall achieve it ourselves, and single-handed if we can, if not—well then—we know how to perish."

"The pursuit is still hot, but we have not the prompt transport which gives wings to an army: men can run for a day and night, as ours have done, fighting and struggling, but physical exhaustion will impose power, and we cannot accomplish every thing. Our country has every where risen, and Diebitsch will find assailants in every village. Lithuania is striking her blow, and the march through Poland is not the passing of the Balkan—he will not have quite leisure enough for the use of his rich Turkish pipe and perfumed tobacco—nor even for his brandy punch. Our generalissimo, Skrzynecki, is like Napoleon; what a general he has shown himself! With a handful of men he has overthrown whole Muscovite masses. 38,000 Poles have beaten back 100,000 Russians who congregated their masses under the walls of Warsaw; and now 24,000 men are chasing and prostrating twice their number at the point of the bayonet, from fortified positions, deemed impregnable without heavy artillery.

Do not believe what the Berlin papers say of the humanity of our invaders—the barbarity of the Russians extends to torture. I declare to you, upon my honor, that I have seen on the skirts of fields of contest, wounded Poles, whose eyes were torn out, merely because they had resisted like heroes. Women have been, on the Muscovite line of march, brutally violated and carried off—whole families have been dispersed, and many borne into Russia under base pretences. They sow horror and devastation wherever they show themselves. They have even taken away a lady from Pulawy, from the very apartment of the Princess Czartoryski.

"Heavens!—see if it is possible to get us arms: the campaign is only begun—no fear now of a coup de main upon Warsaw. We do not want men, or money, or addresses, or compliments. We delight to hear of the affections of our friends in Paris and London; but this is not the season for indulging in affectionate personal recollections. We must delay all these until tranquil times; the assistance we want is what I have mentioned. Can any thing be done in this way towards Cracow? We shall pay fully for any thing of this kind, and he who gives us a musket fights with us—he is of our ranks. Let freemen, then, lend us this helping hand. Show this to our friend the general, if he has not set out."

There was a report of an interference on the part of England, France, Prussia and Austria in favor of the Poles. It was, however, not credited.

ANOTHER REVOLUTION.

Information has been received since our last publication, of a revolution in Brazil, so complete and decisive as to have compelled abdication of the emperor. The particulars of this important event, will be found in the annexed letters from mercantile houses in Rio Janeiro, published in the Mercantile Advertiser and Journal of Commerce:—

Rio Janeiro, April 5th, 1831.

"Since our last respects, (of the 28th ult.) a spirit of discontent against the government, and hatred towards the Portuguese, have broken out here and in some of the neighboring provinces. The emperor, in consequence, has changed his ministry, and we hope the measures taken by the government will check the growing evil. But such has been the want of confidence created by the jealousy towards the European residents, that business is completely at a stand, and little or nothing is doing even in articles of the first necessity; to which may be added a very great scarcity of money, as many of the Portuguese, who were the principal purchasers, put off their payments as long as they can, waiting to see how matters will turn out. The chambers meet on the 3d of May, and it will then depend upon the steps taken by them, whether they restore that confidence which has been so much shaken by the late important events. The stock of flour continues so heavy that we see no immediate prospect of improvement; and as some of it has been here a long time, it will have to be sold for what it will fetch. It may be quoted at $13 to 16.

Another letter of the same date says:—

"The disturbances originated from the different views of the republican party and those of the Portuguese residents here, who are still longing for the old mother country. The emperor has changed his ministry twice, without effect. Since the 15th ult. we have lived in a continued state of disturbance. Armed men run about the streets in the night, and even in day time; and there is scarcely a night passed without five or six assassinations. To-day the emperor has appointed new ministers. It is reported that the habeas corpus is suspended; and these groups of armed men have been gathering together in the suburbs of the city. Troops parade through the city, but they do not arrest any body. Commerce is at a stand: nothing bought, nothing sold. The shops in some of the streets are all shut up. We do not know when the present squall will blow off."

The emperor, it appears from other papers, returned to the capital, from the interior on the 13th of March. While in the country, alarming symptoms appeared in his kingdom, which induced him to issue proclamations betraying his fears. On his return to the capital, arrangements were commenced for a celebration of the event, but jealousies arose between the native Brazilians and old Portuguese; the former insisted that the latter had no business to interfere with the proposed festivity, in honor of a Brazilian emperor—the Brazilians at the same time avowing that they would support the emperor no longer than he should remain constitutional:—"To decide the question," says a letter of the 7th, "resort were had to arms, which, after many alternate performances of the parties, has resulted in the entire defeat of Portuguese machinations and intrigues. During these indecisive strifes, the emperor had thrice changed his ministry, to suit the tone of the party which he conceived had gained the upper hand. Silly man! his race is run. Deserted by his soldiery, who have seconded the views of the mass of the people, he abdicated his crown this morning, at 3 o'clock, in favor of his son, 'Don Pedro the 2d,' a lad of about five years of age, and has embarked on board the Warspite, a British ship of the line. We are far from being quiet yet; and extreme consternation is depicted in every countenance."

Another letter of the same date, after announcing the abdication, says:—

"It is impossible, in our present state, to offer any opinion as to the future, so many are the reports in circulation. No doubt this has been a plot long brewing, and for want of proper energy, has lingered in reaching its maturity. Great confusion and alarm prevailed throughout the city. The Portuguese residents are in great fear, both for their property and lives, if the present state of anarchy is allowed to continue. The troops attached to the emperor all went over to the people. Under these circumstances, he has been forced to leave. All business is of course at an end."

Letter of abdication. Exercising the right which the constitution gives me, I declare that I have voluntarily abdicated (the throne) in favor of my dear and beloved son, Don Pedro D'Alacantara.

Signed PEDRO.

Bona Vista, April 7, 1831, and of independence and the empire the 10th.

The following letter from Bahia, dated April 11, contains some further particulars of this interesting intelligence. We copy it from the Philadelphia Gazette.

Since our circular per brig Columbia, of the — ult. we have to advise of an entire change in the government of our provinces and city, arising from the disaffection of our inhabitants towards the old Portuguese officers and residents here. Since the 4th no business has been done; every store and office of Portuguese and foreigners, has been closed, and mostly, they have embarked on board the shipping in the harbor, for personal security. The overturn of the government of the emperor was effected by 6,000 armed citizens, joined by 2,000 soldiers, (nearly all the troops now here) who have displaced the president and general at arms, together with all Portuguese officers holding situations under government—have appointed as president snr. Joao Gonsalves Cezimbra, a Brazilian, the viconde de Piraja, as general at arms—and all the counsellors and other officers are now composed of Brazilians.

At this time there is little security, and considerable time must elapse ere the merchants can feel sufficiently safe to adventure on their daily occupations. Proclamations have, however, been issued by the new president and general, to endeavor to quiet the public mind. Strong patrols are appointed, who parade our streets and the populace are disarmed. There was no fighting, as all but 500 troops, chose the citizens' side. Many murders were however committed on the old Portuguese and during the nights past, many abuses have been practised on them. All business being entirely suspended, we cannot quote prices of any articles.

UNITED STATES BANK.

From the Philadelphia American Sentinel.

The undersigned have read in "the Globe," an article re-published from "the New Hampshire Patriot," which contains the following assertion:

"From all that we have seen, it is apparent that the bank, (meaning the bank of the United States), attempts to sustain itself by a system of corrupt bribery; that this system procured the passage of the Pennsylvania resolution in favor of the bank."

This declaration is not only made without qualification, but is accompanied by remarks which render it particularly offensive.

The undersigned are conscious, that it must be an extraordinary case, which should induce them to notice, in any manner, newspaper comments upon the proceedings of the legislature of Pennsylvania. But they cannot fail to observe, that in this free country, a charge like the above, published in a leading democratic paper, and re-published in the paper which is understood by the people to be the official organ of the national administration, relating to a public question, upon which the legislature attacked have differed in sentiment from the head of that administration, possesses a consequence, which, under other circumstances, could hardly be attributed to it.

The members of the legislature that passed the resolution in question have returned to their homes; and the undersigned, a portion of those members residing in and near Philadelphia, having an opportunity of conveniently interchanging views, deem it an act of justice to their constituents, and to the people of Pennsylvania, to pronounce the charge, no matter by whom made, by whom repeated, or by whom countenanced, to be an unfounded and atrocious libel.

JOURNAL OF THE SENATE—MARCH 2, 1831.

The senate resumed, as in committee of the whole, the bill, entitled "an act making appropriations for carrying on certain roads and works of internal improvement, and providing for surveys," together with the amendment reported thereto by the committee on roads and canals; and the said amendment having been agreed to, the bill was reported to the senate; and

On the question to concur in the said amendment as follows:

Strike out the following words:

"The sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, to be expended, under the direction of the superintendent of the improvement of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, in the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio river from its mouth to Pittsburgh; in removing the obstructions in the channels at the shoal places and ripples, and by the erection of wingdams, or such other means as, in the opinion of said superintendent, will best answer the purpose of deepening the channels of said river; and the said superintendent may commence the said work at any place between the mouth of the river and Pittsburg, which in his judgment, will best test the practicability and utility of the contemplated improvement; the work to be carried on under the general superintendency of the department of war; and the president is hereby authorized, if he shall deem it necessary to do so, to employ an assistant superintendent in aid of the present superintendent on said rivers;"

And insert—

That the sum of 150,000 dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers from Pittsburg to New Orleans, in removing the obstructions in the channels at the shoal places and ripples, and by such other means as may be deemed best for the deepening of the channels of the Ohio river, which said sum shall be expended under the direction of the president of the United States, by the superintendent appointed to execute said works of improvement; and the president is hereby authorized and required to take bond, with approved security, in 50,000 dollars, conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties required of him, under such instructions as may be given him for the improvement of the navigation of said rivers; and that an officer of the engineers be associated with said superintendent, with authority to suspend the execution of any work or payment of any account until the order of the president is received;

Remarks of the editors of the National Intelligencer of May 12.

A retrospect.—The doctrines maintained by the executive of the United States on the subject of the exercise of the power of internal improvement by the general government, in its messages to the senate and house of representatives, at the last as well as the preceding session, are too well remembered to make it necessary for us to refresh the memory of our readers by making extracts from them here. The Maysville and Rockville road bills, our readers know, were suppressed by the exercise of the negative authority of the president, for several assigned reasons, one of which, very particularly urged, was, that the continuation of appropriations of that description would have the effect to delay the payment of the national debt; and another of which was, that the surplus revenue, when the debt shall have been extinguished, instead of being thus applied, ought, in the opinion of the executive, to be distributed among the several states. For the same reasons, the president refused his assent to two other bills, which contained appropriations that appeared to him to come within the same rule. Nothing could be more distinctly expressed than the denial, by the executive, of the expediency of these measures, and the determination, therefore, not to sanction them. The president even went so far, in notifying the two houses of his approval of one other bill, as to inform them, by message, that he had signed it with the understanding that no part of a certain appropriation (of eight thousand dollars only) therein contained, for a road from Detroit to Chicago, should be applied beyond the limits of the territory of Michigan (that is, within the limits of any state.)

At the commencement of the late session, it will also be remembered, that the message of the president to congress spoke of the course taken by the executive, in reference to this whole subject, as having been, in his opinion, "approved by the great body of the people" under which impression, said the president, "I have, upon the most mature consideration, determined to pursue it." By which we, in common with all readers and hearers, understood that the veto would continue to be interposed to prevent expenditures for internal improvement, even those admitted to be of a national character, at least until the national debt should be paid off. Indeed, on the subject of the appropriations of this nature heretofore made, and such as were negatived by the president at the session before the last, the message at the opening of the last session went so far as to say, "it was but doing justice to the character of our people, to expect the severe condemnation of the past which the recent exhibition of public sentiment has evinced."

What we now wish to bring to the attention of our readers is the fact, that, notwithstanding this determination of purpose, announced by the executive, in successive messages to the two houses of congress, the president actually did, at the close of the last session, approve and sign bills making various appropriations of the nature of those to which he had refused his sanction at the preceding session of congress.

We do not, of course, take exception to the president's signing such bills at the late session; but we hold up the fact distinctly to view, to mark the more strongly the error of the course to which he was advised at the session before, and in which he persevered up to and beyond the opening of the last session.

The change of opinion was produced, we presume, by the conviction, that his conclusion that the veto was approved by the great body of the people, was a premature one. The blind followers of the powers that be, it was true, continued to praise it, as in duty bound; the Kentucky convention praised it; the Maryland central committee praised it; all the rewarded praised it: but a voice was anon heard from another quarter, which could neither be misunderstood nor disregarded. At the session before the last, the executive and his cabinet put the veto on the deliberately expressed opinions of the two houses of congress. At the last session, the two houses took satisfaction therefor by putting the seal of condemnation on the veto of the president and his cabinet. The president and his cabinet were obliged to yield to a power which they could not withstand; and they gave way upon the point which they have been most applauded by their flatterers for having taken a resolute stand upon. Some of these last, having lost sight of the game, still continue to cheer the veto; and so lately as at the Philadelphia Jackson meeting, we were somewhat amused at observing, a resolution was passed furiously approving it. The light breaks slowly upon their benighted optics.

We have said that the two houses of congress at the late session condemned the veto; but it was in the senate, especially, that it received its death-blow. And it was to call the attention particularly to this piece of congressional history that we took up the pen to-day.

On the night of the 2nd day of March, (the last business day of the session) the field was fought and won. Some notice of the incidents of that sitting was taken in the National Intelligencer of the 4th of March; but the yeas and nays were not given, nor were the questions so stated as particularly to attract the reader's attention to them. For that purpose we have now procured an extract from the journal of the senate, which will be found in the preceding column, and to which we ask the particular attention of our readers.

The title of the bill under consideration plainly shows that it was a bill directly in the teeth of the principles assumed by the executive in its messages to congress. It was a bill for making appropriations for carrying on certain roads and works of internal improvement: it embraced bodily the whole principle upon which the president had expressed the belief that the people had just passed "severe condemnation." Well, what was the fate of this bill? After some animated debate and various amendments, the question came—"Shall the bill pass?" and it was determined in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, twenty-six votes to ten! By twenty-six votes to ten, the whole of the exceptionable doctrine of the veto message, and four whole columns of the last annual message* of the executive were practically refuted, and, to use the language of that message, severely condemned. Still greater even than this was the triumph of the friends of internal improvement over the withering doctrines of the cabinet, as the reader will perceive on looking at the intermediate proceedings on the bill: for, on the question to insert in the bill an appropriation of a hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers from Pittsburg to New Orleans, (in addition to fifty thousand dollars, already in the bill, for a similar purpose, "to be expended under the existing laws") the votes were twenty-nine to nine—not two to one, the vote necessary to overpower the president's negative, but more than three to one, in favor of the appropriation!

The reader may readily conceive what consternation this vote must have produced in the cabinet, and how futile it would have been for the president, and his counsellors, in the face of such a majority, to persist in the course marked out by the annual message. The minority on these questions, small as it was, would have been still less, it appears, but for the vote of one senator, than whom no member of the senate is more opposed to the present administration, but who has always conscientiously scrupled the appropriation of money for these objects.

By the decisive votes in the senate, we consider the policy of internal improvement, arrested by the executive veto, to have been re-established so firmly as to be beyond further danger from that quarter, unless [of which we have no fear] the people shall side with the president on this question, rather than with the representatives of the state sovereignties in the senate. Analysing the votes, we find that fifteen states in this case affirmed both the power and policy of appropriations for internal improvements, and that seven states denied either their constitutionality or expediency, or both. One state only was divided (New Jersey, and she ought not to have been.)* One state only was unrepresented (Mississippi) which must have voted for the bill had it been represented.

As this was perhaps the most important incident of the last session, and may have an important bearing on the future legislation of the country, we conclude the present notice of it by recording the votes upon the question, classed by states.

Massachusetts	Tennessee

*We measure the value of the message, in this expression, as the friend of a former distinguished member of congress did a speech of his, when he said that he had spoken five columns on some question or other.

*Nor was she divided upon a subsequent question, involving, in our view, the same principle, being the bill "making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors, and removing obstructions from the mouths of certain rivers," which passed by a vote of twenty-eight to six, Mr. DICKERSON voting for it. We have selected the other bill, however, as the more indisputable test of the sense of the senate, because of its including in its title the word "internal improvements;" so dissonant to a considerable portion of the friends of the administration, and especially to its influential (we had almost said vital) organ at Richmond.

Cheshire, Con. 16th May, 1831.

Messrs. GALES & SEATON: In your paper of the 12th inst. under the head of "A retrospect," an allusion is made to a vote given by me, on the bill, entitled "an act making appropriations for carrying on certain roads and works of internal improvements, and providing for surveys," and from which vote you have classed Connecticut against internal improvements. You do my native state injustice. She is not opposed to internal improvements!—as the votes of her whole delegation in congress will prove. Nor do you rightly apprehend my objection to that bill, as appears from your remark, "who has always conscientiously scrupled the appropriation of money for these objects."

By recurring to the proceedings in the house of representatives, on the bill "for procuring the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, on the subject of roads and canals," in 1824, and under which act this appropriation was made, you will find my objections to that bill to be on the ground of its unconstitutionality; and that an amendment was offered by me, "requiring the assent of the states," to enable congress to carry on the work of internal improvements contemplated by that bill. Similar amendments were offered in senate by Mr. Lloyd, of Mass. and Mr. Smith, of Md. which failed. My opinion on that subject has not changed, viz.—That congress does not possess the power to carry on works of internal improvement in any state, without the assent of the state—and that bill does not require such assent; but the power to appropriate money in aid of works of internal improvement, authorised by the states, has never been questioned by me, as my votes on bills making appropriations for clearing and improving navigable rivers and for canals, will prove.

By reference to my remarks on the original bill, published in the National Intelligencer of 29th March, 1824, my objections to the appropriation of last session may be fully understood. Yours, very respectfully,

SAMUEL A. FOOT.

GROTON MONUMENT.

This monument, erected by the state of Connecticut to commemorate an event in our revolutionary annals, is now completed. It was built by Mr. Nathaniel F. Potter, of this town, for about thirteen thousand dollars, and the New London Gazette from which we copy the following description, adds, that the monument "is now finished and paid for:"

It stands on the summit of the hill, 70 rods from the shore, near fort Griswold, in Groton, on the east bank of the river Thames, and directly opposite the centre of the city of New London. The hill is one hundred and thirty feet above tidewater, and rises gradually from the river. The foundation rises one foot above the surface, and is 26 feet square. The base is 24 feet square of large massy granite, with split faces, 3 feet high, each stone weighing 5 or 6 tons laid in regular courses. The stylobation or dye is 22 feet square, of similar stone in size and appearance, raised in courses or tiers, preserving a regular bond, 17 feet high with an entablature of hewn stone, the architrave three feet face, and the cornice one foot face, extending on each side one foot beyond the dye, or 24 feet square, making the height from the ground 25 feet.

On this cap is raised a square obelisk, 20 feet base, 92 feet high, and 10 feet at top, of large rough faced granite, laid in regular courses, preserving the bond line throughout, finished at the top with wide flat hewn stone, for a lookout, or place to stand on, this secured by a stout iron railing on the outer edge four feet high. On the top and in the centre of the obelisk is a frame of iron and copper, rising six feet above the iron railing, covered with thick Boston glass as a sky light, lighting the inside of the building, which is round and conical. The ascent to the top is by a set of stone steps, 168 in number, rising in spiral form, inserted in the inner wall, and secured at the other end by an iron railing and banisters, leaving the centre hollow to admit light from above, affording a safe, easy and light passage to ascend.

On the top is a convenient door in the sky light, which admits passing out on the stone platform, two feet wide all around, between the iron railing and sky light, furnishing spectators a safe and convenient stand from which to view the surrounding country.

On the south and west is presented the ocean and Long Island sound, with its shores and islands, and on the north and east the country around. On the north, some hills at a distance partially obstruct the view. On three sides vision may be extended as far as the naked eye or a glass will reach, and from the top is presented one of the most sublime and extensive prospects that can be imagined—it will amply repay the admirers of nature for the toil of ascending.

On the west side of the monument, over the door, is a marble slab inserted, 8 feet long by 2 feet 9 inches wide, on which is the following inscription:

was erected under the patronage of the STATE OF CONNECTICUT, anno domini 1830: and in the 55th year of the independence of the United States of America; in HONOR of the brave PATRIOTS, who fell in the massacre in fort Griswold, [near this spot]
on the 6th of September, A. D. 1781; when the British soldiers, under the command of the TRAITOR, BENEDICT ARNOLD, burnt the towns of New London and Groton, and spread DESOLATION and WOE
throughout this region.

On the south side is inserted a marble slab, 9 feet by 7 feet with the following text, from the 5th chapter of Judges, 18th verse.

"Zebulon and Naphtali were a people that jeoparded their lives unto the death, in the high places of the field."

Under which is inscribed the names of the brave col. Ledyard, and his fellow patriots who fell in the fort, on the fatal 6th of September, 1781. The height of the monument is 127 feet.

TRIUMPH OF STEAM.

On Saturday, 2d April, the Sampson and Goliah, two of Mr. Stephenson's, engines undertook to convey a thousand bags of New Orleans cotton from Liverpool to Manchester. They started at eight o'clock that morning, and proceeded at a brisk pace to the foot of the inclined plane, eight miles from Liverpool, the Sampson dragging thirty loaded wagons, and the Goliah twenty-seven. The Goliah was then detached from the load, and assisted the Sampson up the inclined plane; and the latter proceeded on its journey, and arrived at Manchester at half past eleven. The Goliah dragged its load up the inclined plane at three trips, and reached Manchester at half past one. The number of bags of cotton brought by the two engines was 1,035. Of these, the Sampson brought 549. As each bag of American cotton averages 4 ewt. the following may be considered a correct estimate of the Sampson's load:

	Tons.	Cwt.
549 bags of cotton, at 4 ewt. each.....	109	16
Tare of 30 wagons.....	42	15
Weight of guards and other persons on the train..	1	0
Weight of the engine.....	8	0

besides the weight of the tender, coke, water, &c. amounting to several tons more. On Good Friday, 1,008 persons went in the course of the day from Manchester to Liverpool, and 1,005 from Liverpool to Manchester, making a total of 2,013 conveyed along the line in one day! This number does not include those taken up at the several stopping places on the road, and which may be reckoned at from 500 to 700 more. The Sampson, in one trip, took 203 booked passengers, besides about twenty of the company's servants. There are now eighteen engines constantly employed on the line.

ORANGE FARM.

From the American Farmer.

The following letter from the proprietor [R. Smith, esq.] of the Orange farm, (near Baltimore) will be read with interest. The only remark we have to make on laying it before our readers, is—"go and do likewise."

May 4, 1831.

Mr. Smith—Under an impression that the agriculturists of our country, with a few exceptions, did not employ capital enough in their business, I about twelve years since, determined to carry my ideas into effect upon my Orange farm, consisting of 400 acres. After the desired fertility had been given to the soil, 30 acres of it were converted into a garden, and 370 acres into a dairy farm. Of these 370 acres, about 70 are in wood, and about three hundred under cultivation.

The cows are in number 100—sometimes more, and sometimes less. They are kept in warm, but well ventilated stables throughout the winter, and part of the spring and autumn. They are not exposed to cold rains even in summer. They run during the summer on luxuriant pastures, each of which affords a comfortable shade. So much importance is attached to shade, that sheds have been erected over the troughs, where they get their drink. As there is no running water on the farm, we have to depend on pumps. And it may not be out of place here to state, that two dogs, one at a time, pump all the water, and cut all the cornstalks, straw and hay used for all the cows and other animals of this farm. These cut articles, mixed with cornmeal, bran, shorts, and roots, are cooked by means of a very simple steam apparatus for their food during the winter, with occasional variations.

The cows are at all times in the stables clean, by being kept clear of their own dirt, by means of a well constructed drain so fixed as to receive all their dung and urine.

Of the sales of the products of this dairy farm there has been for a series of years a progressive increase. The account of the sales of last year, as rendered to me by my manager on the 1st January last, you have below; and I am given to understand that it will be more this year. In this statement the proceeds of the garden of 30 acres are not included.

As the expenses of repairs, of buildings, and of every other kind, are paid by my manager, I have not allowed myself to pry into them very closely. I have contented myself with knowing, that he has to deliver to me, and that he does deliver to me, without limitation every day, whatever quantity my family may want of fresh butter, cream and milk, and that he has to pay me, and does pay me in cash every Saturday a satisfactory nett amount of rent.

CULTIVATION OF HEMP.

From the Maine Gazette.

The subscriber is prepared to supply those who may wish to cultivate hemp, with prime seed, of last year's growth, at one dollar per bushel. The scarcity of seed and the enormous price demanded for it heretofore, together with want of information in growing and preparing it for market, has been causes of failure and discouragement to many who have undertaken it. These difficulties are now measurably obviated, so much so that our farmers have the means and information necessary to undertake the growing of hemp without much risk and with a prospect of a good business. Notwithstanding those who engaged in it last season paid four dollars per bushel for seed, many have made it a very profitable crop. The product of several acres has already been sold in the market for between fifty and sixty dollars to the acre. The prejudice in favor of foreign hemp is gradually subsiding, and the price of American water-rotted regularly advancing.

It is also obvious to those who have engaged in the growing of hemp that it is not an exhausting crop. It requires a warm, free soil in a good state of cultivation, well pulverized with the plough and harrow. Two and a half bushels of seed at least should be sown on the acre. As soon in the spring as the ground is sufficiently dry and warm to receive seed, it should be well harrowed and rolled or bushed in; nothing more is required until when fit to cut, which should be performed when full in the blow, with a cradle or hemp-hook; none should ever be pulled, the roots serve to enrich the ground, and the hemp sells better when cut. Much is lost by letting it stand too long in the field. It should be immediately immersed in clear, still water, and covered with slabs, boards, or other covering to exclude the sun. The fine hemp requires more time to rot than the coarse, it should therefore be sorted when put into the water, that the coarse may be taken out first. When well dried it is fit for dressing; care must be taken to keep it straight and even, through the process of rotting and drying. Twenty dollars per ton for merchantable hemp stem, prepared in this way, will be paid at the hemp factory hereafter; or it will be dressed, put into snug bales, and sold in the market if required, for one-third the proceeds, at the option of the cultivator. A fair price will be given for unrotted hemp without roots, if well cured and delivered at said factory after the 20th of May next.

THE MISSISSIPPI.

From the Louisville Public Advertiser, April 11.

The length of passage from New Orleans to Louisville has been shortened about 42 miles, by cutting off two bends in the Mississippi river. The first at the bend into which Red river empties itself. The distance round that bend was 18 miles. On the 14th of January last, capt. Shreve, the superintendent for improving the navigation of the Mississippi and Ohio rivers, commenced making an excavation across the neck of land, at the narrowest point. The object was effected by cutting a canal 17 feet wide and 22 feet deep, after felling all the timber in the vicinity. The water was let through the canal about the 28th of January, fourteen days after the commencement of the work. In two days the water had excavated a channel to such an extent, that the steamer Belvidere passed up through it. On the same day the U. States steamer Heliopolis passed up the same channel. Since that time, the steam boats have all passed through the same cut off, up and down. In five days it was the main channel of the river, being about half a mile in width, and of equal depth with the other parts of the river. The excavation was made by the steam snag boat Heliopolis, in an unexampled and expeditious manner. By laying the boat-head on the shore, two scrapers of large size were worked by lines from four windlasses on the main shafts of the boat. Two lines to each scraper, one a six inch line, to haul the scraper into the bow of the boat, the other, a three and a half inch line, passed through a leading block on the shore, as far out as was necessary, and fastened to the back end of the scraper to draw it out. In this manner, the scrapers were kept in continual operation; loaded and unloaded by their own motion, attended by two men each, moving the earth out and throwing it into the river, where it was washed away at the rate of at least a ton weight per minute.

The saving to the navigation at this point is as follows, to wit: By a register kept by Broadwell and Fulton at Natchez, there are 800 trips made up and down by steam boats, (passing this point) each year, eighteen miles each way, 36 miles less distance each trip, producing 28,800 miles less to be run in a year. Those who are acquainted with the expense of navigating steam boats, know that the average expense of that class of boats, which pass the river between Natchez and New Orleans, is at least one dollar per mile. For example, the expenses of boats running between Louisville and New Orleans, average more than $2,800 a trip—the distance is 2,800 miles up and down. By this calculation, the saving at this point is $28,800 to steam boats alone. Add to this six hours saved to every flat boat and raft that passes down in a year, about 7,000 in number, carrying 5 men each, making 35,000 men. Estimate their wages and subsistence at 75 cents a day, half a day each, and it produces the sum of $13,125; making an aggregate of $41,925 saved to the country in a year.

The other bend, 200 miles above Natchez, which has been cut off, is not yet so perfect a navigation. The distance round it is 24 miles. That channel has been formed by cutting a small ditch through two years ago. Last fall the timber was cut off the banks. Six or eight steam boats have passed up through it. It is believed that it will wash this year to such extent, that it will be the main channel of the river next year. The saving to the navigation will be equally as great as that at Red river. From examinations made by capt. H. M. Shreve, he is of opinion, that the distance may be shortened 97 miles in the same manner, at a comparatively small expense, by cutting through five other bends The superintendent has been instructed by the department not to execute this work, as the act of congress providing for the improvement of the navigation of that river, does not authorise that description of improvement.

It is hoped that, at the next session of congress the law will be so amended, as to authorise that important work to be done.

UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

From the Registro Official of Mexico.

Copy of a note sent to the secretaries of the house of representatives of the United Mexican States, by his excellency, the secretary of state, of the republic.

I have the honor to transmit to your excellency the treaty of amity, commerce and navigation, agreed upon between the plenipotentiaries appointed to this effect by his excellency the vice president, exercising the executive power, and his excellency the president of the United States of America, so that your excellencies may inform that body, to enable it to act conformably to the 13th faculty of the 50th article of the federal constitution. The time appointed for the exchange of the ratification of this treaty having past, it has given occasion to revise and alter several of its articles, and for this reason it becomes necessary it should be taken anew into consideration. With the same object I transmit to your excellencies an additional article, which has been indispensably added to the treaty of limits between both republics, fixing a new term for the exchange of the ratification of it, that having expired which had been fixed for the purpose, without being accomplished.

I also transmit to your excellency, with the same object, the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, which has been agreed upon, between the plenipotentiaries appointed to that effect, by his excellency the vice president, and his excellency the president of the republic of Chili.

His excellency the vice president requests me to call the attention of the house to the importance of taking into consideration all these documents in the shortest delay possible, so as to settle our relations of amity and commerce in a solid and permanent manner, with those two republics, and that the treaty of limits with the United States of America may arrive at a final conclusion.

Your excellencies will please to manifest it thus, and receive the assurances of my distinguished consideration. God and liberty. LUCAS ALAMAN.

To their excellencies the secretaries of the house of representatives.

Mexico, April 6th, 1831.

To the editors of the American.

Mexican legation, Baltimore, May 23d, 1831.

As contradictory reports have been published in several newspapers, about the final conclusion of the treaty of amity, commerce and navigation between this country and the Mexican United States, I feel myself bound to announce that I have received official communications from my government, stating that the said treaty was signed on the 6th of April, and also that an additional article was appended to the boundary treaty between the two countries, prolonging the time that was named for its exchange. JOSE M. TORNEL.

ALGIERS.

The French have conquered a kingdom as large as Spain, with as fine a climate, and commanding the entrance to that land of terrors and treasures, the central region of Africa. They are going on a la Francaise in all points. They have compelled the Moors to clean their streets, and do not despair of making them wash their shirts and faces in time. They have run up a central avenue through Algiers, and ventilated the town. They have slain the mongrels that infested the streets, and reduced the establishment of dunghills as venerable as Mahomet. They have built an opera-house, ordering the wealthy Moors to put down their names on the box-list, and subscribe as becomes patrons of the fine arts. They have arranged a circle of private boxes in the theatre, to which the ladies of the several Harems have keys, and where they listen to Italian songs, learn to be delighted with the romantic lovers of Europe, and turn over a leaf in human nature which no Algerine Houri ever turned before. A detachment of dancing-masters has been brigaded for the service, and modistes "from Paris" are rapidly opening shops in the "Grand Rue Royale." The ladies are, as might be expected, in raptures with the change, and go out shopping with the air of an elegante of the Faux-bourg St. Germain. Galignani daily communicates to the Algerine coffee-houses the news of a world of which they hitherto knew no more than of the news of the dog star. All is gaiety, gesticulation, and the march of intellect. If a great three-tailed bashaw feels disposed to express the slightest dislike of the new regime, they order him to be shaved, dispossess him of his turban, pipe and scymetar, and send him to learn the manual exercise under one of their sergeants. The remedy is infallible. In twelve hours a revolution is effected in all his opinions; he learns the French art of looking delighted under all circumstances, and returns from the drill a changed man. The offending Mauritanian, is disciplined out of him, and the parade has inducted him into the march of mind for the rest of his days. The French are distilling brandy from sea weed; are teaching buffaloes to draw their cabriolets, have already formed a subscription pack of tiger hounds, and, except that they are scorched to a cinder, with the more serious evils that they must wait a week for the Paris news, and have not yet been able to prevail on Potier and Mademoiselle Du Fay to join their theatre, are as happy as sultans. POLITICS OF THE DAY.

From the N. Y. Standard.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE TAMMANY SOCIETY, ON THE 12TH INSTANT.

The late hour at which the entertainments on Thursday evening were terminated, prevented us from giving a full account of the celebration in yesterday's paper, to-day however we are enabled to present the detail.

At half past five, P. M. the society assembled at the great Wigwam, and with numerous guests listened to a "long talk" from "brother Myer Moses of the South Carolina tribe." At seven, the company sat down to dinner, and were refreshed from the "great spring" by "brothers" Lovejoy and Howard the keepers. The front of the Wigwam was illuminated, and a splendid transparent likeness of the great New Orleans chief was exhibited. The game of the forest, and the fishes of the sea and the lakes, were spread in profusion.

Upwards of four hundred persons were seated at the ample spread tables, among whom were the governor and lieut. governor of the state, governor Cass of Michigan, the attorney general and adjutant general of the state, and register in chancery, the recorder of Hudson, the hon. A. P. Talmadge, president of the senate, the mayor and recorder of the city, the members of congress, of senate, and assembly. The Wigwam was decorated with banners, and a full band of music enlivened the scenes.

At the request of the grand sachem, the hon. Stephen Allen, late grand sachem, presided as chairman, assisted by Jacob S. Bogart, grand sachem, and brothers Gideon Ostrander, Shivers Parker; and John Webb, as vice presidents.

Previous to the regular toasts being drank, the following letters were read by the grand sachem:

Washington, May 2d, 1831.

Sir:—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your polite invitation to dine at Tammany Hall on the 12th instant, in celebration of your 42d anniversary.

Nothing could afford me greater gratification than to participate with your ancient and honorable society of republicans, on such an occasion—but the present press of official duties, with the previous determination taken, not to accept of any public entertainment during my continuance in office, is the apology I have to offer for declining the honor conferred upon me.

With a tender to you, and through you, to every member composing the committee, of my best wishes for their individual happiness, I am, sir, with high consideration and respect, your obd't servant, ANDREW JACKSON.

Peter W. Spicer, esq. chairman.

Washington, May 7th, 1831.

Gentlemen: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your favor conveying an invitation from the Tammany society to the celebration of its 42d anniversary, on the 12th inst.

It will not be in my power to leave here as early as the 12th, and shall therefore be deprived the pleasure which I should experience in being the guest of the society at a commemoration intended to perpetuate the philanthrophic spirit in which the society was founded, and calculated likewise, to revive the recollection of those animated struggles for the maintenance of the great principles of republican government, in which its members bore such distinguished parts.

With my acknowledgements for the honor conferred upon me, accept gentlemen my cordial reciprocation of the sentiments you have expressed. Your obedient servant, M. VAN BUREN.

Messrs. Spicer and Bedient, chairman and secretary, of the committee of arrangements.

City Hotel, 26th April, 1831.

Sir: I was in the country when your polite invitation was left at my lodgings, or it should have been sooner answered.

It would give me peculiar pleasure to assist at the anniversary of an institution, formed for the purpose of fostering the principles of republicanism and love of country, and of which I was a member soon after it was founded. I am forced however to forego the satisfaction I should have felt in a renewed association with the few who yet remain of those I formerly met there, and of the younger members assembled for the same purpose, and animated with the same patriotic spirit which led to the formation of the society. An obligation to leave the city in a few days, must be my excuse, which I pray you sir to communicate to the committee of arrangements. I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant, EDW. LIVINGSTON.

General Spicer.

Letters were also received from the hon. Charles E. Dudley and Nathan Sandford, U. S. senators, A. C. Flagg and E. Croswell, politely declining their respective invitations.

By the committee—Our distinguished guest, the governor of the state of New York—called to his high office by the voice of the people. His administration has met their most cordial approbation—3 cheers.

The governor, in reply, made a few pertinent remarks, in the course of which he alluded to the fact, that when first honored with the voice of his fellow citizens for the office of lieutenant governor, he was but little known to the public; his sphere of action having been confined to a small section of the state, and his duties of a local nature. His elevation to the responsible station of lieutenant governor was, therefore, unexpected, but most gratifying to his feelings; and he entered upon the discharge of his duties with a firm determination to consult the interests of his constituents. How far he had succeeded in the great object of his desires, it was not for him to determine. At the late election, the people had elevated him to the first office in the state, and he had entered upon his new duties with the same anxious desire to serve the public which he had originally felt. The flattering manner in which his name had just been alluded to, conferred an honor which he duly appreciated. He felt grateful for the approbation of the company, and begged leave to offer the following sentiment:—

The republicans of the city of New York—A numerous and influential body in the affairs of the country; let them remember that there is safety in union.

By the committee—Our distinguished guest, Lewis Cass, governor of Michigan. Alike distinguished in the field and in the cabinet. His able administration of the government of Michigan for the last 16 years, has called forth the approbation of four successive administrations, and promises a life of much future usefulness to the country—3 cheers.

Governor Cass rose and tendered to the company his grateful acknowledgements for the flattering mark of attention which had been extended to him—he appreciated most highly the kind feelings which prompted the sentiment which had been drank, but he considered it his duty to disclaim the merit attributed to him, and proposed the following toast:

The city of New York—Her commanding position and the enterprise and intelligence of her citizens have rendered her the commercial metropolis of our country. They promise long to keep her so.

By the committee. The lieut. governor of the state of New York—A firm and undeviating advocate in the cause of democracy—3 cheers.

To which lieut. gov. Livingston made the following reply:—

It is with emotions of no ordinary kind that I rise to express my grateful acknowledgements for the honor conferred on me by this numerous and highly respectable assemblage of republican citizens. It is the more gratifying to me from the recollection that in this city my earlier years were passed, and here it was my good fortune to have received the advantages of a liberal education. My early recollection carry me back also to that interesting period when after the great struggle was over, a new and interesting era had arrived on the adoption of the federal constitution. To have beheld many of those distinguished men, who composed that illustrious band of patriots who gave freedom to America, has ever afforded me the highest gratification, and what tended greatly to increase my esteem and veneration for their services and their virtues was the remembrance that they had been the friends and companions of my revered grandsire Philip Livingston a representative in congress from New York, and who had been so generally and so advantageously known as one of the aldermen of this city.

From these pure sources I imbibed the principles recommended me at an early period of life to the notice of some of the patriots of the revolution, and which has obtained me on several occasions the confidence of the people. Although I have for many years resided in a different part of the state, yet I have felt an interest in every thing connected with the prosperity of the city of New York, and have beheld with the greatest pleasure its advancement in population and wealth. The continued exercise of the benevolent affection and the attention here paid to education; I have witnessed with the most delightful sensations, the love of freedom which you have so frequently manifested; the patriotic exertions of the citizens of New York in times of the greatest danger; and their support which republican principles and their friends have met within this quarter of the state could not fail to impress on my mind a high degree of respect and esteem.

It has been my humble endeavor in the stations to which I have been called, to promote those kind feelings which should for ever unite the city and country; whose interest is so much identified, and should I have ever been in any way instrumental in promoting so desirable an object, I have obtained infinitely more than I could have merited, in the favor and support I have received from the democracy of this city. If it is our duty to unite in those measures which are calculated for the general benefit of city and country, it is also essential that we should be as united in the support of those principles which were so nobly and successfully contended for by our fathers, which have conducted us to so much prosperity and honor, and which sustained by the friends of democracy in every part of our state, cannot fail of establishing them on such a basis as will ensure their duration until time itself shall be no more—I beg leave to offer as a toast.

The city of New York—Respected for her wealth and enterprise, honored for her benevolence and patriotism.

By the committee. Commerce—The foundation of our city's prosperity. Its principles have been lucidly illustrated, and the rights and interests of our commercial community ably advocated by our distinguished representatives in congress.

Mr. Cambreleng returned thanks. He apologised to his colleagues for presuming to offer their acknowledgements, when either of them would have discharged the duty with much greater ability. He was sure however, they would pardon him, when they learned that he was actuated by a desire to seize the present opportunity—the first that had been afforded him in ten years public service—to express his sincere gratitude to his constituents for the many and undeserved honors they had conferred upon him—for the repeated and triumphant evidences of their confidence.

Your representatives have endeavored to discharge the trust you have confided to them, and they trust they have done so with zeal and fidelity. I wish, gentlemen, I could add that their efforts had been successful. We must not, however, despair. Liberal principles of government are gaining ground in every country, and we have no reason to believe that their progress will be slow in our own. The day of commercial liberty is dawning upon our union—with the extinguishment of our national debt, some of our taxes and restrictions must inevitably fall. It is not probable that any party will find it convenient or popular to advocate in our free land, the odious doctrine of perpetual taxation. We shall soon see the representatives of the people adopting the recommendation of our patriotic chief magistrate, and relieving the country from every unnecessary tax upon consumption. We have further encouragement in the prospect before us. We have a president who is endeavoring to revive the ancient policy and principles of our government—to guard every branch of industry with a vigilant solicitude, but not to encourage one to the injury of the other—to oppress no interest—to sacrifice the rights of no portion of the union. Under his administration commence is once more considered essential to our national prosperity—navigation the basis of our naval power; the right arm of our defence. But gentlemen, we have other and immediate evidence of the friendly disposition of our chief magistrate to our great commercial interests in the exercise of a prerogative particularly confided to him by our federal constitution. By various commercial treaties he has enlarged our intercourse with America, Europe and Asia, and under his auspices we already see our commerce reviving in spite of all our taxes and restrictions—He has secured for us indemnity from Denmark—we have triumphed in our negotiations with Great Britain—and for the first time under the authority of a treaty, has the American flag passed the Dardanelles. Gentlemen allow me to congratulate you that, these important services to our country have been rendered in rapid succession by a chief magistrate of our own choice; and, may we not be permitted to congratulate ourselves, that these brilliant diplomatic results have all been realized through the immediate agency and eminent ability of one of our own distinguished fellow citizens.

Pardon me, gentlemen, for trespassing still further on your indulgence. I feel called upon by an imperative sense of duty to my constituents as well as to myself, to notice an extraordinary attack made on a portion of the representation of this state, upon a recent occasion, by a distinguished senator from Massachusetts. That gentleman deemed it decorous and just to impute to members from various states opinions hostile to the constitution and disloyal to the union. It is a charge not to be treated lightly nor to be disregarded. I owe it to you, gentlemen, as your representative—to my colleagues from the interior who voted with me, and to other members from different parts of the union, to meet the charge preferred against us at the bar of my constituents by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts.

And what, gentlemen, was the foundation for this formidable charge of treason to the union? The committee on the judiciary at the late session of congress, introduced a bill to repeal the 25th section of the judiciary act. The enemies of the measure immediately attacked it, and in a manner which I hold utterly incompatible with that spirit of full and free inquiry with which every question of public importance should be examined, and with that right to be heard, which belongs to every man or body of men in this republic. The bill was arrested, and without knowledge, investigation, or debate, rejected at its second reading.

Whenever majorities trample upon the rights of minorities—when men are denied even the privilege of having their causes of complaint examined into—when measures, which they deem for their relief, are rejected by the despotism of a silent majority at a second reading—when such become the rules of our legislation, the congress of this union will no longer justly represent a republican people. It was in accordance with these principles, gentlemen, which I believe to be yours, that I voted against the motion to reject this bill at its second reading, and should not hesitate on a similar occasion to give the same vote. If Virginia complained—if Kentucky, South Carolina or Georgia—if the people of any portion of our union complained of the operation of any part of the judiciary act—of any of our laws, or of any feature of our constitution, I would at least accord to the party the unquestionable right to have their proposition fully and freely debated, whatever might be its ultimate fate.

Those who voted against rejecting the bill had, however, other motives. While I was opposed to repealing the section in question, I entertained the opinion—an opinion in which many others concurred—that it was at least expedient to inquire whether some modification of the section was not necessary. The authority of the supreme court had been used in the case of the Indian, Tassells. A serious question had been raised as to the extent of the jurisdiction of the supreme court—whether it was to control the decisions of our state tribunals in criminal as well as civil cases. I believed, with others, that if a just construction of that act did authorise an appeal from the judgments of our state courts in criminal cases, a modification of the act would become indispensably necessary to secure to our state authorities entire and final jurisdiction in all cases arising under their own criminal laws. It seemed manifest to my mind, that if the supreme court of the United States should ever claim and exercise a control over our state tribunals in criminal cases, it would inevitably produce dangerous collisions with the states—collisions fatal to the authority of the court.

But gentlemen, I had another and yet graver motive for desiring that the power of the supreme court should be at least examined and understood. We had and have still a party in this country, pretending to be the exclusive friends of that excellent institution, so reckless of the prosperity and harmony of the union, and so controlled by a partizan frenzy as to desire to involve the supreme court of the United States in a Cherokee war. It was understood that an appeal would be, or had been made to that tribunal by the Cherokees—and there was an impression that the court might entertain jurisdiction of it. The opposition hoped, and we feared, that the judges of the supreme court might yield to party considerations and attempt to exercise political as well as judicial authority. Gentlemen, was it not necessary to inquire whether there was any foundation in our laws or constitution for our apprehensions, or the sanguine hopes of the opposition? If there was a doubt upon the subject; if there was an apprehension that the court might absorb all the political as well as the judicial powers of the government—was it not our duty to enquire whether an express amendment of the judiciary act had not become necessary to guard the executive as well as legislative branches of our government from the encroachments of the judiciary and to arrest the progress of our constructive usurpation? Gentlemen, the crisis is now past—the firmness and good sense of a majority of that court have relieved the true friends of that tribunal and the union from their apprehensions. The danger is over, and it cannot but have left a strong impression of the more than ordinary hardihood of the opposition in claiming to be the exclusive friends of the supreme court, or of the union, when we look back upon their extraordinary attempts to sacrifice that institution—to make it subservient to the distracting purposes of their party—to produce a convulsive conflict between the executive and judicial departments of our government, more fatal to the existence of our union than all the dangers of nullification, even when magnified by the sombre imagination of a senator from Massachusetts. History will do little credit to these exclusive friends of the supreme court, and of our union, when it records their political movements in relation to this question. It will not soon be forgotten by the good people of this country, that the most splendid talents of the opposition have been enlisted, and eloquently exercised, to induce the judges of the supreme court of our union, to violate their sacred oaths and obligations, and usurp political powers not granted by our laws or constitution—not to further the cause of justice, but to produce an open war between the executive and the judiciary. Gentlemen, our adversaries were every where anticipating, and triumphantly announcing to us this judgment of the court. Our chief magistrate was threatened—we were soon to see whether he would dare to disobey the mandate of the court—in other words whether he would violate his oath to adhere to the constitution, and send an army into Georgia, to assist our federal officers in enforcing the decree of the court, and in suspending the execution of all the laws of Georgia, relating to the Cherokees. Is there a patriot in the union, no matter to what party he may belong, who could contemplate such a crisis without the most serious alarm for the existence of the court and the peace and harmony of the union?

Gentlemen, I make no professions of an exclusive devotion to the supreme court—neither would I be considered hostile to it. I distrust all men who are placed by our laws beyond the control of the popular will; but while I would watch the usurpations of our judges with the vigilance of a republican, I would protect the court in the exercise of its legitimate powers with the fidelity of a citizen. I congratulate you, gentlemen, most sincerely that our adversaries have been foiled and that the danger is past. I congratulate you that all the artifices and eloquence of the opposition were not able to induce the court to yield to political considerations. I trust its judgments will ever be as pure and constitutional as that upon the Cherokee question. I trust that those who ascend to that elevated station will dismiss every political hope and fear, and that they may ever be what they were designed to be—the righteous and incorruptible judges of the law and the constitution.

Gentlemen, I am happy that I have had an opportunity to make this explanation, but I regret, most sincerely regret, the cause which made it necessary. I regret that I am obliged to refer with any other than feelings of pride and pleasure to a festival which did honor to the hospitality of our city, and was but a just tribute to the abilities of a distinguished stranger. But, gentlemen, I would be unworthy to represent you in our federal councils were I to submit in silence to a charge of disloyalty to our union. No matter how delicate the occasion, or from what quarter it may come, it must be promptly and boldly encountered. The senator from Massachusetts thought proper, in his eulogy upon the supreme court, our constitution, and our union, and in the presence of our fellow citizens, to denounce with one sweep the minority on the judiciary question as advocates of the doctrine of nullification; as enemies to our constitution; as disloyal to the union. He tells his audience, in reference to this vote, "The doctrines of nullification have received a severe rebuke from public opinion; the general reprobation of the country has been cast upon them; recent expressions of the most numerous branch of the national legislature are decisive and imposing. Every where the general tone of public feeling is for the constitution." He expresses his "sincere gratification that the voice of this great state has been so clear and strong, and her vote, all but unanimous, on the most interesting of those occasions in the house of representatives." "Certainly," he continues, "such respect to the union becomes New York."

He compliments Pennsyvania too—"she was loyal to the union to a man." Can it be possible, gentlemen, that the distinguished senator from Massachusetts, would deliberately make such a declaration—would covertly stab with such an insinuation, and on such an occasion, when every other public man knows, and the senator could not but have known, that not one of that minority, except a portion of the South Carolina delegation, ever entertained the doctrines of nullification. Would it have weakened the distinguished gentleman's argument in favor of the stability of the union, would it have done less credit to his candor and justice—had he have stated to his audience, what every member knew, that there were not six even of that minority who did not utterly disclaim the doctrine of nullification? And, gentlemen, even the members from South Carolina, who do avow these doctrines, I have no doubt feel as honest a devotion to the union of these states, as ever animated the bosom of the senator from Massachusetts. The nullifiers of South Carolina had a right to expect more liberality and justice from the distinguished senator. He should have been more moderate in rebuking this spirit of discontent—he should have traced this doctrine of nullification to its origin; he should have told his audience of a certain Boston meeting, and of certain celebrated resolutions, wherein the tariff was most deliberately and solemnly denounced as unconstitutional. The distinguished gentleman should have frankly said, "Spare these South Carolinians, for if there be any thing alarming, any thing treasonable, if there be convulsions, civil war, or disunion in this doctrine of nullification, be the sin on my head."

But whatever treatment the nullifiers of South Carolina may have received, the friends of free trade had certainly a right to anticipate more generosity and justice from their ancient associate. They remember him as their illustrious leader, when he was rapidly retrieving his adverse political fortunes, gathering green and imperishable renown in eloquently and ably vindicating the cause of commercial freedom; when he was gliding on the political tide with prosperous gales, and all his canvas spread for the haven of his highest ambition! None regretted more sincerely than they did the unhappy fate of that distinguished gentleman, when he allowed himself, like an unskilful pilot, to be taken all aback by——a squall from the west.

And gentlemen, when the distinguished senator from Massachusetts was addressing his audience, congratulating them on the stability of the union, and denouncing others so bitterly as the enemies of our republic—when he was illustrating the immorality of a confederacy, he should have told his audience the story of a distinguished statesman, who in 1812, 13, 14 and 15, would have "spoiled the patern,"—have trampled our constitution under foot; set the federal government at defiance, and threatened the union. He should have told them that the same gentleman was now a reformed man, that he now stood in the portico of the temple of our union, with his brows bound with a patriot's wreath, unrolling and vindicating the constitution of his country, and complacently receiving the homage of his fellow citizens as the peculiar and illustrious champion of the union.

There is an excitement in novel impulses, and we must allow new honors to be worn with some parade. To you, gentlemen, the sentiment of patriotism, is as ancient as the date of your institution, and coeval with our constitution. It is an old fashioned sentiment. You have been the steady and unwavering, but unpretending defenders of our constitution and our union, through good report and through evil report; in peace and amidst all the calamities of war.

Our country never will be in danger, gentlemen, till you surrender the care of your free institutions to our modern patriots.

But, gentlemen, I am happy to hear the watchword of union from any quarter. What have we to fear for our constitution or our country, when we hear these cries of union, union? What better evidence can we have of its immortality? Yes, gentlemen, may our republic last forever; may it remain a splendid example to the people of every land. Our age is auspicious to liberty. Through the medium of commerce and the agency of the press, nations are communing together, the people of every country are learning to appreciate the value of their rights, and to discover how much and how long they have been wronged. The reign of ignorance and superstition is near its end; light is appearing; knowledge is spreading; liberty is triumphantly advancing.

Pardon me, gentlemen, for having detained you so long, and allow me to propose—

Immortality to our union—civil, religious and commercial liberty to all the world.

By G. C. Verplanck—Hugh Lawson White, of Tennessee—Wise, able, brave and honest—the fit foundation stone of a republican cabinet.

Mr. Cambreleng said it was a little out of order to offer two toasts on the same occasion, but as his colleague had proposed the distinguished gentlemen from Tennessee—he would offer another member of the new cabinet—a near friend of his, and one who had, by his distinguished services abroad, rendered himself well known to every gentleman present. He begged to propose the health of

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 14—VOL. IV. BALTIMORE, JUNE 4, 1831. [VOL. XL. WHOLE No. 1,028.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

☞Necessity, in the mechanical branch of our business, has materially interfered with the intended contents of this sheet, by causing the omission of many articles designed for it—among them a corrected report of the trial of Cunningham, the opener of the mail.

☞ The thermometer at Baltimore, during the present week, has ranged between 84 and 88 degrees, in the middle of the day. The suddenness of the change, (for the weather before was rather cool for the season), has much added to the severity of the heat.

IT IS SAID—That col. Johnson, of Kentucky, will not be appointed secretary of war—and that gov. Cass, of Michigan will be. The like is also said of col. Drayton, of South Carolina.

That major Eaton will not be sent to Russia, but be appointed governor of Michigan, in the place of Mr. Cass, to be appointed secretary of war.

That Mr. Ingham has been really offered, and promptly refused, the Russian mission—and that Mr. Buchanan, of Pennsylvania has accepted it.

And, among the lesser reports—that auditors Kendall and Lewis have been dismissed, or soon would be.

These are some of the it-is-saids.

☞"The politics of the day" are highly interesting. We have made a large selection of "all sorts and sizes"—for and against—up and down—"hither and yon;" but cannot make room for them now. The Philadelphia "Sentinel" and "Inquirer" have just commenced a brisk, amusing and instructive war. The Richmond Enquirer says many queer things, and all the chief political gladiators seem to have freshly nibbed their pens. Vive la p ume!

☞The proceedings of the convention of manufacturers lately held in New York, with a view to check frauds on the revenue, will be found in subsequent pages, and are highly interesting. There are important considerations belonging to the facts suggested in the report of the committee, some of which we expect to offer to the judgment of the people—of more immediate concern, perhaps, to the growers of wool than any other class of persons, but deeply affecting the interests of agriculturalists and manufacturers, in general.

The editor gratefully notices the high compliment paid to himself by that very respectable body of intelligent gentlemen—and will endeavor to deserve it, by increased efforts to preserve and extend the whole "American System," in a renewed belief that its full and perfect establishment is indispensable to the welfare of the whole American people. It is rapidly gathering friends, even in the camps of its enemies—and only requires to be understood, to be appreciated as it ought. Prejudice and party will yet give themselves up to the dominion of truth—errors of opinion being combatted with reason, tempered with that respect which is due to honest differences on all questions of expediency.

In our last paper we felt compelled to notice certain things which appeared to us as deliberately manufactured falsehoods, at the "all's fair in politics" shop of the "New York Courier and Enquirer." And now we see, republished from the same paper, a sketch of a speech ascribed to Mr. Hubbard, of Connecticut, which is a grossly exaggerated and ungenerous misrepresentation of certain remarks made by Mr. Shaw, of Massachusetts*—and other things are stated for public effect, which we must think that no private gentleman would venture upon. It is useless to particularize. Cobbett the father of the "improved press," substantially said, (though we forget the words which he used) "that a strong lie, well maintained, was far better than an humble truth." In leaving our country, he carried not away with him his whole system of ethics.

☞The foreign articles inserted in this paper are of considerable length—as well for present use as for record. The British king has taken a high stand in favor of parliamentary reform—a measure not only right in itself, but, perhaps, also very expedient, to cherish the hopes of the people that their grievances may be relieved. Mighty exertions were making to defeat the project of the ministers, though thus firmly supported by the king. It is said that 10 millions—say 45 millions of dollars, "will change hands," that is, be used in corruption, at the elections—each party doing all that it can to succeed! The tory party is reported to have actually subscribed two millions—the duke of Northumberland giving £250,000 or $1,200,000—sir Robert Peel, (to his disgrace be it said, for he is the son of a cotton spinner), £50,000, and so on. The high aristocracy will die in the last ditch—but that "hospital of incurables," the house of lords, will probably save them, unless a large "batch of peers" is made by the king, and he manufactures these things at his pleasure. There was a great illumination of London because of the dissolution of parliament, and a mighty crush of glass—it is estimated that 250,000 dollars will not repair the damages done to windows, not lighted up. The mobs were supposed to contain from 300 to 400,000 people! Some think that England is on the eve of a great convulsion—if the reform bill be not carried. The prospect is, from the changes known, that the new house of commons will pass it, and it may be managed in the other house, as suggested; but the combined opposition of the old nobility and priests will render the proceeding somewhat hazardous, unless a general reformation of the government is looked to by the king and his ministers. It is easier to start the ball, than to direct its course or restrain its progress.

The government of France seems to be gathering firmness. The king is very popular. The military means of France are mighty.

THE FOREIGN MARKET holds out no great prospect of profit to our farmers. The large supply of foreign wheat in England has deadened the demand, though the nominal price was high—70*s.* 8*d.* the quarter. Flour, at Baltimore, from 5 to 5¼ dollars, according to quality.—"Family" 6¼.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT. Alanson Salts marsh, to be register of the land office of the district of lands subject to sale at Cahawba, in the state of Alabama, to take effect from the 15th day of July, 1831, vice Gurdon Saltonstall, resigned.

George B. Crutcher to be receiver of public moneys for the district of lands subject to sale at Mount Salus, in the state of Mississippi, vice H. G. Rennels, resigned.

MR. FILLEBROWN, discharged from a clerkship in the navy department, and called a public defaulter, has recovered a verdict for 430 dollars, in his favor—the amount claimed by him; the United States having instituted a suit to recover 2,000 dollars. Such was the finding of the jury.

ANOTHER. Mr. George McDaniel, removed from a clerkship in the office of the 4th auditor (Mr. Kendall's), and sued as a defaulter, has had the verdict of a jury for the amount of his claim.

MAJOR ANDRE. We have another lack-a-daisycal revival of oh-las about this man, rightfully executed for being engaged in the dirtiest piece of work that an honorable man can embark in—and by Americans, who do not even know the history of capt. Nathan Hale! But the latter was not an Englishman—and our sympathies are not awakened. "Sweet sensibility!"

LAWRENCE'S MONUMENT. Another effort seems to be making in New York for the purpose of repairing the monument erected to the memory of the gallant tar, which stands, or leans, or lies, in Trinity church yard Looking at it, some time ago, and enquiring of a bystander why it was allowed to be a ruin, he wittily remarked, that it has been intended so from the beginning, as allegorical of the fate of the brave man whose services it was designed to acknowledge: that, as he perished in the freshness of his youth, so should his monument!

ANTI TARIFF CONVENTION. A project was started some time ago in the New York Evening Post, to assemble, from all parts of the union, "a convention of intelligent and disinterested men, professing the doctrines of free trade, with a view of inquiring into the results of the restrictive system, and laying them before the public." We have no sort of objection to this proceeding. We shall act upon principles the reverse of those entertained by our opponents, and publish the entire account of their doings. We are not afraid, as they are, of suffering the people to see both sides of the question.

The "greatest and best" of the Michaels,* in his paper of the 27th ult. quotes, with much approbation, the following dignified article from the Camden (S. C.) Journal—

"It is proposed, in the New York Evening Post, that there be held an anti-tariff convention of the United States, for the purpose of furnishing the people of the union with sound and correct views in relation to the impolicy of our present unhallowed system of restrictions. We have never been in favor of these extra legislative assemblages for the purpose of dictation to the regular legislation of the country; but we are inclined to wish, at this time, that the suggestion might be followed up. The advocates of restricted trade have moved heaven and earth in the cause of monopoly, and their movements may as well be counteracted by a corresponding activity on the part of those contending for correct principle and equal legislation. Let such a convention be called, and let its labors be healthfully directed. Let the result be spread before the people of the whole United States. Let the fallacious sophistries of Mathew Carey, and the tabular nonsensicalities of the "greatest and best" of the Hezekiahs, be detected. Let the delusive doctrines of the high pressure tariff be exposed, and the crying injustice done the "unprotected" portions of the people be made palpable and apparent to the citizens of the United States, and there can be little doubt that the fogs of an iniquitous and oppressive system will dissipate, and the people again be able to see through the murky darkness with which an unprincipled monopoly has beclouded the moral and mental atmosphere."

We heartily say—"come on." If the "free trade philosophers" will go into "tabular" statements, we shall feel much pleasure in shewing wherein "non-sensi-ca-li-ties" are to be found. We like to get those folks into figures.

☞By the way—it is high time to enquire what has become of Mr. Ritchie? We challenged him to meet us in an open discussion of subjects which he had much and long snapped about: and he promised that he would do so, soon after the adjournment of congress—which is now more than three months. The extra length of the session of the legislature of Virginia, we thought of and accepted as a good excuse for some part of the delay, and he has latterly had much concern in cabinet-making—but having so arranged all things as well as he can, and dictated a course for the new administration to pursue, we hope that he will find leisure to redeem his pledge to us. The subject is a leading one before the people of the United States—and surely, this veteran of the quill, champion of "free trade" and Atlas of "state rights" will not longer hesitate to meet one of "the Hezekiahs," and shew his "nonsensicalities,"—seeing it is proposed to call a national convention of "intelligent and disinterested persons," for that very purpose!!!—Our valued friend, whose zeal in works of benevolence is honorable to the human race, having retired from this discussion, some two or three years ago.

We take this opportunity to inform Mr. Ritchie that we are ready for him. We care not how soon, nor in what manner, he shall make his attack. All we ask is—that he will descend from speculative opinions into practical matters, and appeal to the reason of the people. Nay, we will waive even this request—so great is our desire to place ourselves before the worthy and respected readers of the "Richmond Enquirer," and especially at the present time, that they may see us as we are, hear us in our own words, and make their own deductions. We are aware that hosts of prejudices are to be encountered, and know also that hundreds who hold them stand far above us, by education and the power of logic—but, as the mailed Goliah fell beneath the force of a small smooth stone from the valley, so humble truth (as we regard it), may find its way through some opening to the just judgment of men, who cannot, knowingly, entertain one thought that is in opposition to the good of their country.

Will Mr. Ritchie let us "hear" from Him?

WHOLESALE! The following paragraph from the "address of the Jackson central committee to the people of Indiana," we find in the Lawrenceburg "Palladium" of May 21, specially marked for our use—whether by a friend or an opponent of the system, we know not.

"The low prices of many domestic articles are given as so many proofs of the fact, that high duties do not produce high prices. In reply to this idea, we deem it only necessary to refer to the great improvements in labor-saving machinery, the spirited home competition in many branches of trade, the low price of raw materials, and the enterprise of our citizens. We never can believe that the scarcity of an article tends to cheapen it, that an addition to its cost renders its value less, or that the absence of the foreign fabric would melme the domestic manufacturer to ask less for his goods. This would be sophistry and false reasoning. The products of our soil, the energy of our people and the quantity of articles which they produce, prove conclusively that the privilege of monopoly is not necessary; but on the contrary, dangerous to our interest and in contravention of the plain features of our excellent constitution."

☞The preceding brings to recollection a very amusing incident that we happened to witness, substantially as follows: It is several years since the Washington 74, the second of the new-fashioned ships of the line, entered the Chesapeake, and anchored in Annapolis Roads; where she was visited by many thousand persons—among them the editor of the REGISTER. Having nothing else to do, I thought that I might, in part, amuse myself by observing the proceedings and listening to the remarks of a certain sea-captain (also a visiter at the same time), an Englishman born, and, though a naturalized citizen, an Englishman still in his heart, and notable for the roundity of his assertions—"going the whole hog," as the saying now is. All his notions of perfection seemed to be derived from English things; and had not his knowledge as a navigator, (and he was a skilful one), taught him that there was only one sun which warmed and lighted this earth, he would readily have taken an oath that the sun, which occasionally appears through the fog and smoke of London, was ten times bigger, and as many times better, than that which we enjoy in America; and hence, having in his mind the cumbrous forecastles and lofty poops of the old-fashioned 74's, he laughed heartily at the idea, as we neared the Washington, of sending out such a slim pilot-boat looking thing to cope with one of his "majesty's ships of the line"—she would be "blown to ———, in two minutes!" But when we reached the deck, and he had regarded its length and breadth, and seen the double row of heavy iron "teeth" that garnished it, he lustily swore that she was "a d—— take-in, a first rate ship in disguise!"

There was no pleasing of him—and, with a loud voice, he found fault with her masts and spars, pronouncing them too light, too short, and too any thing that was wrong. This excited the notice of a young lieutenant, who seemed disposed to amuse himself a moment with this original, as I myself was doing—and he remarked, that we yet wanted experience in the fitting out of such vessels, and he was desirous of being instructed—the ship, however, sailed well, and many thought she was too heavily sparred, that being the general fault in American vessels, if fault there was in this respect. This roused the other—he had had great experience in such things; and he repeated what he had said with much earnestness and a huge volume of oaths, to shew the correctness of his judgment! The other then "tacked," and, with apparent respect, desired the captain to go into particulars, and point out some mast or spar that was too short. The captain fell into this trap that was set for him, and observed "well, that spar is too short by at least ten feet," designating one of them. "How long should it be?" said the lieutenant. "Why, at least seventy feet." "How long is it?" "Sixty," replied the Englishman, affecting to measure it with his eye. "Your guess is a good one," said the lieutenant with a sneer—"that spar measured ninety-six feet when on the ground, and to my knowledge it has not been since reduced in length." The captain abashed, turned on his heel, and kept a strict guard over his tongue for the rest of the afternoon.

Thus with the extract before us and the facts offered by wholesale. We say that the conclusions are not true, and demand the particulars. A bushel of such assertions may be gathered from the anti-tariff papers any day in the week, especially from those whose editors are fed by foreigners, or foreign trade.

Circular to collectors of the customs. The following is well—so far as it goes; and, perhaps, goes as far as the law will allow. But the law itself is defective, and especially as to the value of our money compared with that of Great Britain, the measure of one being in silver and that of the other by gold, as was explained at some length in the 39th vol. of this work, page 2. Then the dollar, which we call 4*s.* 6*d.* sterling, was worth only 4*s.* 1½*d.* and hence the real par of exchange was 485 cents to the pound sterling, not 444 cents, as rated by our laws—and the revenue suffered thus: an article which cost the value of 485 cents in England, and liable to a duty of 30 per cent. for example, paid the duty only on 444, or 133 cents—whereas the duty should have been 30 per cent. on 485 cents, the actual cost of the article, or 145 cents, shewing a reduction of between 8 and 9 per cent. on the duty, because of differences in the real par of exchange.

Treasury department, May 14, 1831.

Sir: It has been ascertained that the depreciated currencies of foreign countries have been variously estimated at the different custom houses of the United States, owing, partly, to defective information as to the true specie value of such currencies, and partly to an erroneous practice of computing their value according to the rates of exchange with England, and reducing the sterling value of such depreciated currency into money of the United States, without regard to the difference between the legal and the true value of sterling money in United States' currency. To avoid such discrepancies and errors in future, the president directs that whenever invoices are made out in a currency the value of which is not fixed by the laws of the United States, you will require from the importer a certificate from the United States' consul, if there be one, at the place of exportation, of the true value of such currency in Spanish or United States' silver dollar, and charge the ad valorem duties according to such value; or, in the absence of such evidence, that you will ascertain said value from the prices current, and such other authentic sources of information as may be within your reach, and charge the ad valorem duties accordingly. You will give public notice of the directions herein contained as to the consular certificate; and, that uniformity may be hereafter secured at all the custom houses, you will forward to this department, once a month, a statement of the rates at which the currencies aforesaid are thus estimated, at each port from whence goods are imported and invoiced in such currencies. In all cases of doubt as to the value of such currency, you will apply to the treasury department for information. I am, respectfully, your obedient servant, S. D. Ingham, sec. treasury.

Locomotive engines. The period for a final trial of locomotive steam engines, has been postponed until the 27th June, instant. The selection will be made on the 29th, after which they will be subjected to thirty days regular work on the road, to fully ascertain their qualities—according to the conditions originally made known on offering a premium, by the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company.

A blacksmith's study. What would the reader say to an invitation to visit the study of a journeyman blacksmith? Ladies and gentlemen, walk in; don't be frightened; blacksmiths were in fashion before dancing masters, and steel was used for many purposes of utility previous to the invention of corsets. In one of our editorial peregrinations, we took some pains to call on a subscriber and correspondent, whose zeal in the cause had procured us a number of subscribers, and whose pithy productions in our columns had drawn the attention of the conductors of some of the first literary periodicals. On arriving at the village inn, we inquired for A. B. and was directed to a blacksmith's shop, where we found our friend busily engaged at his usual occupation. Without useless apologies or ceremonies, he politely introduced us to his residence and into his study. It was a comfortable and snug upper chamber, neatly plastered, and provided with a fire stove, a bed, a writing desk, a book case and shelves, with other corresponding conveniences. His library consisted of upwards of a hundred well selected volumes, comprising some standard works on history, civil government, science, law, theology, and general literature. It must have been in such retirements that the Benjamin Franklins and Roger Shermans of a former age conceived and planned the movements which resulted in the establishment of our free institutions. Sound republicanism. The following extract from the circular letter of gen. Barringer, a member of the last congress (and a candidate for re-election) accords with the views of the same subject which he has expressed on the floor of congress, and, we presume, may be taken to speak the sentiments of a great majority of the people of the state (of North Carolina) which he represents: [Nat. Int.

"On the occasion of my last address to you, I endeavored to point out some of the effects resulting from such a system and course of measures, and will not, therefore, now repeat the often-told tale. The southern presses have for years teemed with arguments and remonstrances, and some of the states have solemnly protested against a system of measures, believed to bear with peculiar pressure upon their interests. I will not say that all this had no effect, for I believe that a spirit of concession and compromise pervades the public mind, in almost every portion of our country; and I cannot but believe, that a dignified moderation will in the end effect a change in our national legislation, which has hitherto been denied to threats and violence; and I am the more confirmed in this opinion by events which have already transpired in the reduction of duties upon articles of first necessity, such as salt, coffee, &c. The ordinary limits of a circular letter forbid the attempt to enter largely upon the discussion of this vexed question, of the right and policy of protecting particular branches of industry, or indeed any domestic production (for our laws are so framed as to hold out the semblance of protection to all) but if the right exists (which, abstractedly, may admit of much doubt) the policy must be left to that obvious principle which lies at the foundation of all our institutions, as incident to popular governments, that a majority must rule. The denial of this principle, is to all intents the subversion of the forms of the constitution, and there remains no middle ground between acquiescence and resistance or revolution.

"I will not trust myself to speak of such a disastrous termination to the hopes of all good men every where—nor of those who would goad us on to the brink of the fatal precipice on which there remains no alternative but to embrace foul treason and make the fatal plunge, or to retreat with dishonor from machinations involving the destruction of the most glorious fabric of government which ever blest the hopes of man; I leave them to others and to the tortures which await their guilty spirits!! But to you I would say, in the language of our venerable chief magistrate—and I doubt not that you will respond a hearty amen—'the federal union—it must be preserved.'"

Mr. Woodbury, invited to a public dinner at Portsmouth, N. H. when on his way to the seat of government, returned the following reply declining the honor:

Portsmouth, 16th May, 1831.

Gentlemen—On my return from the interior of the state, I have received yours of the 14th inst. requesting me to partake of a public dinner at Jefferson's Hall.—My absence has been so protracted that I feel obliged to leave here to-morrow; and, therefore, without adverting to other considerations, am compelled to decline the honor of your invitation.

Be pleased, gentlemen to present to those associated with you, my thanks for this kindness, and to accept personally my acknowledgments for the flattering manner in which it has been communicated. It gives me pleasure to add, that, in the darkest hours, from my friends here, I have always experienced a confidence which has largely contributed to sustain and invigorate my efforts in that course of public life I believed most conducive to the public interests; and which confidence, allow me to say, on parting, whether our separation be long or short, it will be one object of my ambition never to forfeit. With much respect and regard, your friend and obedient servant, Levi Woodbury.

Dinner to Mr. McDuffie. The following are some of the toasts drank at the public dinner lately given to this gentleman at Charleston, S. C. They are "full of fight."

Reform—Its flame has been kindled in the old world, may it not be extinguished in the new.

The constitution of the United States—Those who most love this sacred covenant, are least prepared to submit to its violations.

The general government—Not for what it is—the parent of oppression; but for what it ought to be, the preserver of liberty.

The cause of the south—Founded on the eternal principles of justice, it must go on "conquering and to conquer."

The hon. George McDuffie—If devoted patriotism and commanding eloquence could have availed aught against cupidity and injustice—we might have united to our present offering of gratitude the celebration of a noble victory of free trade and constitutional liberty.

South Carolina—"She should do her duty, and leave the consequences to God."

The reserved rights of the states—Valueless, unless they include "the mode and measure of redress" as well as the right to judge of their infraction.

The tariff in its effects on the south—The canker of the worm may be seen in the withering of the flower.

The plantation states—Their agriculture has given to our commerce its best support—their resistance to usurpation has afforded, and will continue to afford to the union, its best security.

By Elias Horry, esq. president of the day: John C. Calhoun—A distinguished son of South Carolina; honest, wise, talented—in office dignified. He has been tried in the balance, and found not wanting.

By B. E. Bee: In the language of our eloquent guest, "just, equal, and equitable taxation—The only principle by which this union can or ought to be supported."

By col. A. P. Butler, of Edgefield: South Carolina as she was, when animated by the spirit of Gadsden, she knew how to resist oppression.

By J. Banskett: The conservative principle of the federal union—and, in its application, effectual in resisting federal aggression.

By J. Terry, esq.: The memory of the deceased patriots of Charleston, who led us through the perils of the revolution—their sons have shown, and will show themselves worthy of so noble an ancestry.

By W. B. Seabrook: The right to resist the exactions of tyranny—the Alpha and Omega of a freeman's politics.

By William Hilliard: The state of South Carolina—Among the first and foremost in asserting, vindicating, and defending the principles of civil and religious liberty; may she be the last to abandon, or to pervert the great principles by which alone these liberties can be perpetuated.

By Myer M. Cohen, one of the committee: The miscalled American System—it asks to hew off our hands, and promises to remunerate us by a pretence of—cheap gloves?

By general Hayne: The disciples of liberty throughout the world—not those who profess her principles, but who act on her precepts—"faith without works is dead."

By R. J. Turnbull: The state rights party of South Carolina—their efforts are "not to make, but to prevent revolution—to take solid securities—to settle doubtful questions—to correct anomalies in our law (constitution)—in the stable, fundamental parts of our constitution—to make no revolution, no, nor any alteration at all."

By col. Bryan: The rights of the state—wisdom to perceive, and courage to defend them.

By D. J. Waring: The tariff laws being passed, the sooner we pass THEM OVER the better.

By S. Elliott: The hon. S. D. Miller and his three boxes—if he be as well supported by the jury box, and, if needs be, by the cartouch box, as he has been by the ballot box, his aspirations for the honor and prosperity of his native state must be finally fulfilled.

By John B. Irving; Nullification—the only rightful remedy of an injured state. In itself, peaceful and constitutional. It can never lead to disunion or civil war, unless an unjust government should grow so bold in usurpation, as to seal its tyranny with blood.

Free masonry. It seems probable from what we see in some of the papers, that a proposition will be submitted to the Grand Lodge of New York, at its ensuing session, to dissolve itself—to relieve the public excitement and restore harmony among the people.

An anti-masonic state convention has been held at Boston—nearly 300 delegates attending. Mr. Adams, late president of the United States, visited the meeting, on the special invitation of the chairman of the state committee.

While on this subject we may add the following extract from the will of the late venerable and good Isaiah Thomas, L. L. D.

"Whereas in my will I have bequeathed to the Massachusetts Grand Lodge and to other Masonic Lodges, certain legacies, it is now my will that if the officers and members of either of said lodges to whom I have given legacies, should (from the unjust and wicked excitement raised against free masons, evidently for political purposes, by self-created inquisitions, formed of persons styling themselves anti-masons, aided by a few, some of whom I must believe to be unworthy and unprincipled members of the fraternity of free masons) determine it to be prudent wholly to cease to meet as a lodge, and to give up their charter in order to preserve peace in the community, or for any other cause to meet as a lodge, then the legacy I have bequeathed to such lodge or chapter mentioned in my said will or in this codicil, I now give the same to the American Antiquarian society, to be added to the funds of said society, to aid in supporting a librarian who shall devote his whole time to the institution—and also to aid the expenditure of sending a missionary to the western states to collect antiquaries for preservation in the cabinet of said society.

I give to the American Antiquarian society, (what I esteem a most precious relic) a small lock of hair from the head of the saviour of his country, gen. Geo. Washington, at the time of his decease.

Harrisburg, May 28. The anti-masonic convention assembled at this place on Wednesday last. About thirty counties were represented by sixty-five delegates. Gen. W. Piper, of Bedford, now a member of the state senate, was appointed president, and gen. John Burrows, of Lycoming, and Samuel Baldwin, of Chester county, vice presidents; Wm. W. Irwin, of Alleghany, and Samuel P. Charles, of Lancaster, appointed as secretaries. The convention adjourned on Thursday, after appointing 28 delegates to the anti-masonic convention to be holden in Baltimore in September next, and adopting sundry resolutions, and an address to the people of the state. This address is to be published with the names of all the delegates attached: it recognizes JOSEPH RITNER as the anti-masonic candidate for governor. A resolution was offered by Mr. McConnell, the editor of the Huntingdon Courier, in effect instructing the national convention to give no support to Mr. Clay. The resolution was evidently a firebrand, and did not pass until it was modified, by striking out that statesman's name. [Intelligencer.

POPULATION. From the Boston Centinel—communicated. Messrs. Editors: In looking over Martin's London Magazine, for the year 1755-56, I was struck with the comparative view of the population of the British provinces in North America, at that time, with that of the United States, in 1830. It may perhaps, be amusing to your readers, and the curious in such matters, to know what the population of this continent was in those days, I have, therefore, made a copy of it, which I hand to you for publication, if you deem it worthy of a place in your columns.

In Nova Scotia, besides the military, the English inhabitants were found to be:	5,000
New Hampshire	30,000
Massachusetts	200,000
Rhode Island	35,000
Connecticut	80,000
New York	90,000
New Jersey	50,000
Pennsylvania	250,000
Maryland	85,000
Virginia	90,000
North Carolina	35,000
South Carolina	30,000
Georgia	6,000

LADIES' FAIRS. A New York paper gives the following as the remarks of a Quaker lady, concerning a description of fairs that have become very common:

"In truth, what can be more unfeminine, than the situation of a well educated female while under this high state of excitement, at one of these fairs. Just look at the bold look, and the coarse and decided tone and manner of the one who is thus engaged. She bargains and sells like a 'vendue master' in a country village, or like a market woman in the public market, and has to submit to the coarse jokes and vulgar gaze of those persons who ought never to approach her but with respect and deference. A woman in one night at one of these fairs, loses more of the respect of her inferiors, than a whole life of dignified reserve can restore. A low vulgar fellow, who stands before her and exchanges words—jokes in fact—for she must be pleasant and winning in her manners, or she will not sell her wares—will ever after consider himself on a par with her. He never can get it out of his head that he once bandied words with her, and bought a glass of lemonade of her, for which, under the cloak of religious motives, she charged him twice as much as he could have purchased it for at a common—may I say it—tavern.

DEATH OF COL. ROCHESTER. The Rochester papers of the 15th ult. announce the death, early on the morning previous, of the venerable col. Nathaniel Rochester, a patriarch from whom that flourishing town derives its name. He was in the 80th year of his age. He had labored for some time under a chronic disease, the severe attacks of which had latterly been suspended by a painful cutaneous affection. His demise was expected from day to day. He was to be buried on the 19th, in St. Luke's church, the vestry of which, with the trustees of the village, the public bodies, and citizens of the town, had passed resolutions to pay funeral honors to his memory. After being distinguished in the staff of the North Carolina militia, before the breaking out of the revolution, col. R. was at the age of 28, one of the committee of safety in Orange county, and, in the same year became a member of the provisional congress of that state. As major of militia, he shortly after distinguished himself by capturing gen. McDonald, with five hundred Scotch recruits, raised by him among the Jacobite refugees in Cumberland county. In the ensuing year, he was raised to the rank of colonel, and commissary general of military stores and clothing, and was a member of the convention by whom the state government of North Carolina was organized. His health suffered from the weight of his duty as commissary. He was subsequently elected a member of assembly and clerk of the court. Embarking afterwards in mercantile pursuits, he settled at Hagerstown, Maryland, where he was successively appointed postmaster, one of the judges of Washington county, sheriff, and president of the Hagerstown bank. In 1800 he made his first purchase of lands in this state, in connection with three other gentlemen, and with them, in 1802, purchased what was called the 100 acre lot, the present site of Rochester, to which he removed eight years afterwards. With his memory is identified the almost unparalleled increase of that town in prosperity. In 1816 he was elected president of the Utica branch bank. In 1817 he served as presidential elector, and in 1822 was a member of our assembly. For a short time he held the presidency of the bank of Rochester, but latterly, retired from active public business, and waiting with christian faith and hope for the termination of his career, he has lived in the quiet enjoyment of his domestic circle, and of the love and respect of those around, who looked up to him as a father. We have drawn this brief sketch from a notice in the Rochester Daily Advertiser. [N. Y. Com. Adv.

THE LATE ISAIAH THOMAS. The Worcester Spy publishes a part of the will of Dr. Thomas, in which he gives a great number of legacies, to a large amount, to public institutions. THE POLISH COMMANDER IN CHIEF. General John Skrzynecki was born in Galicia, in 1787, and studied at Leopold. When the French armies entered Poland, in 1806, Skrzynecki, then nineteen years of age, left his father's house, and enlisted in the first regiment of infantry, commanded by col. Kasimir Melachowski, now general of division, who lately covered himself with so much glory. At the opening of the memorable campaign of 1809, in the grand duchy of Warsaw, under prince Joseph Poniatowski, Skrzynecki was raised to the rank of captain in the 16th regiment, then formed by prince Constantine Czartoryski. In the campaign at Moscow, in 1813, he was appointed chief of battalion, and in 1813 and 1814 he gave repeated proofs of his talent and intrepidity. It was in the hollow square of his battalion that Napoleon took shelter at Arcissur Aube, when the regiments of the young guard gave way. The Polish soldiers transferred the precious deposite to the French corps, which arrived soon after, and Skrzynecki charging the enemy under the eyes of the emperor, beat them back with considerable loss. Appointed knight of the legion of honor, and of the military order of Poland, Skrzynecki returned to his country, with the remnants of the Polish troops, and obtained the command of the 8th regiment of infantry, in the second brigade of general Ignacio Blumer, the same who received eighteen balls through his body in the night of the 29th November.

THE RUSSIAN COMMANDER IN CHIEF. Field marshal count Diebitsch is a little, fat, plethoric looking man, something less than five feet high; he has a very large head, with long black hair, small piercing eyes, and a complexion of the deepest scarlet, alike expressive of his devotion to cold punch, and of a certain irascibility of temper which has elicited from the troops, to his proud title of kabalcansky, or the trans-balcanian, the additional one of the samavar, or the tea-kettle. I have said that count Diebitsch owes his fortune to his face; the sequel will show how. He is the second son of a Prussian officer, who was on the staff of Frederick. At an early age he entered a Russian army, and obtained a company in the imperial guard. It was at this time that the king of Prussia came on a visit to the Russian autocrat, and it so happened that it was captain Diebitsch's tour of duty to mount guard on the royal visiter. The emperor foresaw the ridiculous figure the little captain would cut at the head of the tall grenadiers, and desired a friend delicately to hint to him that it would be agreeable to his imperial majesty if he would resign the guard to a brother officer. Away goes the friend, meets the little captain, and bluntly tells him that the emperor wishes him not to mount guard with his company, for, added he, l' empereur dit, et il faut convenir, que vos traits l' exterieur terrible. This "delicate hint," that his exterior was too terrible to be seen at the head of troops not remarkable for good looks, so irritated the future hero of the Balkan, that, with his natural warmth of temper, he begged to resign, not his tour of duty only, but the commission he held in the Russian army; and being a Prussian, and not a Russian subject, desired to be allowed to return to his native country. The emperor Alexander, who appears to have formed a just estimation of his talents, easily found means to pacify him, by giving him promotion in the line. He, subsequently made himself so useful in that part of the service where beauty was not indispensable, that the late emperor placed him at the head of the general staff, which situation he held when the reigning emperor appointed him to succeed count Wittgenstein in the chief command.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

From London papers to the 24th April, inclusive, received at New York.

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

The great question of a reform in parliament was warmly and ably discussed in the house of commons on the 18th and 19th April. The chief speakers were lord John Russell, gen. Gascoyne, the chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. Hawkins, sir Robert Wilson, Messrs. Stanley, O'Connell and Hunt. Sir Robert Wilson was against the bill, and Mr. O'Connell was called to order, and handsomely apologized for certain expressions used in the heat of debate in favor of it. At last, on the 19th April, the house divided on the question—for an amendment offered by gen. Gascoyne (which went to destroy the bill) 299—against the amendment 291; against the bill and against ministers 8. The decision was received with gloomy silence, on the part both of members and strangers.

On the morning of the 20th April, it was stated that the ministers had tendered their resignations, but the king refused to receive them, and soon resolved on the course that he would pursue in this matter.

On the 21st there was a very stormy debate in the house of commons. Sir R. Vyvyan announced a rumor of an intended dissolution of parliament. Lord Althrop said it was not the intention of ministers to proceed further with the bill. Mr. Robinson thought ministers acted wisely in recommending a dissolution of parliament. Sir C. Forbes declared that no one would dare to recommend that measure. At a late hour, the house adjourned against the wishes of the ministry, who on this vote had a majority of 22 against them. Because of certain bills before the house, the adjournment was regarded as a "stoppage of supplies," or withholding of ordinary appropriations. On the 22nd, the ministers, in a body, waited on the king, and declared their inability to carry on the government, unless a new parliament was convoked. The king instantly decided to dissolve the parliament in person; and such was the promptness with which it was done, that most of the ceremonies usual on the attendance of the king were, of necessity, omitted. All was confusion. Some had on their state robes and some were without them. The rumor having gone abroad, the houses and their lobbies were soon crowded to excess. In one hour, (at 1 o'clock) orders were sent to the house of lords that the king would come in person and prorogue the parliament, &c. Prayers were read at half past two by the bishop of Exeter, and the following proceedings took place, which, because of their extraordinary nature, we give somewhat at length, from the London papers.

A noble lord presented a petition from one of the royal burghs of Scotland, against this reform.—(A laugh.)

On the motion of earl Mansfield, it was resolved that lord Shaftesbury do take the chair, when the house went into a committee on a bill, the name of which we could not learn.

The earl of Mansfield said it was quite evident for what purpose they were now assembled.

The duke of Richmond rose to speak to order. He would move the standing order of the house, that peers should take their places, as he saw a noble earl seated near a junior baron.

Lord Lyndhurst said the noble duke was in error.—(Here the clamor from the baron's bench, near the bar, was so great that we could not catch a word.)

The duke of Richmond rose to order. The noble and learned baron had used offensive language.

The marquess of Londonderry rose to order, and said it was a miserable shift to prevent persons from expressing their opinions on this coup d'etat. (Cheers and laughter from the ministerial benches.) If the noble duke wished to put himself at the head of this coup d'etat, his object was to prevent the expression of their opinions.

The marquis of Clanricarde.—Is this to order? (Clamors, mixed with cheers and cries for lord Wharncliffe, and the order of the day.)

Lord Wharncliffe moved the order of the day, that an address be presented to his majesty not to dissolve the parliament under the present state of excitement both in England and Ireland. He said—

The lord chancellor said he had never heard any objection to the king dissolving parliament when the other house of parliament had taken the unprecedented step of refusing the supplies. (Cheers and tremendous clamor, amid cries of "the king," whose arrival was announced by the loud and joyous shouts of the people outside the house, and the firing of the minute guns in the park.)

Lord Mansfield had heard from the noble lord, that it was the undoubted right of the crown to dissolve parliament when the other house of parliament had taken what he called, perhaps from his ignorance of our history, the unprecedented step of stopping the supplies. They stood in the most awful situation; he accused ministers of weakness, of conspiring against the safety of the state, by making the king a party to his own destruction. (Hear.) He had not expressed his opinion on the reform bill, because he thought it would have never come to this house, but that it would have closed the number of their abortive plans—the most abortive ever attempted by an incapable ministry. (Hear, hear.) What did the petitions on their lordships' table pray for? Was it a dissolution of parliament? No, a reformed parliament was what they wanted. The reduction of taxation, of the army, the appropriation of church property to the use of the state; they also demanded universal suffrage and the vote by ballot. He (lord Mansfield) had, he rejoiced to think, advised his majesty on this important subject; he stated to the king that if he gave his assent to a dissolution for the sake of this bill, it was a measure so pregnant with danger that he was certain an attack would be made on the credit of the country; first on the privileges and then on the existence of this house, and lastly on the privileges of the crown itself (hear); privileges which were inseparably connected with the happiness of the people. (Hear.) He rejoiced that he had spoken in a time of great clamor.

Here the entrance of his majesty put an end to the discussion. One or two of their lordships, however, allowed a clamorous expression or two to reach the royal ear.

His majesty took his seat on the throne, wearing the crown and sceptre, and surrounded by a numerous body of the royal household; he looked remarkably well, and wore beneath the royal robes the uniform of an admiral.

The commons were summoned to attend at the bar, preceded by sir Thomas Tyrwhitt and the speaker. About 100 members were in attendance in the small space below the bar. They rushed in so tumultuously that the speaker was twice or thrice obliged to call them to order.

The speaker, on reaching the bar, brought up the civil list bill and several others, prefacing his doing so with a brief address to the king.

The royal assent was given in the customary manner to these bills.

The sight at this moment was most imposing; the three estates of the realm, on perhaps the most important occasion in the history of the country. It was half past three before this preliminary business was gone through.

His majesty then read in a firm tone of voice the following

Speech from the throne.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I have come to meet you for the purpose of proroguing this parliament with a view to its immediate dissolution.

"I have been induced to resort to this measure, for the purpose of ascertaining the sense of my people, in the way in which it can be most constitutionally and authentically expressed, on the expediency of making such changes in the representation as circumstances may appear to require, and which shall be founded on the acknowledged principles of the constitution, and may tend at once to uphold the just rights and prerogatives of the crown, and to give security to the liberties of my people.

"Gentlemen of the house of commons.

"I thank you for the provision which you have made for the maintenance of the honor and dignity of the crown; and I offer you my special acknowledgments for the arrangements which you have made for the state and comfort of my royal consort.

"I have also to thank you for the supplies which you have furnished for the public service, and I have observed with satisfaction that you have endeavored to introduce the strictest economy in every branch of that service, and I trust that the attention of the new parliament, which I shall forthwith direct to be called, will be applied unceasingly to that important subject.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I am happy to inform you that the friendly intercourse which subsists between myself and foreign powers affords the best hope of the continuance of peace, to preserve which my most anxious endeavors shall be constantly directed.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"In resolving to have recourse to the sense of my people, in the present circumstances of the country, I have been influenced only by a paternal anxiety for the contentment and happiness of my subjects—to promote which I rely confidently on your continued and zealous assistance.

"My pleasure is, that this parliament be prorogued till Tuesday, the 10th of May."

The lord chancellor then rose and said—"It is his majesty's pleasure that this parliament be prorogued to Tuesday, the 10th of May; and the parliament is prorogued to that day accordingly."

The members of the house of commons instantly retired.

Upon the proceedings in the house of lords, the Atlas remarks—

"For the first time in our day, and, perhaps, in a more daring spirit than any of which our annals presented an example, the house of peers assumed the appearance of a disorganized popular assembly. In the most unsettled periods of our history, there can hardly be found such an instance of extraordinary and sudden abandonment of the deliberative character. The courtesies of society were violated on all sides, and personalities, amounting almost to ruder modes of expression, passed amongst the lords during the clamor. Instances of opprobrious language have been communicated to us, which, however, we decline publishing. The confusion, clamor and dismay that filled the house of commons were equally remarkable; but there we are more accustomed to meet the unembellished reflection of vulgar reality: while in the house of peers we are used to see poor humanity tricked out so daintily, that a deviation on the part of their lordships, from the fashionable into the every-day nature, awakens in us a still greater degree of admiration.

[We are sorry to add, that the senate of the United States, often converted into something like a tap-room club of latter years—has been as disorderly as the house of lords seems to have been. But we hope that such doings of our reformers will be reformed.]

In the house of commons April 22, the speaker attired in his state robes, entered at 2 o'clock—between 4 and 500 members were present, and the body of the house was crammed with people. Sir R. Vyvyan made an inflammatory speech—he loudly denounced the intention to dissolve parliament, and said "It is folly to disguise from ourselves that we are on the eve of a revolution," &c. He proceeded at considerable length amidst loud cries of "hear," and tumultuous shouts of applause or disapprobation. Several other members spoke, or rather attempted to speak—the cries of "chair, chair, chair!—order, order, order!" with the bustle among the members, presented "such a scene as never was witnessed in the memory of the oldest man within the walls of St. Stephen." While the disorder yet lasted, though somewhat subdued, the sound of cannon announced the arrival of the king at the house of lords. Sir R. Vyvyan, Sir R. Peel, lord Althrope and several others, rose upon their feet at once to speak—cheers and groans, cries of order—shame—hear—calls for persons, &c. made up a scene which is said "to beggar description." At last, Sir R. Peel got an opportunity to make a few remarks—he did not complain of the dissolution of parliament, but of the manner in which it was done. With reference to reform he deprecated "the despotism of democracy"—he relied however on a combination of intelligence and property to keep down that evil. He was proceeding in his attack on the ministry, and said—"If we are dissolved"—when the appearance of sir Thomas Tyrwhitt, usher of the black rod, spared the hon. baronet the necessity of concluding his sentence. "I am commanded by his majesty, said sir Thomas, "to command the immediate attendance of this honorable house in the house of lords, to hear his majesty's royal assent to several bills; and also his majesty's speech for the prorogation of parliament."

At twenty-five minutes to four, the speaker returned to the house, and intimated that having been summoned to attend his majesty in the other house, his majesty was pleased to pronounce from the throne a gracious speech, declaring the present parliament prorogued, with a view to an immediate dissolution.

The speaker then read the royal speech, and the members, without the slighest demonstration of feeling, left the house.

FRANCE.

We hear of no new disturbances, of any importance, in this country.

The French loan of 120,000,000 francs has been taken by the house of Rothschild, in conjunction with several other capitalists, at 84¼, payable in 10 monthly payments, with 4 per cent. discount.

In London, on the 21st, the scrip sold as high as 4¼ premium; but receded on the 22d to 2a2¼.

Prorogation of the French chambers.

The king on 20th April, set out from the Palais royal on horseback at half past twelve o'clock; he was dressed in a splendid military uniform, and surrounded by a large cortege of marshals.

Salutes of artillery announced the arrival of the king and the royal family.

The grand deputation went to meet them. The sight of the chamber was extremely striking, and the most lively acclamations welcomed his arrival. A few moments after the sitting was opened his majesty delivered the following speech:—

"Peers and deputies—Eight months have passed since in this hall, and in your presence, I accepted the throne to which I was called by the national wish, of which you were the organs, and swore, 'faithfully to observe the constitutional charter, with the modifications expressed in the declaration of 7th August, 1830, to govern only by the laws, and according to the laws, to cause good and exact justice to be done to every one according to his right, and to act in all things solely with a view to the interest, the happiness, and the glory of the French people.' I told you then, 'that profoundly sensible of the whole extent of the duties which this great act imposed on me, I was conscious that I should fulfil them, and that it was with entire conviction that I accepted the compact of alliance which was proposed to me.

"I take pleasure in repeating to you those solemn words which I pronounced on the 9th of August, because they are at once the invariable rule of my conduct and an expression of the principles according to which I desire to be judged by France and by posterity.

"Your session opened in the midst of great dangers. The dreadful conflict in which the nation had just defended its laws, its rights and its liberties, against an unjust aggression, had broken the bonds of power, and it was necessary to secure the maintenance of order by the re-establishment of authority and of the public force. France was covered in an instant with national guards, spontaneously formed by the patriotic zeal of all the citizens, and organized by the authority of the government. That of Paris appeared firm and more numerous than ever, and this admirable institution offered us at the same time the means of stifling anarchy in the interior, and of repelling all foreign aggressions, to which our national independence might have been exposed. At the same time with the national guard, our brave army was recomposed, and France may now look upon it with pride. Never was the levy of our young soldiers effected with so much promptness and facility; and such is the patriotic ardor with which they are animated, that they are scarcely ranged under those banners—those glorious colors which retrace so many recollections dear to the country—when they can no longer be distinguished from our veterans, and at no time were the French troops finer, better disciplined, and, I say it with confidence, animated by a better spirit than they are now.

"The labors of great organization have not slackened the accomplisment of the promises of the charter. Already the greater part have been realized by the laws which you have voted, and to which I have given my sanction. I have followed with solicitude the course of your important labors, the whole of which attests enlightened views, a zeal and a courage which recommend to history the period which they have occupied. France will not forget your devotion to the country in the moment of danger, and I shall always preserve the remembrance of the assistance which I have found in you, when the wants of the state made it my duty to claim it.

"The next session, I feel confident, will only continue your work by completing it, and preserving in it the character of that great event of July, which may secure for the future, by legal means, all the ameliorations which the country has a right to expect, and which may separate for ever the destinies of France from a dynasty excluded by the national will.

"After the shock which the social body had undergone, it was difficult not to experience some new crises, and we have passed through some very painful ones during your session; but thanks to the constant efforts which you have made to second mine; thanks to the energetic devotedness of the population, to its patriotism, and to the indefatigable zeal of the national guard, and of the troops of the line, all have passed through them happily; and if we have had to regret some afflicting disorders, at least the assent of the country applauded the intentions of the government. The internal peace of the kingdom has been gradually confirmed and the strength of the goverment has progressively increased, in proportion as the reign of the laws resumed its empire, and as the public safety was consolidated. My government will continue to pursue with a firm step this course, in which you have so worthily supported it.

"My ministers have constantly acquainted you with the state of our diplomatic relations, and you have been informed of the circumstances which have determined me to make extraordinary armaments. Like me, you have recognised the necessity of them, and you will also participate in my sincere desire to see them speedily cease. The assurances which I receive from all quarters of the pacific disposition of foreign powers, give me the hope that their armies and ours may soon be reduced to the proportions of the state of peace; but still the negotiations which are on foot have not acquired the development necessary to render the reduction possible; the attitude of France must be strong, and we must persevere in the measures which we have taken to make her respected, for peace is safe only with honor.

"Our support, and the concurrence of the great powers of Europe, have secured the independence of Belgium, and its separation from Holland. If I have refused to yield to the wishes of the Belgic people, who offered me the crown for my second son, it is because I believed that the refusal was dictated by the interests of France as well as by those of Belgium itself. But the people have peculiar rights to our interests, and it is of importance to us that it should be happy and free."

The dukes of Orleans and Nemours stood at each side of the throne. His majesty remained nearly an hour in the chamber. The president then read the prorogation, which was until the 15th of June next. The king, both in his way to the chamber and on his return, was loudly cheered by the people.

RUSSIA.

St. Petersburg, April 11. His majesty has been pleased to address the following rescript to the senate:—

"In consequence of the troubles which have broken out in some districts of the government of Wilna, we think it necessary to declare the government of Courland, adjoining those districts, in a state of war, and we confer on the governor-general, lieutenant-general baron Pahlen, authority to act in that government with all the powers and prerogatives of the commander of a detached corps of the army in time of war, in order to repel all attempts which the rebels might make against the said government, and to maintain there good order according to the laws.

"The senate will immediately take the necessary measures to communicate this our decision to those whom it may concern."

BELGIUM

Remains disturbed and unsettled as it was, at former accounts. Many reports are circulated, but nothing worthy of special notice has happened. Civil dissentions prevailed, and no present hope of a regular government existed.

SPAIN.

This country is, in every way, disordered. Terror pervades the land—executions are numerous—the finances are in a miserable state, the troops discontented, and a general explosion expected.

SWITZERLAND.

The Helvetic diet has acceded to the request of prince Metternich, who demands the general disarming of the Swiss. The decision has excited discontent in many minds, several cantons refusing to submit to a measure, which nothing can authorise, as the cantons only armed to cause their neutrality to be respected.

TURKEY.

A combination against the sultan, formidable and dangerous, is, it appears, in progress. The Silesian Gazette states that Mustapha pacha had summoned all the principal inhabitants of Scutari, and asked them whether they would, as men, yield to the grand vizier, or prepare to fight for their liberty? They determined on the latter alternative, and are actively preparing for the impending invasion.

POLAND.

The Poles appear to have been successful in several minor affairs, and the following shews that a grand victory was lately won—

"Head-quarters at Siedlec, April 10, 1831, 9 P.M.

"To the national government

"I have great satisfaction in announcing to the government that the Polish army obtained a considerable victory yesterday. We have taken several cannons, and 3,000 or 4,000 prisoners, amongst whom are nearly 300 officers of different ranks. General Promdzynski, commanding a separate corps, covered himself with glory. The advanced hour of the evening does not permit me to give a more detailed report.

(Signed) SKRZYNECKI."

The Poles much wanted cannon at the beginning of the revolution, but they have captured a sufficiency, and have 40 pieces in reserve. Some of the guns that have fallen into their hands were favorites of the Russians, having been in the campaigns against France and Turkey. The soldiers called them their "grandmothers." It is hard to ascertain the truth, but it seems manifest that the Poles have gained many important advantages, and that the Russians have lost many men,* and were much embarrassed by the perseverance and courage of this patriotic people. The invasion, because of the season, was also untavorable to them—but still, the Russians are powerful, and were concentrating their forces, for decisive operations.

Lithuania and several other provinces, appear in a full state of revolt—making a common cause with Poland, proper.

Austria and Prussia were lining their frontiers with soldiers. It is reported that Austria, Prussia and Russia will hold a congress at Troppau, in Silesia.

PORTUGAL.

The tyrant Miguel still carries on his measures with a high hand. The following is an example of the mercies of his government—

A Frenchman, named Bonhomme, for some alleged offence against the Portuguese government, was sentenced to a fearful and ignominious punishment, which was carried into execution to its whole extent. A correspondent of a French paper thus describes it.

"He had an iron collar round his neck four inches broad, from which to his right leg was fastened a heavy chain. His hands were tied behind him with a thick cord, which also served as a girth to his body, which was entirely stripped of covering. At each place at which he was made to stop, the sentence was read aloud by the officer of justice, who raised his voice when he proclaimed the prisoner to be a Frenchman and born at Paris. After reading the sentence, the executioner, who carried a bottle of wine, drank a glass, as if to sustain him in the duty; he then lashed the unfortunate Frenchman in a most barbarous manner. This punishment lasted several hours; the prisoner was then conducted round Saint Julien, and thrown into a dungeon, there to remain until his departure for Africa. It is now perfectly well known that this sentence was executed by a superior order."

Many other provocations had been given to France, and not a few to England, in various ways. The English and French consuls were acting in concert, to redress the grievances of their countrymen, but seem to have been treated with insolence. Things had proceeded so far, that the French consul, specially authorised, had demanded certain answers in eight hours. They were not given, and he directed all Frenchmen to be in readiness to abandon the country, immediately. The latest accounts say that the French consul had left Lisbon. He is said grievously to have offended Miguel by addressing him as "Prince Regent."

ITALY.

This country is in a feverish state—but no important events have recently happened, since Austria put down the semblance of movements in favor of liberty.

COLOMBIA.

There has been yet another revolution in Colombia—that is, one general has gotten the better of another general. Gen. Obanda, a new hand we believe at the revolutionary bellows, (for we do not recollect to have heard of him before),* has taken possession of Bogota, and re-instated vice president Marquesina, to give the formula of the civil power to the decrees of the sword. We hear of a "victory of the people" at Carthagena, in a truce between the generals Montilla and Luque. Bah!

CHINA.

Chinese Tartary has been invaded by the Mahometan hordes dwelling on its borders. It is impossible to ascertain the extent of this war; but it seems that the emperor has a strong force on his frontier. Certain public works had been stopped in the neighborhood of Canton, because of military operations in Chinese Tartary.

WEST INDIES.

There seems to have been a general insurrection of the slaves at Jago de Cuba. It is said that the governor, at the head of all the troops stationed there, had marched against the insurrectionists, and in an attack which took place in the vicinity of St. Jago, a very great number of the blacks were killed, estimated from 2,000 to 4,000. This victory, it was supposed, would completely quell all disturbances. The city of St. Jago had been left by the governor under the care of the citizens.

BRAZIL.

The late emperor, empress and the queen of Portugal, had embarked at Rio Janeiro, in the British sloop of war Volage, for England or France—and a baby 3 or 4 years old, had been proclaimed as Don Pedro II. The marques Carabelles, Francisco de Lima and M. Vergueiro, have been appointed regents, and they have proclaimed a general amnesty. All these proceedings have taken place without bloodshed—Pedro, finding that both the army and people were against him, gave up his emperorship at once.

PARAGUAY.

The tyrant Francia has, at last, liberated Mr. Bonpland, who had been detained nine years. He does not appear to have been otherwise ill used. There is an interesting letter from him which we shall publish.

AFRICA.

We have some accounts of the expedition of Lander, an Englishman, to discover the course of the Niger—he, and the remains of his companions having arrived at Rio Janeiro. They reached the point where Park was murdered and recovered his manuscripts, &c. and here they were obliged to stop, though within 15 days journey of Timbucto. They embarked upon and descended the Niger westward, and, after being captured and made slaves, finally reached the bay of Benin, by one of the branches of that great river.

LATER ACCOUNTS.

London papers of May 1.

In Great Britain and Ireland the elections for a new parliament were going on. The results were yet only partially known—but all the changes that had been made were favorable to reform—ten had been gained from the anti-reformers, equal to 20 on the vote.—Wherever the people seem to have had influence, the candidates friendly to reform were carried as it were by acclamation. The opinion is entertained that the ministers will have a large and decided majority in the house of commons. The dissolution of parliament had made the king very popular. Hunt is re-elected.

British stocks, April 30, evening—3 per cent. consols 78 7-8 to 79.

The members elected to parliament from the city of London are alderman Waithman, frame work-kniter;

*Said to amount to 60,000!

*Was he not concerned in the assassination of Sucre?

alderman Wood, fish-monger; alderman Thompson, iron-monger; and alderman Venables. stationer.

Nothing important has taken place in France. Many emigrants were arriving at Algiers, it having been determined that it shall be a French colony.

We have some further news from Poland. There has been several gallant affairs between the Poles and their invaders, generally in favor of the former, and the Russians, collecting their forces, it was expected, would endeavor to bring about a general engagement. The Polish general Devernichi has much distinguished himself—a gallant second of the commander-in-chief, Skrzynecki. Marshal Diebitsch appears to have lost much of his popularity as a commander, and it is hoped that the laurels which he gathered in Turkey, may wither in Poland.

There is a report, we fear unfounded, that the Poles had totally defeated the Russians in a general battle, who suffered an immense loss, and were dispersed

CONVENTION OF MANUFACTURERS.

Proceedings of a convention of delegates, appointed by persons interested in the growth and manufacture of wool, held at Clinton Hall, New York.

Wednesday, May 18, 1831. The convention was organized by the appointment of the hon. Nathan Williams, of Utica, as president, and Messrs. Henry Shaw, of Massachusetts, and Samuel D. Hubbard, of Connecticut, as secretaries.

A committee was chosen to decide on the qualification of members. Adjourned to 10 o'clock next day.

Thursday, May 19. The convention assembled agreeably to adjournment.

On motion, Resolved, That Messrs. Henry Shaw, George H. Kuhn, Jacob T. Walden, S. Newton Dexter, Samuel D. Hubbard, Sampson Almy, J. W. Pierce, Lloyd W. Wells, Lawrence Barrow and Francis Stossen, be a committee to take into consideration the expediency of forming a national association, with auxiliary branches in each state, having for its objects the procurement of statistical facts, the diffusion of information on all points relating to the national industry, and the sustaining, by united effort, that industry against foreign rivalry.

On motion, Resolved, That Peter H. Schenck, Henry Shaw, Willard Phillips, Zachariah Allen, Edward H. Robbins, J. B. Brown and Oran Thompson, be a committee to examine into the subject of the alleged frauds on the revenue. Adjourned to meet next day at 9 o'clock.

Friday, May 20. The convention assembled agreeably to adjournment. The committee to whom was referred the subject of the alleged frauds on the revenue submitted the following report, with the accompanying resolutions, which were unanimously adopted.

The committee to whom was referred the subject of frauds on the revenue, report as follows:—

By the law of 1828, all imported woollen cloths costing abroad more than fifty cents, and not over one dollar per square yard, or one dollar and fifty cents per running yard, of the common breadth, are made liable to a certain rate of duty, and cloths costing over that price are subject to a higher rate of duty. The first mentioned of these rates has been denominated that of the dollar minimum, and the next higher rate that of the two dollar and a half minimum, the duties being assessed in reference to these minimums. According to this law, a cloth costing six shillings and nine pence per running yard in England, or an equivalent price in any foreign country, is liable on importation to pay a duty on the dollar minimum, and cloths costing over that price, are liable at least, to the next higher rate of duty above mentioned.

The finer and more expensive cloths are subject to a proportionable duty, but these latter your committee do not propose particularly to notice, as no complaints have been made of any attempts to evade the duties upon them.

By a law of congress passed in 1830, all cloths falsely invoiced, with intent to defraud the revenue, were rendered liable to forfeiture. This provision is subject however to the discretion of the secretary of the treasury, as to remitting the penalty in all cases of under valuation, where he is of opinion that no fraud on the revenue was intended.

The object of the law of 1830 was to enforce that of 1828, it having been found that very extensive frauds had been committed to the prejudice of the national industry, and to the great reduction of the revenue, by invoicing and entering goods at a value much below the actual cost.

This investigation which gave rise to the law, related principally to woollens entered at the custom house in this city, and mostly, if not wholly, by foreign agents.

Sufficient information having come to the knowledge of individuals more immediately interested in this subject, that the law of 1830 had not effectually suppressed these frauds, this convention was thereupon called to inquire more particularly into their nature, their extent, and the best means of arresting them.

Your committee in the discharge of the duty assigned to them, have come into the possession of ample proof, that the information thus previously received was not without foundation, and that extensive frauds have been practised on the revenue of the country during the past year. Before stating the facts, however, it is due to candor to premise, that the committee are far from wishing to cast the slightest imputation upon the collector of this port, or to impute to the appraisers a neglect of the important duties which they have to perform—or to imply any thing to the discredit of the great body of the American merchants, who pursue an honest and honorable trade.

These complaints and the facts that they are about to state, relate mostly to the swarm of foreign importers and their agents, who may be said to infest this city.

It is a fact fully ascertained, that most of the American importers, have been obliged to relinquish the importation of cloths, of qualities which have been selling during the past year, at from three and a quarter, to four and a quarter dollars per yard in this market. This can only have arisen from the circumstance that most of the cloths imported by foreign agents, must have been invoiced below their actual value in the foreign market.

Other facts have come to the knowledge of the committee, which place the existence of these frauds beyond all question. Some of these are of such a nature, as to implicate individual character, which the committee conceive it inexpedient at this time to disclose, lest their disclosure should be premature and interfere with the ends of justice.

They have ascertained that within the six or seven months immediately previous to the first of April last, one foreign concern entered at the custom house here more than four thousand pieces, or about eighty thousand yards, of broad cloth, all of which, except about three hundred pieces, were entered at a value not exceeding six shillings and nine pence sterling, and thus paid a duty only on the dollar minimum. A very small part, if any, of this large amount of goods was entered on the vessels' manifest, as consigned to said concern, but the shipments were consigned to order. This mode of consignment is not necessarily an indication of fraud, but certainly may give facilities to it.

The most of these goods, so imported, could not in the judgment of your committee, have been purchased in the foreign market, as low as six shillings and nine pence sterling the running yard, and thus could not have been entitled to entry, except at a value on which they would have been liable to a duty at the two dollars and a half minimum.

These goods have been sold in our market at prices varying from 3¾ to 4¼ dollars for the running yard, averaging 3⅞ dollars. Respectable merchants having an intimate knowledge of the important business, and who are entitled to the fullest confidence, agree unequivocally in the statement that, during the same period, goods of similar quality could not have been purchased in the foreign market, except at a price which would have made them liable to the rate of duty paid on the two dollars and a half minimum. Thus it appears that while the honest American merchant could not import into the country, goods of the description above mentioned, and sell them at a living profit, the foreign agents plentifully supplied the market with cloths at all prices between 3¼ and 4¼ dollars per yard, which if they really cost but 6*s.* 9*d.* sterling the yard in the English market, must have yielded on the average, to the importer, the enormous profit of from 50 to 60 per cent. The improbability of this is so palpable, that your committee cannot for one moment think that there is the least ground for supposing that such cloths could have been purchased at any price which would have entitled them to entry under the one dollar minimum.

Indications of this system of evading duties present themselves in many directions. Thus at the time of the committee's commencing these inquiries, one of the first things that attracted their attention, was an advertisement by the marshal of this district, of a sale of a parcel of woollen cloths, seized for an attempt to enter them fraudulently at the one dollar minimum.

Some of your committee, in company with a very respectable and extensive importer of cloths, examined several packages of cloths which had been stopped at the custom house, in consequence of an attempt to evade the legal duties. These cloths were invoiced as having cost not over 6*s* 9*d.* sterling the running yard. The committee and the importer who accompanied them, were fully satisfied on examination, that these cloths could not have been purchased in the English market under the prices of from 7*s.* 6*d.* to 9*s.* for some packages; 8*s.* to 10*s.* for others; and 10*s.* to 10*s.* 6*d* for others.

Another striking fact affords additional evidence of this fraudulent system. It has been the practice with some importers in this city, to remove the marks and numbers from all their cloths, as soon as the cloths come into their possession. The only motive for such a practice, is too obvious to require that it should be particularly stated.

Your committee have been led to inquire into the cause, why so large a quantity of such cloth, which would have been scarce if the fair duty had been paid, should have escaped the eyes of the appraisers, as literally to have overstocked the market; no cloths having been more plenty than those at prices between three and four dollars per yard. They have ascertained that the collector had, in the spirit of accommodation that is characteristic of him, been pursuaded by the importers to order one package from the invoice to the public store for examination, without designating it, leaving it for the custom house officer on board the ship to send the first that should come to hand; this mode was practised to accommodate some of the importers, who had, as your committee were informed, made great complaints of the delay, vexation and trouble to which they were exposed by having the packets designated. Such number, it seems, being rarely or never at hand.

The package, therefore, which such importer would be very likely to place first to the view of the officer, he would probably take great care should be one which was fairly invoiced. This suspicion is confirmed by the circumstance, that of a large number of entries made at the custom house by one concern, all the packages of cloths sent to the public stores for examination, were invoiced at the two dollar and a half minimum, while more than four-fifths of the other packages of the same invoices were put down in the invoices, as costing under the dollar minimum.

Your committee learn that on the discovery of the abuse of this indulgence, it was suspended, and most, if not all the cloths that are now entered and invoiced as coming at the dollar minimum, are sent to the public store for examination. The result is, that very many of these are estimated by the public appraisers as being undervalued in the invoice, and are now under detention.

It is also a circumstance worthy of notice, that some importers have been peculiarly unfortunate in not having invoices, since the collector has determined on sending all of the dollar minimum cloths to the public stores; these cloths have consequently to be entered under appraisement, and your committee are informed that a very considerable portion of them are appraised at such prices as to bring them under the two dollars and a half minimum.

Another cause of the low value upon which duties upon cloths have been paid in this port, is believed, by the committee to be, that owing to the number of invoices at an under value offered at the custom house here, the appraisers have had difficulty in adopting the proper standard of valuation at which to permit them to pass; and your committee believe that the cloths have often been admitted at least ten per cent. below the actual value in the foreign market whence they were imported.

Another cause of the frauds on the revenue, to such a large amount, is believed to have arisen, in some measure, from the manner in which the secretary of the treasury has used the discretion given him by law, to remit the penalty for undervaluation, when he is of opinion that no fraud was intended. Under this provision, in cases of seizure of goods on account of the reappearing to be falsely invoiced, he has, at the clamorous importunities of the parties interested generally ordered them to be given up to the importer, on his paying a duty on a higher value. This is in effect offering a premium on attempts to defraud the revenue, since the greatest inducement is thereby given to the importer to undervalue. If the fraud be not detected, he evades a part of the duty; if it be detected, he is only compelled to pay the same duty as if he had made an honest entry. A practice of remitting the penalty, except in case of evident mistake, is an exercise, or rather abuse, of this discretion given to the secretary, that takes away from the collector and officers of the customs, the strongest incentive offered by the law, to vigilance in the detection of frauds, by allowing to them a share in the forfeitures. The consequence of such an administration of the law under this provision, must necessarily be a laxity and indifference on the part of the revenue officers in enforcing the law; loss of revenue on the part of the government; loss of the forfeitures, which may have been incurred, and to which the government and the officers of the customs are legally entitled—and on the part of the manufacturer and domestic producer, a loss of that protection which the law intended to give to their industry. Accordingly, for the purpose of preventing these evasions of the laws, so destructive to some of our most important national interests, and injurious to all—And to aid as far as may be the officers of the government in the faithful discharge of their duty, your committee propose for the consideration of the convention the resolutions herewith submitted:—

1st. Resolved, That the evidence of frauds upon the revenue, by the evasion of the duties, upon imported woollen cloths, which has been exhibited to this convention, by the committee appointed on that subject, shews that such frauds have been practised to an alarming extent, and admonishes the American manufacturers, merchants, wool growers and other persons interested in the national industry, and friendly to the due execution of the laws, to use their influence to prevent these evasions of the duties, and to enforce the laws enacted for their benefit, and for the advantage of the whole country.

2d. Resolved, That a committee be appointed to attend to the interest of the domestic producers and manufacturers, so far as they may be affected, by any evasions of the laws intended for their protection, to aid the officers of the government, in detecting, exposing and bringing to punishment, any persons, for frauds on the revenue that may have been, or may be practised or attempted, and for this purpose to collect and communicate to the proper officers, all such facts and information as they may be enabled to obtain, and for the same purpose to appoint agents in any of the cities or sea ports of the United States, or elsewhere—to communicate with the secretary of the treasury and the collectors of the customs, on the subject of detecting and preventing any such frauds: and for these purposes, to confer with and invite the co-operation of the American importers.

The following gentlemen were unanimously appointed to attend to the duties expressed in the foregoing resolutions: Peter H. Schenck, Henry Shaw, Samuel D. Hubbard, Zachariah Allen, Edward H. Robbins, J. B. Brown and Orran Thompson.

The committee to whom was referred the subject of establishing a national association of mechanics, manufacturers and agriculturists, report:

That in the consideration of the subject referred to them, the committee could not overlook the fact that in many of the states of the union, there are in existence associations of a kindred character to the one which is now proposed to this convention.

The establishment of these local societies, and their important effects in promoting the domestic arts and industry, suggests the expediency and utility of forming an association of a more national character.

It cannot but be exhilerating to those patriotic citizens, who by their labors and those of their associates, have cherished the interest of the agriculturist, the manufacturer and the mechanic while yet in their infancy, to see their present advancement, and contemplate their prospective greatness.

The industrious and intelligent manufacturers, agriculturists and mechanics, are diffused throughout every part of the community, and apply their skill and industry in furnishing the most useful productions.

There is not a town in any part of the country, nor a street in any city, which does not give evidence of the existence and value of their labors.

The importance of these classes to the comfort and welfare of society is apparent, and is recognized by every one: unpretending, they court no distinction—industrious, they are constantly employed, and are contented if their daily labor gives them their daily bread. This is in brief the character of those classes of our citizens who add millions annually to the wealth of the nation, and contribute to the diffusion of comforts throughout the land.

In the examination of their condition, if obstacles are found to impede the full development of their usefulness, it is due to themselves and to their country, that such obstacles should be removed. As persons possessing a common interest with this useful and practical class of citizens, your committee would respectfully suggest, some of the evils which present themselves, and the remedies which would probably remove them.

Scattered throughout a great extent of territory, and thus without the means of social fellowship or even personal acquaintance, they have but few facilities of reciprocal communication. To disseminate the improvements in all the useful arts, arising from increased skill and experience, new means of communication are indispensably necessary. There is at present no system adopted for collecting and embodying the statistical information, shewing the extent and magnitude, in a national point of view, of their various productions. Some branches are objects of unfounded jealousies, which require only the light of truth to dissipate them. These are some of the difficulties to be overcome by the formation of a national association, with branches, in the several states; and to this effect the following resolutions are proposed for the consideration of the convention:

Resolved, That it is expedient to form a national association of manufacturers, agriculturists and mechanics, with branches in the several states, and the District of Columbia.

Resolved, That the hon. Nathan Williams, and Messrs. J. T. Walden, Z. Allen and E. H. Robbins be a committee respectfully to invite the mechanics, agriculturalists and manufacturers in the several states and in the District of Columbia, to appoint delegates to assemble in the city of New York, on the second Wednesday of October next, for the purpose of organizing a national association.

Resolved, That Messrs. H. Shaw, P. H. Schenck and S. D. Hubbard, be a committee to prepare and publish at a future time, an address to the public, detailing the object and design of the convention, in recommending the organization proposed.

Resolved, unanimously, That this convention accord to Hezekiah Niles their unreserved regard and respects for his services in their cause.

Resolved, unanimously, That the earnest thanks of this convention be presented to Peter H. Schenck, esq. for the moral courage, fidelity and zeal, displayed in his exertions to defend the revenue laws of the United States, designed to protect the national industry, and for his untiring perseverance in promoting the general prosperity and growth of the American system.

Resolved, unanimously, That the thanks of this convention be presented to the honorable Nathan Williams, for the able and dignified manner in which he has presided over their deliberations.

On motion, Resolved, unanimously, That the proceedings of this convention, signed by the president and secretaries, be published.

GEORGIA AND THE CHEROKEES.

From the Athenian of April 5.

GEORGIA, GWINNETT COUNTY.

Gwinnett superior court, March term, 1831.

THE STATE vs. WORCESTER AND OTHERS. } HABEAS CORPUS.

THE CASE.

The defendant and five others were in the custody of col. Sanford, Georgia commissioner, to whom the writ was directed, to show the cause of their capture and detention, and who returned upon said writ that as commissioners aforesaid, appointed under the act of the state of Georgia, passed on the 22d of December, 1830, entitled "an act to prevent the exercise of assumed and arbitrary power, by all persons under pretext of authority from the Cherokee Indians, and their laws, and to prevent white persons from residing in that part of the chartered limits of Georgia, occupied by the Cherokee Indians, and to provide a guard for the protection of the gold mines, and to enforce the laws of the state within the aforesaid territory." He had arrested said persons for a violation of said act, and particularly the 7th section thereof, and had brought them to be surrendered to the civil authority to be dealt with as said law directs. Whereupon their discharge was moved for, upon the grounds hereinafter mentioned. Dougherty and Trippe for the state. Harris, Harden and Underwood for defendants.

THE OPINION OF THE COURT.

Preparatory to a decision of this case, it will be necessary to bring into view, such parts of the above-recited act, as are applicable to the question. The 7th section in the following words: "that all white persons residing within the limits of the Cherokee nation on the first day of March next, or at any time thereafter, without a license or permit from his excellency the governor, or from such agent as his excellency the governor, shall authorise to grant such permit or license, and who shall not have taken the oath hereinafter required, shall be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by confinement in the penitentiary at hard labor, for a term not less than four years: Provided, that the provisions of this section shall not be so construed, as to extend to any authorised agent or agents, of the government of the United States, or of this state, or to any person who may rent any of these improvements which have been abandoned by Indians, who have emigrated west of the Mississippi." And it provided also, that females and children under age, were not to be affected by the section. The 8th section provides, "that all white persons, citizens of the state of Georgia, who have procured a license in writing from his excellency the governor, or from such agent as his excellency the governor, shall authorise to grant such permit or license, to reside within the limits of the Cherokee nation, and who have taken the following oath, viz: 'I, A. B. do solemnly swear (or affirm as the case may be), that I will support and defend the constitution and laws of the state of Georgia, and uprightly demean myself as a citizen thereof so help me God,' shall be, and the same are hereby declared, exempt and free from the operation of the 7th section of this act."

The 11th section provides for the appointment of the commissioner and guard, for the purpose of carrying the act into effect. And the 13th section declares the duty and power of the guard, or any member thereof in arresting persons charged with, or detected in a violation of the laws of the state, within said nation, and to convey them as soon as practicable before the civil authority to be dealt with as the law directs.

In the prosecution of the defendant's application for a discharge, their counsel set up two classes of objections to the act under which they are apprehended.

1st. That it is contrary to the constitution of the United States.

2nd. That it is contrary to the constitution of the state of Georgia.

In the first, upon four grounds, viz:

1st. No state shall pass any ex post facto law.

2nd. The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities, of citizens in the several states.

3d. No state shall without the consent of congress, lay any duty of tonnage, keep troops or ships of war, in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another state, or with a foreign power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay.

4th. The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by an oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the person or things to be seized.

In the last, upon the following ground, viz:

"No person shall be denied the enjoyment of any civil right, merely on account of his religious principles," and as connected with this ground, the oath required by the statute is a test oath, and therefore contrary to the inherent rights of man.

The course of the argument makes it necessary to examine all these points.

1st, It is said that the act is an ex post facto law,—in this, that these individuals were residing on the territory at, and before the time of the passage of the act, and contrary to no existing law, and that a residence, innocent at that time, could not be made criminal by the legislature.

This objection will be made to disappear by a very plain statement. What is an ex-post facto law? It seems to be agreed on all sides, that it is a law punishing an act, which when committed, was repugnant to no law. In other words, according to the first lesson of every tyro in the legal science, law is a rule of action prescribed for the conduct of men and consequently regulates all his actions after the passage of the law, and can never be said to be a rule of action to past conduct, or actions existing prior to the law. Is this the fact in relation to the statute before us? When was it passed? On the 22nd of December, 1830 What residence of these people constitutes the crime? Is it the residence at the time, or before the passage of the act? Candor will dictate a negative answer to this question. When then does the crime of residing in the nation commence? Not until after the first day of March ensuing, the date of the act. How then can it be said, that this is prescribing a rule of action to the past, instead of the future conduct of the citizens? It cannot be.

2nd. The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states. It is urged that the law is not a general one, that it applies to a particular part of the state, and these individuals being citizens of other states, and coming into that territory contrary to no law at the time of their emigration, are now made to perform duties that are not required by the other citizens of Georgia, residing in the settled parts of the state. This is not a true construction of the act. Laws are not made to act upon mere territory, but upon people who may occupy that territory, whether one, or one thousand miles square, and if all persons, without discrimination, are to be equally effected by the law so soon as they enter the forbidden land, it is a general law, because it is the whole people sought to be restrained, and not the land. The expression of the law is not citizens of other states, but all white persons, whether citizens of Georgia or elsewhere, who may reside within the limits of the Cherokee nation on, and after the first of March shall, &c. Now here is no distinction between citizens of this and other states. The moment a citizen of South Carolina comes into Georgia he is a citizen of Georgia, for all the purposes of enjoying the privileges and immunities resulting from the powers granted by the states to the federal government, in that sense he is a citizen of the union, and consequently a citizen of each state. In reference to the reserved and ungranted powers of the states, he is not a citizen entitled to all the immunities and privileges of the citizens of the state into which he comes, such as voting at state elections, participating in public lands, &c. until he has complied with certain conditions as to residence, imposed by the laws of the state. But without this distinction, these persons cannot complain of the law, for it applies to our own citizens as well as all others, and surely it will not be contended that citizens of other states shall have greater privileges than our own! We will not let our own reside there without obeying the law.

3d. No state shall keep troops or ships of war in time of peace. It is contended, that the officers and guard for the protection of the gold mines, and to enforce the laws of the state within the Indian territory, are such troops as come within the meaning of the clause just quoted. It is said they bear arms, are raised for a year, have barracks, are paid and furnished like regular troops, &c. Now this may all be true, and yet they are clearly not troops in the acceptation of the constitution. The character of a military service is better known by its objects, than by its name or organization. They may be called guards, troops, nay if you please, army—they may even wear a uniform and bear arms, but if they are not raised for the purposes against which the constitution intended to guard, they neither violate its letter nor spirit. The federal convention, with their well known wisdom, caution and forecast, seem to have thrown around every power in the constitution a due and proper restriction, or some forcible expression by which their meaning might be ascertained. In the clause under consideration, the word WAR is the leading and controlling idea, is mentioned twice, and stands intimately connected with the phrase relied upon, to wit: no state shall "keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay." Now who does not perceive the object of this clause? What is war, and against whom is it waged? Is it ever carried on by a regular government, not in a state of revolution against its own citizens? Are we at war, or do we contemplate war in protecting our gold mines, and in enforcing the laws of the state within a particular district? A proper attention to the concluding paragraph of the clause, will plainly shew that the keeping of troops in time of peace, has reference to defence against foreign invasion, for troops may be raised and kept, and the states may engage in war if "actually invaded" or in "such imminent danger as will not admit of delay." Here the object and the enemy are clearly designated, against which there shall be no preparation for war, in time of peace, on the part of the states.—This power of defence having been conferred upon the union, the separate states should not interfere with it for very many reasons, but particularly, for fear they might embroil the federal government in unnecessary wars. (See the federalist on this subject.) It cannot be believed for a moment, that the convention intended by this clause to take away from the states, the right to execute by force, their municipal regulations. The moral powers of a government would be perfectly useless, if they could not employ their physical energies to carry them into effect, and these must be exerted exactly in proportion to the degree of resistance to the public authority. Slight resistance will require the application of only slight force, or just enough to overcome it, and this will be found in all the varied degrees of opposition to the laws, from the refusal to pay a simple debt, up to the most angry state of insurrection, and the corresponding application of force, from the arm of a constable to the whole artillery of the government. Hence all those guards for the protection of jails, penitentiaries, cities, and many other objects not now necessary to be mentioned. Hence the patrol of the southern states. These may with the same propriety be called troops of war, or rather for the purposes of war, as the guard designated to protect the gold mines. This is public property and can at the discretion of the state, be guarded and protected, as well as any other property. What is the difference between a treasure in the Cherokee nation and one in the state-house? A captain and guard for the last thirty years have been kept to secure the public monies in the treasury, and no one has ever suspected for a moment, that they were such troops, in time of peace, as were forbidden by the federal constitution.

4th. "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized."

This clause is said to be violated by seizing these persons without a warrant, without oath, and without the usual regular process for arresting offenders against the laws of the land. This is an amendment of the constitution, and one of the offsprings of that jealous fear entertained by the states, of the powers of the federal government, and it was designed to protect the citizens from a species of star chamber oppression, which in England, had proved fatal to many a true friend of liberty. Blackstone says, "a practice had obtained in the secretary's office ever since the restoration, grounded on some clauses in the acts, for regulating the press, of issuing general warrants to take up (without naming any person in particular) the authors, printers, and publishers of such obscene or seditious libels, as were particularly specified in the warrant. When those acts expired in 1694, the same practice was inadvertently continued in every reign, and under every administration, except the four last years of queen Anne, down to the year 1763; when such a warrant being issued to apprehend authors, printers and publishers of a certain seditious libel, its validity was disputed; and the warrant was adjudged by the whole court of king's bench to be void, in the case of Money vs Leach. After which, the issuing of such general warrants was declared illegal by a vote of the house of commons." To prevent the issuing of these general warrants, so obnuxious to the liberty of the press, the great sole guard of the liberties of the people, was the sole object of the clause in question. They have now ceased in England, but it was thought advisable to guard against the recurrence of them in a government which had so much to expect from the freedom of the press. It has not disturbed, either in England or this state, the usual common law manner of arrest, which in general may be made four ways, 1. By warrant. 2. By an officer without warrant. 3. By a private person also, without a warrant. 4. By hue and cry. To these modes of arrest, being nothing but the creatures of the law, it will not be denied that the legislature may superadd any other method they may think proper. If they can authorize a sheriff, constable, or even a private person to arrest, what is to hinder them from conferring the same power upon a guard. They require the guard to bring them before the civil authority, and the act of the legislature is their warrant for that purpose. A constable does no more by virtue of a magistrate's warrant. He often has his fire arms to effect his purpose, and where is the difference in principle between one armed man, with the power to summon as many to his aid as he pleases, in arresting an offender, and twenty armed men clothed with authority to do the same thing. Besides, the state is not without example on this subject, when the Cherokee nation was under the control of the general government, they had a much more rigorous law against white men, than the one which the state has passed since she has taken the management of the nation, and which is so grievously complained of. The intercourse law subjected a white man to severe fine and imprisonment, if he even put his foot into the nation, and that but for a moment. And often have poor men, ignorant of the law, been dragged from the frontiers to Savannah, and there fined and imprisoned, for no other offence than the one above mentioned. How often have white men on the line separating the nation from the white settlements, had their houses demolished, their fields laid waste, and themselves imprisoned for no other offence than residing in this self same nation, that Georgia is now legally attempting to regulate. If the general government could do it, in the name of every thing that is consistent, what hinders Georgia from, exercising precisely the same power, now that it is acknowledged by the president himself, we have a right to do it. When the federal troops, by virtue of the intercourse act, arrested white men in the nation, and carried them before the civil authority to be dealt with as that law directed, who ever dreamed that it violated the clause of the constitution, now said to be assailed? That clause does not declare that no offender shall be arrested without warrant supported by oath, &c. but that it that method of arrest shall be pursued, no warrant shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath, particularly describing the place to be searched, and the person to be seized. The object is too plain to be misconceived.

We have now gone through the objections arising under the federal constitution, we will next consider those which spring from the state constitution.

1. "No person shall be denied the enjoyment of any civil right, merely on account of his religious principles."

I am at a loss to know how this clause is intended to apply, for certainly no distinct application of it has been made to the case. No one will contend, I presume, that the act strikes at any religious opinions, that there is any one word of it can be so tortured, as to indicate any hostility to religion, or the separate tenets of any denomination. I do not suppose that such is the idea intended to be conveyed by the present use of the clause. I collect from the argument used, that the oath required to be taken is such as to produce scruples of conscience, which the religious sense of the individuals at the bar will not allow them to disregard. I am sorry for it, but they know what they can do, they can leave the country, especially too as it does not belong to them, and as they have been living there by the gracious favor of the state to whom it rightfully belongs. There can be no scruples against such a course as this, unless indeed they should be of that character which makes a man unhappy at the performance of duty. But it is my opinion we should be very cautious how we let religion interfere with the civil rule of the country. It is not less encroaching to day than it has been in any past period of the world, and though I may be alone in this matter, yet wh never religion leaves its proper sphere and gets to reaching out its feelers after civil power, it ought to be driven back with the same alarm and despatch that is employed to chain a furious beast that has broken from its confinement. There is scarcely a law against which similar objections might not be raised. We have a statute that makes it criminal to hunt or fish on the Sabbath, and this purely because it is the Lord's day. Now to those whose Sabbath is different, and those whose religious opinions claim the right to disregard all Sabbaths, it might be urged by them, with the same propriety contended for at bar, that they have great scruples of conscience in obeying such a law. But the same answer remains for all such, if you cannot, for conscience sake, live in a society which has passed such laws as it conceives most conducive to its well being, go where you can find more repose for that troubled spirit, and do not expect or ask so unreasonable a boon as for a whole community to give up their conscience to appease yours.

But another idea is suggested and relied upon, connected with the foregoing, that the oath required is a test oath, and though not actually trampling upon the constitution, it so treads upon its heels as to give it great inquietude. It is said to be contrary to the inherent rights of man, and English law is quoted to prove its illegality. It is urged that no man ought to be required to swear to support the "laws of a state and uprightly to demean himself as a citizen thereof," whatever may be required as to his support of the constitution, and that this oath is not general, and taken by all the citizens of the state and that therefore it is a test oath, and odious in the extreme. Oaths have been required in all ages, and have been considered as coming more strongly in aid of the civil authority in effecting the great ends of government, than perhaps any one agent employed for that purpose. The oath of fealty, homage and allegiance is familiar to every man of reading. Oaths of office are almost innumerable. Oaths of witnesses and affiants are forever recurring. Now if a new oath required falls within any of these classes, how can it be objected to? For instance if it is an oath of allegiance, or in the nature of it, who can refuse to take it, without incurring the suspicion that he is secretly inimical to the government. It is not a partial oath, it is a general one, and intended for every man who places himself in a certain situation justly subjecting him to the suspicion of infidelity to his country. What is the plain state of the case? Let us be honest in the answer to this question. The Cherokee Indians, within the acknowledged limits of Georgia, have set up a government of their own, declared themselves free and independent, and for fear the thrice boasted declaration of it would not be enough, they have determined to give us other more convincing proofs, and consequently our citizens residing out of the nation have been dragged before their courts, held in the woods, upon the most summary notice, without preparation, nay, without a knowledge of their language, and after a mock trial, they have been stripped and suspended, and then scourged in the most inhuman manner. Georgia has determined that this state of things sha'l not exist, that the Indians shall come under our laws, and that our citizens shall not be subjected to their savage code. This has produced a most unusual excitement every where, and the most obstinate and undutiful conduct in the Indians. In this course they are pertinaciously encouraged in and out of the nation. Now, surely Georgia has a right to say to such white men as wish to reside in the nation, you must choose sides; if for the Indians, leave the nation. If for us, take the oath and you are welcome to remain. Georgia may well say, this is our jurisdiction, and when the Indians leave it, it is our land; it is ours now, only subject to the occupancy of the Indians. At least, you have no rights there. But as you have homes and connexions in that country, we are willing you should remain. All we ask of you is not to aid and countenance the Indians in their rebellions conduct towards the public authority of the state. This you can do, by taking an oath which we require of all persons who do not hold under our permission. Like the power which the general government was wont to exercise, when it controlled that territory, we have the same right to order you away, cut down your corn, and burn down your houses; but this we do not wish—we are disposed to be more lenient towards you—leave the nation or give us proof of your fidelity! What is there unreasonable in this? Again—may not this be analogised to an oath of office? What is the language of such an oath? The government requires good behavior of the officer, that he will support the laws and demean himself as an honest, upright officer—take the oath and take the office; but if you leave the oath, leave the office. What says the oath before us? Take the oath and live in the nation; but if you reject the oath leave the nation. It is said in argument, that all oaths are for the benefit of the person required to take them, and that this is a proper test of their legality. Without admitting the correctness of this position in the general, it may be safely granted in the case before us, and we think that a snug, profitable residence upon land that does not belong to the person who occupies it, is a very fair equivalent for the simple oath of allegiance. But there are some oaths, and one in particular, which every man in the state has to take, and which promises him but a very remote, if any benefit at all, and which in many cases might justly alarm his conscience. I mean the tax oath. Now this oath shows that the state has the power to impose oaths on every citizen in the state, whether he holds office or not, and the only reason why the oath of allegiance is not required from every man, is on account of its inconvenience. It is believed that the attachment of the people to their government, is strong enough to bind them to their duty; and that the trouble and expense of administering that oath, is not justified by any present suspicions of their infidelity; but this does not preclude the right to impose that oath whenever in the discretion of the legislature, an occasion either in whole or part calls for the exercise of the right. Hence, when private individuals rise to public trusts, they meet the oath of allegiance, demanding security for the faithful discharge of duty, and the defence of the laws. Also they may require it under any other emergency, where a well grounded apprehension may dictate the necessity for its aid.

Under all the foregoing views of the subject, I am of the opinion that the law is perfectly constitutional, and that its provisions must be carried into effect. But there is one provision in it which two of the individuals in custody seem, for reasons best known to themselves, to have overlooked, and which will discharge them from their present arrest, if I have been correctly informed as to the facts. Both of them are missionaries, and one of them a post master. In the first character they are there with the consent of the general government, and as its agents are in the nation for the purpose of civilizing and christianizing the Indians, and as evidence of their being government agents, they have the disbursement of large sums of public money for the aforesaid objects. It is not for me to say what kind of temper that must be, or what the character of that spirit is, which declines the benefit of a law because that law cannot be set aside altogether.—Whether it proceeds from religious scruples, or a more wayward passion, I shall not pretend to say; but this much I will assert, that I respect too much my own oath, and the character of the state, to inflict penalties unauthorised by law, merely to indulge individuals in the fanciful idea, that they are suffering a species of martyrdom. They must be discharged upon the following grounds—The act has this proviso, "that the provisions of this section shall not be so construed as to extend to any authorised agent or agents of the government of the United States."

1. I am proud of the present occasion to testify my hearty respect for the federal constitution, and I am willing to declare that the truly consistent advocate of state rights, ought always to have an equal zeal for the support of the federal constitution, because they are both governments of his own choice. That instrument declares that "congress shall have power to establish post offices and post roads," therefore the appointment of this individual is clearly within the right of the general government and he would have been discharged without the provision above referred to. It would be inconsistent to contend for a contrary doctrine, for Georgia urges that the Cherokee nation is as much a part of the state as any other, and, if it would be lawful to appoint a post master for Lawrenceville, it would be equally so to appoint one for any part of the nation. We certainly have the right to draw this conclusion from the fact, that it is not considered a foreign nation by the general government, unless, indeed, there is some treaty that obliges them to furnish post masters for that unfortunate race.

2. The missionary character has not so high a claim for his discharge, the property falls within the provision of the act. The law prescribes no limits to the agencies to be protected, it is indefinite and extends the exemption to any authorised agent of the general government. It is not for the court to prefix boundaries to the will of the legislature, it has thought proper not to do so, and of course it would be highly improper for me to do it. All that remains for me is to inquire not into what kind of agency, but is he an agent? and is he an "authorised agent" of the general government? If he is, he comes within the saving of the statute. I wish it, however, distinctly understood, that this individual owes his discharge to the courtesy which the state has manifested to the general government by excluding its agents from the operation of the law. The general government has no more right to send missionaries into the nation and quarter them there, than they have to fix them upon any other part of the state.—It is said that the agents intended by the law, were the Indian agents sent to the nation to carry into effect the intercourse law. This does not appear, and the expression is too broad to act upon such a suggestion. Besides, Indian agents have now no more constitutional privileges in the nation, since Georgia has taken it into her own hands, than missionary or any other agents, and this has been frequently stated by the president, and lately confirmed by a special communication to the senate of the United States.

Let the two missionaries (one of them being a post master) be discharged, and let the other four persons be bound over to answer to the misdemeanor charged against them, they having exhibited no excuse.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 15—VOL. IV. BALTIMORE, JUNE 11, 1831. [VOL. XL. WHOLE No. 1,029

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

☞We have been very industrious—and, by condensation and compression, got as much matter into this sheet as we could, and it is an interesting or useful one; but does not contain one-third of what we desired to have put into it. These are "busy times"—a season of much writing and speaking, about important subjects.

In the next REGISTER we shall, probably, pay our respects to the editor of the "Charleston Mercury." He has run up a "pretty considerable" account with us, that ought to be settled.

We hope that we have finished our "affair" with the surveyor of the port of New York. See page 251.

ITEMS. Mr. Van Buren—who is called the "newly appointed minister to Great Britain," took his final leave of Washington on Wednesday last, and proceeded directly on to New York. The president accompanied him some distance on the road.

The small steam boat General Jackson, which plyed between New York and Peekskill, exploded, at Grassy Point, on the 7th inst. by which 6 persons were killed, and about 20 scalded or otherwise injured. The steam was not let off while she lay at the Point, to land some passengers. The explosion was so violent as to drive out the bottom of the boat, and the boiler was completely thrown into the river! The water was shoal, else many might have been drowned, as the boat sunk immediately. There were between 30 and 40 passengers on board—of these a young lady, Miss Dow, was killed, and 2 gentlemen very much injured, one of them dangerously. The rest of the killed—5 persons, all belonged to the boat, among them was the *engineer. One of the passengers was thrown a considerable height and fell into the river, without sustaining any injury, except in being ducked.

James B. Gardiner, of Ohio, who was unanimously rejected by the senate, at the last session of congress, being nominated as register of a land office, has been appointed Indian agent, at McPherson's town, Ohio. The character of this man is very freely spoken of.

☞All hopes of the British market for flour seem abandoned. A letter received by the editor from New York gives reason to fear a pretty general crush of the speculators, and expresses an opinion that flour may descend as low as four dollars a barrel! There is no other than the home market on which the farmer can depend—let him support that, and fit his business to it, by growing wool, flax, &c. and fattening cattle and hogs, as well as in making wheat and corn. These speculators are continually leading the people into error. If they only injured themselves, it would be the less matter.

MANUFACTURES OF IRON. We are disappointed and indeed mortified, to find the call that we made for information concerning the early manufacture of iron in the colonies, and the present condition of that important business in the United States, so coldly entertained or generally neglected. We have yet received only three articles—(but they are valuable, and are all from New Hampshire), in relation to the colonial state of the manufacture—and three or four others, containing some account of its present state in the immediate neighborhoods of the writers of the communications; interesting as far as they go, and we are thankful for them, though only as a "drop in the bucket" to the stock of information that we hoped to have collected. It is known to us that a large body of important facts are nearly prepared by a friend in Maryland, and we have heard that one in Philadelphia would supply some valuable materials, but it is feared the latter design has not been carried into execution; and so the whole project seems as if threatened with almost a total failure, by the apathy of those supposed to be most interested in its success.

We have no right to complain or speak in the language of reproof, because of these things. "What's every body's business, is nobody's." We volunteered to perform a work of great and severe labor, asking only the light aid of such as were directly concerned in its fortunate accomplishment, and now abandon the prospect of doing more than to gather some "shreds and patches," to shew the present mighty value of manufactures of iron in the United States—the immensely increased price that it gives to lands—the great market that it affords for the products of agriculture—the population that it feeds and clothes and shelters—and the millions on millions of dollars which it variously throws into the domestic circulation, spreading themselves through all classes of society, enriching many and benefitting all. Well!—we have done our duty, and perhaps, ought to rejoice in being relieved of the labor of reading, arranging and condensing the many hundred letters that we hoped to have received, on this branch of the subject. As to the other—we shall rely much on ourselves; and although much time has already been expended to little profit, a belief is entertained that facts enough may be collected to demonstrate the ancient and steadily hostile dispositions and proceedings of Great Britain, to keep down manufactures in America, as our means of defence in war and prosperity in peace—to both which the government and people of that country have always looked with an eye that never blinked, a jealousy never quieted, and an apprehension never to be satisfied but in the annihilation of our establishments.

The occasion is an apt one to correct a grand mistake into which the opponents of a protecting tariff have generally fallen. They believe that the manufacturers, knit together by a common interest, stand prepared for immediate action upon any point desired. When they meet together in numbers, and leave their factories and counting houses behind them, they shew a high degree of public spirit and evince a strong disposition to go forward as with the soul of one man; but when separated, every one, involved to the utmost of his capacity to "keep his own mill a-going," avoid loss or make a profit, seems to forget that he has any special duty to perform to aid the general cause, and his private business occupies all his thoughts. To this common course of proceeding, (which all will admit is justly represented), there are many able and excellent exceptions; and had the conduct of these been imitated by all, according to the means and opportunity afforded—the PUBLIC INTELLIGENCE would long since have silenced, by the "still small voice" of reason, every opposition to the "American System" as at present established, and we should not now have to contend even for the existence of that system, which is loudly and violently threatened, and somewhat at hazard—through the unity of its enemies and the want of concert among its friends. Tens of millions have been annually lost to the nation's wealth, because of the apathy that we speak of—and tens of thousands of persons, who subsist in comfort because their labor is protected, are uninformed as to the real means by which they live; and, indeed, often act against the payment of the wages which they themselves earn, through ignorance of the merits of the great contest now going on; which if successful on the part of the opponents of a protecting tariff, will throw scores of millions of capital out of its present wholesome employment, and dispossess hundreds of thousands of persons, free laborers and their families, of the abundance and comfort that they now enjoy—indeed, cast us back to the desolations of 1819–20, when ruin stalked over the land where a prosperous industry now reigns—and the darkness of despair was seen on the countenances of a population, now lighted up with present contentment and beaming with the hope of yet happier days—in personal independence and the advancement of their children to a more preferred estate. "It is better," said Paine, "to go to the place of voting than the field of battle;" and, in a country like this, where every proceeding of the government may be said to rest upon public opinion, how important is it that that opinion should be rightfully appealed to? Are the "signs of the times" to pass unheeded? What intelligent man has not observed the growing coldness in many publications that were ardently with us, as if feeling how far they dare unite themselves to our opponents, for transient and contemptible party purposes? It is not yet, perhaps, too late to take "TIME by his forelock." His child, FALSEHOOD, runs in company with him, and is as mischievous as he himself is rapid in his flight—but TRUTH follows slowly, and, though certain to render JUSTICE, requires long and arduous efforts to redress the wrongs which FALSEHOOD inflicts. Let us hasten the progress of TRUTH; for it is always more easy for FALSEHOOD to destroy than for TRUTH to establish.

*Believing as we do, that at least nine cases of explosion out of every ten which happen, are the result of criminal neglect, fool-hardiness or coldly-calculating meanness to save fuel, we almost feel as if an act of justice was rendered when an engineer is killed, by the bursting of a boiler; and death is a penalty that such very frequently pay.

BRITISH COLONIAL TRADE. We publish in another page, a new act of the British parliament in relation to this trade. Much difficulty has existed in reconciling the interests of the British North American colonies with those of the British West Indies—having regard, in respect to both, to that monopoly of their trade which the mother country, from the first settlements in America, and in every instance, has so closely watched and carefully preserved—and withal there is, perhaps, some portion of that jealousy concerning Canada, rapidly advancing in population and wealth, which so strongly marked the character of the British government in relation to those of her colonies which now compose the United States. The regulations hitherto between Canada and the British West Indies, have generally been oppressive on one of the parties to them—in favoring either, the other suffered, though there was no incompatibility between the interests of the two; but these interests were compelled to give way to that spirit of monopoly just above spoken of, and a constant jealousy that foreigners might participate in the colonial trade. The act before us seems intended as a compromise of these different interests. Many of the chief things allowed an entry in the West India ports, (except from Great Britain and Ireland direct), may now be exported from Canada free of duty, and the duties hitherto levied on certain kinds of lumber are much reduced, subject also to a further large reduction after 1st January, 1834. Thus it is expected that the West Indians will be relieved by the reduced cost of such articles, and the exports of Canada be increased—but, probably to hold the latter a little in check, such products of foreign countries [the United States] may be imported duty free and so exported to and received in the West Indies. By this arrangement it seems expected that every benefit to the West Indies, derivable from an open trade with the United States, will be secured, without too much favoring Canada—and result in the almost exclusive employment of British shipping, the entire profit of the navigation centering in British hands. We have often spoken of the loudly-proclaimed West India arrangements of Mr. McLane, made under circumstances much to be regretted, and in a manner derogatory to the national reputation—and expressed our conviction that it would rather be injurious than beneficial to us, as we think that the small practice which we have had under it has already abundantly proved,—but we must suppose that every hope of profit which was really entertained by any intelligent person under that arrangement, must now be abandoned. For we take it as settled, that that large amount of American tonnage which was employed in supplying the British West Indies by way of St. Thomas, &c. will now be nearly all superceded by British tonnage—not only in the transportation of our flour, &c. to the West Indies, but for the importation of the products of the West Indies into the ports of the United States—which will be handsomely embellished with the grand cross of St. George. But, perhaps, we shall have something to balance the injurious effects of this project, in the better price of certain products of Ohio, Pennsylvania and New York, &c. bordering on the great lakes, the market for which will be in Canada, for the supply of the British West Indies; Great Britain, however, gaining power where she is most anxious to possess it, and checking or weakening our means for competition with her on that element which she almost regards as her own—

"The winds and seas are Britain's wide domain,
"And not a sail without permission spreads!!!"

We prefer no complaint because of these things—but they are beautiful specimens of the "freedom of trade" which is so much spouted about, yet to be found only in the dreams or the writings of such "philosophers" as Mr. Cambreleng* and Mc McDuffie—Thomas Ritchie, Isaac Hill and Mordecai M. Noah.

ERRORS OF THE PRESS are sometimes made in a way that astonishes those whose duty it is to correct them; and too many proof-readers do not at all regard the sense of the matter before them—their eyes conveying no reflection to their minds. We have at least a dozen newspapers with the following sentence—"Mr. Niles, of the Register, says that he made a trip on the Delaware in a steam-boat in 1701"—making him, therefore, at the present time, at least one hundred and thirty years old! We claim not an exemption from such errors of the press, though almost every week rejecting "copy," because of the incorrigible absurdity of its figures—interesting articles being destroyed by carelessness.

WOOL. A good deal of wool is grown in North Carolina, and hitherto chiefly used in household manufactures. We learn that the very high prices offered have tempted many farmers to dispose of their crops—and we think that they have done wisely, provided the time hitherto employed in the manufacture of wool shall not be wasted, on that account.

The Maryland Republican says—At a shearing last week, 15 sheep, one year old, (belonging to Richard Iglehart, esq. of Elk Ridge, Anne Arundel county), yielded 99 pounds of wool, after cleaning, &c. The fleece of the male lamb, weighed 11 pounds.

[There is no other agricultural pursuit that yields a profit like that above stated—the amount of capital and labor employed being considered. This wool is worth not less than 45 cents per pound, perhaps considerably more.]

About 80 bales, containing an average of 400 lbs. each, of Buenos Ayres wool, but of a very inferior quality, were sold in Baltimore last week at 15 a 15¾ cents a pound.

☞We advise the wool-growers to dispose of the stocks which they may have on hand, as soon as they can. We think it impossible that the present price can long be maintained, and if the speculators suffer, we shall not regret it. The manufacturers, generally, cannot pay such prices, and live by their business; and wool will be imported in cloth.

*Mr. C. is a great manufacturer of facts.. In his report of Feb. 1830, of which congress ordered 10,000 copies to be printed! he gravely made eight millions six hundred and forty-eight thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight tons of vessels for the coasting trade, only, of Great Britain!—See report, page 22. If he believed this, we shall not use him roughly in calling him a—silly one; if he believed it not, when seriously presenting it to congress and the nation, what should he be called? The whole amount of British shipping in the year that Mr. Cambreleng spoke of, [1827] coasting and foreign, was only 2,460,000 tons. The 8,648,868 tons that he gave for British coasting tonnage, is a larger amount than the tonnage of all Europe, though every vessel, from a ship of 144 guns down to a canoe, be counted to make up the mighty aggregate. There are other blunders—or "high-pressure" statements in this report equally censurable, though not so splendidly magnificent in error as this.

A YANKEE "NOTION." A machine has been invented for preparing boards for floors, &c. It will plane and joint and groove as much work as sixty men, and in the best manner, attended by two boys. The patent right of this machine is valued by hundreds of thousands of dollars—that for the city of Boston, only, at 50,000.

ANOTHER "NOTION." A poor Yankee lad invented a machine that makes 300 excellent wrought nails in a minute, and has sold it for the small price of 100,000 dollars. It is worth millions to the people—and will also make its present proprietors rich.

☞The first steam boat ever regularly fitted—[Fitch's] was a Yankee "notion"—the cotton gin is a Yankee "notion"—the card making machine is a Yankee "notion." So much for "wooden nutmegs" and "maple-log pumpkins."

NEW YORK COURIER AND ENQUIRER. It was unknown to me, until after the last REGISTER was made up for the press, that the "Courier and Enquirer" had offered any thing by way of answer to my remarks of the 28th ult. when I charged the editors of that paper with the manufacture of deliberate falsehood. To which there is an offset in the "Courier and Enquirer" of the 1st inst. manifestly from the pen of the United States surveyor for the port of New York, or so close in its resemblance to the manner of that notorious shuffler, as to render it impossible to distinguish between the serving Dromios—creeping out of accusations that would ruin the character of any man, unrepelled—if he had any reputation at hazard. It would be like breaking a moth, that flutters round the candle, on a wheel, to reason with one who thus trifles with convictions of mean and wanton misrepresentation—and affects to laugh at evidence of his own want of moral principle. It is impossible to feel angry with what is so ridiculous—I had like to have said contemptible, but the thing is unworthy of so strong and respectable a term. Yet Mr. Noah must excuse me for repeating, that the whole story told about a late "conference" at New York, had not the shadow of a truth for its foundation, and was altogether a calculated falsehood. With these remarks it is manifest that I must cease to notice the United States officer-editor,* or whoever else appears in his place in the "Courier and Enquirer," until, at least, some disposition to be thought honest is shewn, from which I might hope to extract an admission of undeniable truth. Errors of the press should be tenderly passed over—and "errors of opinion always be tolerated, when reason is left free to combat them"—misinformation can easily be mitigated, if not altogether excused—prejudice and passion may have their origin in the best motives of the human heart, and even what is rude, and, perhaps, we might go so far as to say indecorous, shew an earnest, but ill-guided, honesty ——— but the coldcoiner of things not true, to mislead or deceive others, is a character that "to be hated, needs only be seen;" and that taste is vitiated, indeed, which relieves a man so conditioned, because that he smirks and smiles, talks nonsense and plays the buffoon—stale and profitless as the silly jokes and monkey-like actions of the clown at the circus; which make the "groundlings laugh" while they despise such prostitutions of the character of man.

FIRES—FAYETTEVILLE IN ASHES! On Sunday, the 29th ult. at about 12 o'clock, when the people were generally at church, the roof of a kitchen, belonging to Mr. James Kyle, and attached to his brick dwelling at the N. W. corner of the Market Square, was discovered on fire. It did not appear formidable, and, the alarm being given, it seemed about to be extinguished; but it soon caught the brick building and a number of wooden houses adjacent—then the town house, extending with irresistible and terrific violence. The people exerted themselves to the utmost, but in vain—the slaves, and other colored persons behaved manfully, and earned a high reputation for disinterested intrepidity and strict honesty—but the natural anxiety of each person to save his own property, materially diverted the people from the common enemy of all of them. The heat was intense, and the buildings seemed almost as inflammable as gun-powder—of which there were many explosions, as well as of casks of spirits, time not permiting the removal of either. The fire raged about six hours, and then stopped for the lack of food to supply it!—Only two stores remained standing.

The public buildings destroyed were—the Town house, the Cape Fear bank, the Catholic chapel, the Presbyterian and Episcopal churches, the academy, the Fayette and Mansion House hotels, with the house in which the agency of the bank of the United States did business, and all the printing offices—the private buildings destroyed are estimated at about six hundred, with nearly all the goods, furniture, &c. which they contained, much money and many valuable books and papers—some of which were moved several times to places of supposed safety, but were at last consumed. The money and papers of the banks were saved—the vaults preserving what there was not time to carry away. The whole business part of the town was destroyed—indeed, nothing remains of this late flourishing place but a few scattered houses in what were its suburbs. Persons that were rich, were at once reduced to poverty. The aggregate loss is supposed to exceed the value of a million and an half of dollars. The distress of the houseless people, the aged and the infants, the sick and the lame—huddled into heaps, without the rudest hut to shelter them, without food or clothing, save what they had on their backs, is fearfully described. So extensive a calamity and complete destruction, was never before witnessed in the United States. But withal, it does not appear that one life was lost! Happily, the calamity came in the middle of the day, and was not in the "winter season"—though the heat of the weather was hard to bear, unsheltered. As there was no wind, the fire spread in all directions. The churches though built of brick, had high steeples of wood, from which ascended awfully grand columns of flame.

It seems that the property of only two individuals was insured.

Fayetteville was a compact town, doing much mercantile business, and having about 4,000 inhabitants.

On the same day, the 29th ult. a fire broke out at Utica, New York, and spread with great rapidity—but the firemen nobly combatted, and, at last, subdued it—7 or 8 buildings being destroyed.

The Rahway [New Jersey] Advocate contains an account of a destructive fire which occurred near that place on Saturday morning the 28th ult. at the calico print work of Mr. Trusler. The destruction was total: and the loss of property is estimated at from $25,000 to $30,000. Eleven buildings were consumed within two hours, all of which were new, and occupied by about 100 persons.

MR. MCDUFFIE'S SPEECH. We have read Mr. McDuffie's speech at the Charleston dinner—it is a long one, making nearly seven heavy newspaper columns of small type. We intend to make some extracts from it, when convenient. Its logic is so amazingly fine, that it requires a powerful effort to discern some of the points that he has made, or intended to make, against the protecting system. They are also so nicely applied, to agree or differ with others, that we almost envy that power of intellect which enabled a large party, seated at a dinner table, to comprehend him! His favorite purpose seems to be to prove, that taxes on production are not paid by consumers—and hence, if we do not mistake him, that the increased price of taxed commodities of the classes that are imported, are paid by the growers of products for exportation! If figures were applied to these principles, it would be found that all the cotton exported, even if rated at very many times its present price, would not pay the amount of suffering presumed to be imposed. There are several things in which the gentleman is grossly mistaken—as a liberal examination of his speech would demonstrate. He is now also against internal improvement, and filled with a spirit for direct taxation! He no longer fears a ruin of the revenue, because of the tariff—which apprehension used to throw its opponents into hystericks;* but he invites direct taxation to destroy the tariff—and we agree that taxation and representation should go together, as was intended by the framers of the constitution. In the latter paragraphs he "goes the whole" for NULLIFICATION, and calls the fears of some, that a civil war may ensue, "mere nursery stories of raw head and bloody bones, which even the women of our country laugh to scorn!" He laments the unfortunate divisions which prevail in the state, and distract the public counsels—and says other things of which there was no type in the proceedings of the far-famed Hartford Convention, all the glories of which, as to the defence of "state rights," have been often eclipsed by many county-court lawyers of S. Carolina—before whom "Alps and Pyrennees" sink into mole hills, and armies are raised as in the days of Cadmus; and "the spirits from vasty deep being called," will come when called.

*The New York Standard says,—"We perceive that M. M. Noah, continues his name in the country paper of the Courier and Enquirer. Quere. Is that paper also sent to the president?"

The whole speech is about the tariff—no other subject is even touched by the orator. It is an excellent specimen of wire-drawing, however much Mr. McD. hates manufacturing—and its latter part very violent.

Even the "Richmond Enquirer" of the 3d inst. says—"Mr. McDuffie's speech is so violent in its tone, and ultra in its doctrines, that even the United States Telegraph speaks of him as "too refined to be practical"—as being "an accomplished statesman," a "hard student," but "mingling little with society," and drawing "his opinions from the independent resources of his own mind."—It seems surprised that Mr. McD. should "urge South Carolina to put herself on her doctrines," and the T. asks "Cui bono?"—Few politicians it is certain have flown so readily from one extreme to another, on constitutional questions, as Mr. McD.—His opinions as "One of the people," are in direct contradiction with some of the doctrines of his Charleston speech."

☞We have italicised the parts in the preceding—received 3 or 4 days after this article was prepared, to shew that others hold the same opinion of the fineness of Mr. McDuffie's logic, as it appeared to our obtuse intellects. It would, indeed, take a larger essay than Mr. McD's. speech to explain what he means!—But it makes one smile to see Mr. Ritchie charge Mr. McDuffie with "inconsistency!" Truly, he is grossly so—but Mr. R. ought "not to be the one that would charge him with it," as an offence.

MR. JOSIAH S. JOHNSTON'S SPEECH. We do not know when we presented to our readers any thing more conformable to our own ideas of simplicity, beauty and power, than the brief address of this honorable senator of the United States from Louisiana, when partaking of a public entertainment given to him by his friends and neighbors at Alexandria. As he himself well observed, he spoke "in the presence of those who knew their interests and comprehend this subject"—a protecting tariff, and its operation on the cotton planting interest. We recommend it to all our readers—but especially those in the south. And, if any in the nullificatory nation do not enjoy that prosperity which Mr. Johnston describes as pertaining to the cotton planters of Louisiana, (himself being an extensive one, we believe)—let them seriously enquire how it has happened—this being manifest, that tariff has nothing at all to do with it.

MR. BERRIEN. We publish the speech of this distinguished gentleman at the dinner given to him at Savannah, not so much on account of any particular opinions which it contains, as for the reason that our readers may be desirous of seeing what the attorney-general of the United States said on such an occasion.

MR. BRANCH. This gentleman, having been solicited by his fellow-citizens of Halifax county, N. C. to become a candidate for representative in congress from that district; and having been formally addressed on the subject in a letter signed by a number of individuals, has furnished the following reply, in which there are some significant expressions. Mr. B. had been previously requested to the same effect before he left Washington, but then gave no decided answer. The whole correspondence is published in the U. S. Telegragh.

Enfield, 24th May 1831.

Gentlemen: A few days past I had the gratification to receive yours of the 5th inst. wherein you express a desire to avail yourselves of my services in the next congress of the United States; and in which you have been further pleased to urge many considerations why I should consent to have my name "held up" among others, that it would afford you an opportunity of manifesting "an undiminished confidence in my patriotism and zeal in the public service." I thank you, gentlemen,—most sincerely do I thank you, for your generous confidence and support; and, in the fullness of my heart, with a thorough consciousness of my inability to meet your just expectations, I respond affirmatively to you, as I have before done to many of my fellow-citizens. I do this with an approving conscience, and I dare believe, an approving country, in the course which I have felt it to be my duty to pursue in my intercourse with the citizens of Washington city, during my late residence among them. I would fain hope that general Andrew Jackson may yet live to see the day when he will be convinced, I have not only, (as he now admits), faithfully discharged my duty to the public, but at the hazard of incurring his displeasure, have tried to guard his splendid laurels, the common property of the nation, with the fidelity of a true friend, and that too, under the most discouraging and mortifying circumstances.

With the highest respect, I am yours most truly,

JOHN BRANCH.

The following authorized publication appeared in the Washington "Globe" on the 4th inst.

From the Globe. In two different letters, written evidently for publication, Mr. Branch has covertly and insidiously made injurious intimations, intended to reach the character of an unnamed individual whom he ventures not to assail openly. These insinuations are made to have a particular bearing, and are used by the humble instruments who act in concert with him, to produce political results from assaults on private character. Mr. Branch cautiously shrouds himself under inuendoes, and leaves to surmise the facts which he says ought to be laid before the public. Why does he not act like a man? He has been called upon to come out openly—to specify—and on the principles of justice and honor, to assume the responsibility of showing that which he says ought to be known, but which he has hitherto ventured to disseminate through vague insinuations alone. Could an honorable man reconcile to his feelings, thus to stab in the dark? In his published letter he rests his conduct upon a point of honor. Yet he sees his letters vouched as authority for the vilest suspicions, by partizans—by underlings who he knows cannot be noticed. Is he not bound then to avow his meaning—to assert boldly his charges, and submit them to that public which he has sought covertly to infect with his "malign influences."

*It often makes one laugh to look back and see the prophecies of the anti-tariffites, and in many respects. To the point before us, we offer the following remarks of the present governor of South Carolina, delivered in the house of representatives 16th Feb. 1824—Mr. Hamilton, of S. C. was very glad to hear from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Tod), that he had an affectionate regard for the revenue of the country, which, however, he might have manifested more effectually than by attaching it to such insignificant articles as pine apples, oranges and filberts! But this item was consistent with the whole scope and object of the bill. If this bill ever becomes a law, said Mr. H. and goes into operation—if we ever SUBMIT to its operation, it will be a very little consequence whether oranges, figs, or filberts be interdicted or not: for I believe there will, under the operation of this system, be very few individuals left who can afford to purchase them."

We are authorized by the individual who is supposed to be aimed at by these hinted slanders, to make this second call. He shrinks not from the ordeal with which he seems to be threatened. He is ready to make the issue with a man who considers the public interested in the matter of his covert allusions, and whose standing in the country subjects him to the proper responsibilities. No investigation is feared. An honest cause always looks with confidence to an issue, which depends on an appeal to God or the country.

☞ The latter article seems to have a very significant bearing. It is one among many recent "circumstances" which make us believe that the political excitement has only just commenced, and that it will, of necessity, run into developements of private concerns of a very delicate nature.

We have also the following long letter from Mr. Branch to certain of the citizens of Bertie county, who sought his opinion on the several points touched in his reply,—which will sufficiently shew them. It is, altogether, taken in connexion with some of his previous publications, a curious article.

Enfield, May 31st, 1831.

Gentlemen: Yours of the 14th instant, post marked, Windsor, the 21st, came to hand a few days past. The confidence which you have been so kind as to express in my talents and political experience, and the desire you have manifested that I should become a candidate to represent this district in the next congress of the United States, together with the frank manner in which you have given your opinion of certain men and measures with a view to elicit mine, merit my respectful consideration, and shall receive my prompt attention. I must decidedly concur with you in believing that discord has been introduced into the ranks of the administration by the intrigues of selfish politicians. A short time, I trust, will be sufficient to enable the intelligent inquirer to obtain the whole truth.

Until then, perhaps, it would be the part of prudence to leave the question open, and rely on the righteous judgment of the people. However, recognizing your undoubted right to know all my opinions, both as to the prominent men and leading measures of the country, I will, with that frankness which has ever characterised my conduct, give you unreservedly my impressions, under a confident hope that as you called for them, at a period when I must necessarily incur a heavy responsibility in giving them, that you will extend to me your generous charities for any error into which I may be thus incautiously led; for there is nothing about which men are so apt to differ, nay to err, as their opinions of men.

In the first place then, as to the motives which influenced Mr. Tazewell in his course in the senate of the United States on the Turkish mission, I profess to know nothing. With Mr. Van Buren, I have had frequent, personal and official intercourse, and the time was when he possessed my confidence. Mr. Calhoun's private virtues and public services, particularly during the late war, together with his high order of talents, always commanded my respect, but his latitudinous political doctrines, during Mr. Monroe's administration, met my disapprobation. Hence it is, that no one, correctly informed, has ever considered me his political partizan. As to myself, I can truly say, that I have no person in view for the succession; I am at a loss to say, who among the prominent politicians I ought to support. Fortunately for me and the country, this question may yet be advantageously postponed.

The present controversy between general Jackson and Mr. Clay, can never divide southern politicians to any extent. "The American System," the hobby of the latter, has but few advocates among southern planters, and its author still fewer adherents. On gen. Jackson then, who is himself a planter, we must depend, with a confident reliance on the justice of congress for relief against the oppression of a system of exactions, which if persevered in, must ultimately lead to the most calamitous results. The great and fundamental principles which divided our country into parties, are of momentous concern, and are every way worthy of the untiring vigilance of the American people. The journals of the senate of the United States for the six years that I was a member of that body, will best shew my opinions on the tariff of 1824, and '28, which now threaten the repose of the union, and the prosperity of the southern country. These afford an earnest of the course of which I shall feel it to be my duty to pursue, in reference to any measures which may be calculated to repeal or mitigate this "bill of abominations," as it has been emphatically called by one of its present most active and efficient supporters.

The next point to which you invite my attention, is the bank of the United States. I am unable to perceive how I can vote for the renewal of the charter in any form. My opinion in relation to banks is of long standing, and has, in North Carolina at least, become somewhat a matter of public notoriety. I have believed that it was the intention of the framers of the federal constitution, that the currency of the United States should have been metallic, and I inferred this from the technical language employed, and the exclusive power given to congress to coin money and to regulate its value, with the positive inhibition on the states to do the same thing, or to emit bills of credit, or to make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts. But the ingenuity of man has sought out many inventions, and the person would be thought mad, who, at this day, would seriously urge the above opinion, finding that every state in the union has chartered banks, and thereby indirectly regulate the value of money as effectually as though they had power to coin it.

A national bank has been recommended by the president with certain well defined powers. I am persuaded that the president's views have never been fairly presented or understood. He, I am sure, never contemplated the establishment of such a hideous monster as his political opponents have conjured up. Such an institution in the hands of the executive, for any other purpose, or with any other powers than the transmission of government funds, from one part of the union to another, I should deprecate as the greatest calamity that should befall the country.

Thus, gentlemen, I have responded to you fully and freely. I have no concealment in politics. My principles remain now as in 1798, when they were first formed at college. They have undergone no change that I am sensible of. "They have grown with my growth, and strengthened with my strength."

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, your fellow-citizen, JOHN BRANCH.

To Messrs. Geo. B. Outlaw, Robt. C. Watson, &c. &c.

OBITUARY NOTICES. It very rarely happens—hardly once in three years, on an average—that we have felt justified in giving other than a very brief notice of the decease of private individuals, unless because of some leading features which marked their life, or caused the termination of it—and for this reason, that, from the nature and circulation of this work, the desires of surviving friends to preserve such records, would oftentimes much embarrass us, in the occupation of many pages which should be devoted to subjects of more general interest. But we are now about to break through a rule which has been necessarily guarded with great care, to pay a feeble, but heart-felt and just, tribute of respect to the memory of a dear departed friend—with whom we have spent many happy hours, and who was beloved as the kindest and best of brothers should be. We hope that this personal feeling will excuse the small space that we occupy—but, that it may not be plead as a precedent, eight pages of extra matter shall speedily be given to our readers, because of it; for we do not think it right to prescribe a rule for others which we may violate ourselves, in a matter so delicate and close to the best feelings of the heart.

Died at Matteawan, Fishkill landing, New York, on the first instant, after a very long and painful illness, ABRAHAM H. SCHENCK, in the 57th year of his age.

Mr. Schenck, descended from the first settlers of the present state of New York, long enjoyed the confidence and esteem of all who knew him. The people of the county of Dutchess had several times elected him as their representative at Albany, and also honored him with a seat in the congress of the United States. He was faithful to all the public trusts reposed in him, and eminently successful in giving effect to the wishes of his constituents, through the vigor of his intellect, power of persuasion, and fascinating conversation and manners. He, with several associates, commenced the manufacture of cotton at Matteawan, in 1815, on land which he inherited from his father; and in 1822, on the same stream, the manufacture of wool—induced as well to the proceeding by the wants of his country, shewn in the events of the late war, as to promote his own private interests; and the works have been kept up ever since: and, though not of the largest class, are among the neatest and best managed of any in the union—to the great benefit of a large number of worthy and respectable persons collected at them, and a wonderful improvement of the neighborhood, because of the ready market afforded for the productions of the soil. Few men were more powerful in demonstrating those and other benefits flowing from the "American System" than Mr. Schenck, because of his colloquial talent and power of intellect—though altogether free from pretensions to what is commonly called eloquence or learning. But he had read and thought much, especially of latter years—and was uncommonly well versed in mechanics and machinery; prompt in explanation, and accurate in detail. Because of these various qualities, he was selected by his partners in the cotton and woollen establishments,* to make a tour through Great Britain, Ireland, France, Holland, &c. and, perhaps, he saw more, and gathered more information, of manufacturing operations, than any man ever did in no greater length of time. He brought back with him much useful knowledge, all which has been beneficially applied; though he often found much pleasure in saying, that, in general, we were much less behind even the best English establishments, as to the perfection and power of home-made machinery, than he had expected.

Our departed friend, from the sprightliness of his disposition and promptitude of his thought, was the life of every company that he entered—whilst the perseverance of his character, unyielding integrity, and universal benevolence, especially endeared him to the humbler classes of society. His heart was always ready to receive, and his hand to assist, the deserving—and, while his memory will long and tenderly be cherished by a a very numerous body of near relatives and devoted friends, the title which he justly earned of the poor man's benefactor, we humbly trust, has ascended before him as a peace-offering to the GIVER OF ALL GOOD, and been accepted in mercy. His decease has left a blank that cannot easily be filled—his plain, but frank and generous hospitality, unwavering disposition to please, and persevering and happy efforts to promote good will among his neighbors, will be sweetly remembered by all who had the pleasure of knowing Abraham H. Schenck.

*Those in the cotton being also extensively engaged in the manufacture of first-rate machinery.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT. John Ralli, of Odessa, to be consul of the United States for the port of Odessa, on the Black Sea, in Russia, in place of Charles Rhind, resigned.

Henry Schielin, of Taganrog, to be consul of the United States for the port of Taganrog, on the Black Sea, in Russia.

Norris Wilcox, of Connecticut, to be marshal of the United States, for the district of Connecticut, in place of James Mitchell, deceased.

NEW YORK. A convention of the national republicans of New York, was held at Albany on the 2nd, 3rd and 4th inst. Various proceedings were had, and resolutions passed—one of the latter recommending HENRY CLAY, as a candidate for the presidency, to the national convention which is to be held in Baltimore in December next, was passed unanimously. Judge Spencer and gen. P. B. Porter were appointed the senatorial delegates, with 34 other gentlemen, to represent the party in New York, in that convention. We shall probably give a pretty full account of the proceedings hereafter.

THE NORTH EASTERN BOUNDARY. The governor of Massachusetts, in his recent message to the legislature, makes the following remarks upon the decision of the king of the Netherlands, with regard to the boundary line between the United States and the British dominions in Canada.

"It does not appear, that the decision of the arbiter, has as yet, been accepted by either government. From a comparison of the terms of the submission with the award, it must be manifest, that this is altogether at their option, and will be obligatory only when concurred in by both. There is no more sound or better established principle of political as well as municipal law, than, that an award to be binding must pursue the submission. The arbiter himself, hardly professes that, in the present case, this has been done. The special and only purpose of the reference has been wholly unsatisfied, and the question where are the highlands which constitute the true boundary between the United States and the British provinces, is no better settled than before the arbitrament. To the pretensions of the states directly interested, the award offers the greatest violence. It curtails Maine of its ample dimensions, already in anticipation, spread over with a hardy and vigorous population, raising her to the first rank in strength and greatness, or adding another member to the family of states, abridges her jurisdiction within the present limits of its accustomed exercise, and assigns a property of two millions of acres of land, claimed by her and Massachusetts, to an adversary party. It may be sufficient for the security of the future rights of the state, that neither the authority of the arbiter shall be admitted, nor the validity of his decrees assented to, by us."

TREATMENT OF AN ENEMY. During the captivity of lord Cornwallis's army, Mr. JEFFERSON hearing that there was some plan in contemplation by the government of Virginia for removing the officers and men to a less eligible situation than they then occupied, wrote an expostulatory letter to Patrick Henry, then governor, on the impropriety of the course, not only as being contrary to the convention which had been entered into, but as putting the officers and men to great unnecessary inconvenience, and expressed himself in the following truly patriotic and benevolent manner;—

"Is an enemy so execrable, that though in captivity, his wishes and comforts are to be disregarded and even crossed? I think not. It is for the benefit of mankind, to mitigate the horrors of war as much as possible. The practice, therefore, of modern nations, of treating captive enemies with politeness and generosity, is not only delightful in contemplation, but really interesting to all the world—Friends, Foes and Neutrals."

CITY OF NEW YORK. The census of the 6th and 8th wards has been completed, and it is now ascertained that the city of New York contains a population of two hundred and three thousand and fifteen souls.

The following is the number in each ward:

SAFETY OF STEAM BOATS. We hear much of the damages rendered to persons and property by steam boats—but the general safety of this means of transportation are not duly esteemed by all. Speaking of the Constellation, plying between New York and Albany, (160 miles), the Albany Daily Advertiser says—

This steam boat has been, emphatically, the most fortunate boat on the river, having never lost a single trip, and what is more, she has never lost a hand or passenger. The following is a statement of the number of trips and passengers of this boat, since she commenced running:

1825,	92	Trips—11,633	passengers.
1826,	230	Trips—31,919	do.
1827,	196	Trips—27,020	do.
1828,	198	Trips—32,381	do.
1829,	210	Trips—35,221	do.
1830,	236	Trips—33,736	do.

☞Since the first introduction of the steam boats into the waters of the Chesapeake in 1811 or 1812, we think that only 4 or 5 lives have been lost—though many hundreds of thousands of passengers have been carried in them.

AWFUL, INDEED! An earthquake has taken place within 200 miles of Pekin; from 500,000 to one million of beings are represented to have perished; twelve towns or cities are destroyed. The earthquake was accompanied by hail storms and floods which lasted three days.

FOREIGN NEWS.

An arrival at New York brings London papers of the 6th May. The accounts from Poland, though nothing decisive has happened, are of a cheering nature. The patriots have advanced upon and occupied Siedlee, late the head-quarters of the invaders—and the latter have re-crossed the Bug, which would seem to indicate weakness or apprehension. This retrograde movement has probably had its immediate cause in the general rising of the population in Lithuania, Podolia and Volhynia—which is reported to have happened. Indeed, it is said that in Russia, proper, there is much shew of discontent. Some great effort must have appeared necessary, for the Russian troops were withdrawing over the Pruth, leaving Wallachia open to the Turks. It is said that 16,000 Lithuanian troops left the Russians in a body and joined the Poles, and there is a rumor of a great battle in which the invaders perished by thousands. But Russia, unless distracted within, is too strong for Poland, gallant and devoted as she is—so located, also, that not much effectual aid can be given to her in supplies, indispensable to a vigorous support of her independence.

The commander in chief, Skrzynecki, gives accounts of several small affairs—exceedingly harrassing to the enemy, and calculated to give new stimulants to the Poles. The Polish corps of 6,000 men, under gen. Uminski, was attacked by the Russian general Ugrowmow, with 20,000 men, and heavy artillery. The former bravely resisted the enemy and killed many of them, and took 500 men prisoners and 200 horses—but was compelled to retire—which he did with no great loss. Gen. Dwernicki, the "cannon provider" was hereely attacking and severely harrassing the Russians.

A quantity of ducats have been coined at Warsaw—principally made from the wedding rings of the women of Poland!

☞So far, well—but there are other accounts from Poland which represent the country as already exhausted, and threatened with famine—that the fields would remain uncultivated, that all sorts of business had been brought to a stand; that want had already caused sickness, the corn, cattle and sheep being consumed or destroyed by the armies, and that the general appearance of things was deplorable, indeed.

☞P. S. An arrival at Baltimore last evening, brings a London paper of the 12th May. It is stated (and we are compelled to fear the news true), that, after three days hard fighting, the Poles have been defeated with the loss of 2,000 killed and 8,000 prisoners. It is intimated, on the one hand, that this battle was not final—but on the other said, that Warsaw was ready to open her gates to the Russians. The accounts are not certain.

A general insurrection appears to have taken place in the eastern parts of Asiatic Turkey.

The Russian emperor has ordered a new levy of 150,000 men.

The elections in England were going on favorably to reform. Gen. Gascoyne, who has represented Liverpool 33 years in Parliament, has been beaten, and a friend of reform put in his place. The king had been invited to an entertainment to be given by the city of London.

It seems now admitted that a large majority [some say 150!] of the new house of commons will support the king and his ministers in the business of reform. The dukes of Newcastle, and Manchester, several marquesses and earls, and others of the high aristocracy, have been put down in places or districts which they regarded as their own.

Lord Eldon's purse open! It has been positively asserted by colonel Jones, that lord Eldon—the regularly accredited save-all, and ex-chancellor—has subscribed £30,000 for the furtherance of the anti-reform cause! His lordship's contributions heretofore have generally been tears; but for these he has occasion now for himself and friends. [Sunday Times.

Ireland is in great misery for the want of food—thousands were on the point of perishing by starvation: some families had been entirely swept away. We in the United States, can form no idea of such a state of things.

There was a formidable riot in Edinburg, because Mr. Jeffrey was not returned to parliament. The vote is in the Guilds or corporations—Mr. Dundas had 17, Mr. Jeffrey 14, and 2 scattering. It required the best efforts of Mr. J. to keep the people down, and prevent the calling-in of the military.

The king was becoming more and more a favorite of the people of France. It is said that two ships of the line and two frigates were about to sail to Lisbon to negotiate with the savage usurper of the throne of Portugal; but another account says that he would submit to all the demands of France.

We have the following from Greece. "By misgovernment in various shapes, count Capo d'Istrias, long a functionary, and thence an instrument of the Russian government, had, for a considerable time past, been the object of universal odium in Greece. The patience of the people being completely exhausted, an universal rising had taken place, which commenced at Napoli, with the assistance of the Hydriots and Mainots. Finding no support any where, the despot abdicated the government, and no disturbance of any kind took place. A sort of assembly styled an executive council, headed by Mavro Michali, had been established, and every thing was going on with universal satisfaction.

In Italy, it appears that the success of the Austrians in checking the insurrection, had been complete. Some diplomatic conferences are however to take place at Rome. The death of the king of Sardinia had been announced in Paris and London, with the further intelligence that prince Carignan, who succeeds to the crown of Charles Felix, had been proclaimed king of Sardinia.

The London Courier expresses its doubts as to whether prince Leopold will consent to become king of Belgium. He is said to have the subject yet under deliberation.

FOREIGN SCRAPS.

Spanish bonds in England. We were astonished a few days since, in looking over the proceedings of the Spanish bondholders in London, at a meeting held on the 11th April last. By report made by their committee, it appears that the amount of Spanish bonds in English hands cannot be ascertained: but during the years 1820, 1821 and 1822, bonds to the amount of 13,000,000 pounds sterling, were sent by the Spanish government, and sold to the British merchants. Interest on the bonds were paid regularly up to the 1st of November, 1823, since which neither principal nor interest has been paid. On the 1st May, 1830, the amount of principal and interest due was almost 18,000,000 pounds sterling, or about 80,000,000 dollars. Thus it appears, that the British subjects are creditors of the Spanish government for account of bonds alone, and that for seven years, in a sum more than double the whole national debt of the United States, that being only about thirty-nine millions. The bondholders, it appears, met together for the purpose of petitioning the Spanish and British authorities on the subject of the privations and wrongs which they continue to endure. [*N. Y. Reform. The following incident may serve to show the state of feeling which prevails in England on the reform question. A foreman of a woollen draper in London sent orders to a broker at the stock exchange, to transfer £200 consols into the name of lord chancellor Brougham. This was of course effected, and on inquiry into the circumstances, it was ascertained that the sum was the accumulated earnings of a life of industry, and that the donor had no other object than that of marking his detestation of the "rascally boroughmongers," as he termed them, by transferring it to the man who had taken the lead in the measures for rooting them out. He should now, he said, go cheerfully to work to accumulate more.

The same feeling existed among the voters of the county of Clare, at the election of O'Connell. The poorest came to the hustings at their own expense, and the most dissolute rejected the temptation of ardent spirits.

A specimen of the mode of electing members for parliament in the seventeenth century. The following curious extracts are taken from a memorandum MS. of J. Harrington, esq. of Kelston, in Somersetshire, dated 1646:

To our muche honoured and worthie friend J. H., esq. at his house, at Kelston, near Bathe.

Worthy sir,—Out of the long experience we have had of your approved worth and sincerity, our citie of Bathe have determined and settled their resolutions to select you for burgess of the house of commons in this present parliament for our said citie, and do hope you will accept the trouble thereof; which if you do, our desire is, you will not fail to be with us at Bathe on Monday next, the 8th of this instant, by eight of the morning at the furthest, for then we proceed to our election. And of your determination we intreat you to certify us by a word or two in writing, and send it by the bearer to your assured loving friends, JOHN BIGG, the Maior,

Saturday, December 26th, 1646. Went to Bathe and dined with the maior and citizens; conferred about my election to serve in parliament, as my father was helpless and ill able to go any more; went to the George inn at night, met the bailiffs, and desired to be dismissed from serving; drank strong beer and methiglin; expended about vjs.; went home late, but could not get excused, as they entertained a good opinion of my father.

Monday, Dec. 28th. Went to Bathe, met sir John Horner: we were chosen by the citizens to serve for the city. The maior promised sir John Horner and mysell a horse a piece when we went to London to parliament, which we accepted of; and we talked about the synod and ecclesiastical dismissions. I am to go again on Thursday, and meet the citizens about all such matters, and take advice thereon.

Thursday, 31st. Went to Bathe; Mr. Ashu preached. Dined at the George inn with the maior and four citizens; spent at dinner vj sh in wine.

God save the king.

[This proclamation is followed by another for the election of 16 peers, to represent Scotland in the ensuing parliament. Females in London. On a careful and minute inquiry into the condition of a portion of the female sex in London, it has been calculated that the number of females of a certain class exceeds 80,000, that there are at present 15,000 girls, children of the poor, who have no visible means of subsistence, the greater part of whom are trained to every variety of vice, and are without shelter or home. It is also ascertained that the number of female servants in London is 165,732! that the time each servant remains in her situation, by an average taken at seven different periods, is 462 days; consequently, on an average, 858 leave their situations every day.

CIRCUIT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

DISTRICT OF MARYLAND,

United States, vs. Mortimer Cunningham. } April Term, 1831. Indictment for a misdemeanor.

On the 12th May this court opened for the trial of M. Cunningham, late post master of Abingdon, Harford county Maryland. He was indicted under certain clauses in the 21st section of the post office law, which provide as follows:

"That if any person employed in any of the depart-"ments of the post office establishment shall unlawfully "detain, delay or open any letter, packet, bag or mail "of letters, with which he shall be entrusted, or which "shall have come to his possession, and which are in-"tended to be conveyed by post; or, if any such person "shall secrete, embezzle or destroy any letter or pack-"et, entrusted to such person as aforesaid, and which "shall not contain any security for, or assurance relat-"ing to money, as hereinafter described, every such "offender, being thereof duly convicted, shall for every "such offence, be fined, not exceeding three hundred "dollars, or imprisoned not exceeding six months, or "both, according to the circumstances and aggravations "of the offence."

The indictment contained ten counts. The four first on the second clause of this section; and the six last on the first clause. To the nine first counts the counsel for the traverser put in a general demurrer, and to the tenth a special demurrer. These were argued on the two following days. And on Monday the 16th, judge Duval gave his opinion, sustaining the demurrers to the four first counts, and overruling them as to the six last. The judge herein decided, that it was necessary to negative that the letters contained securities for, or assurances relating to money; and further, that the enumeration of such securities as set forth in this act, should be particularly and expressly negatived.

A jury of great respectability and intelligence being empannelled, the trial on the facts commenced that day. A great many witnesses were examined on both sides, occupying therein nearly four days. On Friday, the 20th, the arguments to the jury commenced, which continued until 6 o'clock, of Monday evening, the 23d. In the course of these arguments various questions of law were started and argued, not important here to be noticed.

The most interesting facts, which were given in evidence on the part of the government, were that certain irregularities and violations of the mail occurred in the course of the last winter, between Baltimore and Wilmington, Del.; in consequence of which, a correspondence took place between the post masters of these places, and a scheme for detecting the guilty was devised by them. Decoy letters were sent by the mail, into which were put, sometimes good money, but principally counterfeit notes. Some previous investigations failing of a discovery, Mr. Charles T. Grubb, deputy post master of Wilmington, commenced his operations on the 21st of January last. He put up two letters at Wilmington, addressed to different persons in Baltimore; and at Elkton, coming on with the mail, he put these two letters into separate bags or portmanteaus; one of which was to be given out at one office, and the other at another office, between Elkton and Havre de Grace. On arriving at Havre he examined the two packages, and found them unbroken. He determined again to test the same two offices, and for that purpose, to return to Elkton. But some suspicion being excited in his mind at Havre, towards the post master at Abingdon, he resorted to similar means for detection.

He prepared at Havre two letters, addressed to persons in Delaware; and a letter addressed to the cashier of the bank of Baltimore; into each of which he put counterfeit notes. In that sent to Baltimore, he put a $5 note of a Georgetown bank, and a $5 of the Charleston manufacturing company. This letter was put into a portmanteau, which the mail guard was directed to give out at no other office, than at Abingdon; and he was charged with a letter of advice to the post master at Baltimore. Mr. Grubb then returned to Elkton, and, inspecting the two packages there, he found them correct. Satisfied with the fidelity of the offices north of the Susquehannah, his attention was thenceforth solely directed to those south thereof. With the co-operation of col. Whann, post master at Elkton, he prepared two decoy letters, into one of which he put a counterfeit note, and addressed it to H. Niles, Baltimore. This letter he placed in a portmanteau, to be opened at all the offices between Elkton and Baltimore, except at Abingdon. The other letter was addressed to Nixon Wilson, Baltimore; and into that were put a $5 note of the Jersey bank, a $2 note of Georgetown corporation, and a $1 note of a Delaware bank. The two last were counterfeits, and the first supposed to be genuine. Whether it was so or not, was the great question in controversy on the former trial against this party, for a felony. This last letter was mailed by col. Whann, and put into a portmanteau, which was to be given out only at Abingdon. There was in that mail no package for Abingdon.

Mr. Grubb came on with the two portmanteaus, carefully attending to their disposition. At Havre the bag, containing the last mentioned letter, was opened in the presence of Dr. Sappington, the post master, and his deputy, that they might see the packages compared with the list of them. He here received a letter from the post master at Baltimore, advising him that the decoy letter, addressed to the cashier of the bank of Baltimore on the 22d, had been intercepted. The post master at Havre advised Mr. Grubb to call for liquor at Abingdon, so as to run up a bill; and to counterfeit intoxication, that the post master there might have no suspicion of his real character. Following on with the mail to Abingdon, he saw the portmanteau, before designed for that office, carried into the bar by the traverser, and heard packages broken open, although he knew this was unnecessary, as no packages were in the mail for that office. Considerable delay being occasioned at that place, by the stalling of the mail carriage, it was about 4 o'clock in the morning of the 24th of January, before they were ready to depart. The witness called for his bill, which was 50 cents. He offered in payment therefor, first a $20 note, then a $10 note. Change was given for the latter in a $5 note, a $2, and a $1, and three half dollars. The $5 note proved to be the Georgetown note, which had been enclosed in the letter directed to the cashier of the bank of Baltimore, and sent by the mail of the preceding evening. The $2 note and $1 note were two of the three notes enclosed in the letter to Nixon Wilson, and mailed a few hours before at Elkton. All these notes were perfectly well known to Mr. Grubb, and to others of the witnesses. The $5 note had been ascertained by the traverser, in the course of the day preceding, to be a counterfeit. And this discovery accounted for his giving it in exchange to a stranger, apparently intoxicated, rather than the $5 note, which was in company with the $2 and $1 notes.

Arriving at Baltimore, Mr. Grubb examined the two portmanteaus. In one, which had been given out at all the other offices, he found the decoy letter to H. Niles; and in the other, which had been opened at Abingdon, the decoy letter to N. Wilson was missing. But in its place was found a letter addressed to Mr. John H. Naff, of Baltimore, which had been mailed at Wilmington, by Mr. Grubb, on the 20th, and had been two days delayed on the road, and had been opened. It was a bona fide letter, supposed to be, and marked double, although single. An affadavit of the foregoing facts having been made before the district judge, Cunningham was arrested on the evening of the 24th of January.

Two of the counts which were struck out were drawn upon the embezzlement of the decoy letter, addressed to the cashier of the bank of Baltimore. Three of the counts ruled to be good, had relation to the decoy letter to N. Wilson, for detaining, delaying, and opening it. Two were founded on the delaying and opening the bona fide letter to J. H. Naff. The 6th was framed on a charge for delaying and opening a bona fide letter to James Cox, esq. The counsel for the government did not press for a verdict of guilty on this count, as there was no direct evidence to support this charge.

The defence of the traverser was urged by his ingenious and able counsel, on evidence of good character, and various other topics. The jury, having left the box about twenty minutes, returned a verdict of GUILTY on the five first remaining counts, and NOT GUILTY on the last count.

On the morning of the 24th, his honor, judge Glenn, pronounced sentence:—that the party convicted should be imprisoned for six months, and pay a fine of fifty dollars and costs; saying, that the fine was reduced in consequence of the heavy costs which had been incurred, being much greater than the highest fine which could be imposed by the act of congress.

The judge also remarked to the traverser that the worst feature in his case was the employment by him of false witnesses, to aid in his defence.

The counsel engaged in this trial were Nathaniel Williams, district attorney for the United States, U. S. Heath and R. Johnson, for the traverser.

It may not be uninteresting to notice that, during the same term of this court, two persons have been fined and imprisoned, upon confessions of guilty, to indictments found against them for obstructing officers in the discharge of their duty;—one for resisting admiralty process; and the other for endeavoring to rescue Mortimer Cunningham, at the time of his arrest.

There has been a sixth recovery, within a year or two, of the penalty of $5 for writing on the margin of a newspaper, which was not sent as a letter.

DINNER TO JOSIAH S. JOHNSTON, ESQ.

From the Alexandria (Lou.) Gazette of May 21.

Alexandria, April 27th, 1831.

SIR—The undersigned have been appointed a committee on the part of a large and respectable number of your fellow citizens of this parish, who are desirous of offering you some testimonial of their respect and some public proof of the high estimate they place on your long and faithful services in the senate of the U. States.—We have with that view the honor of inviting you to partake of a public dinner at Messrs. Norment and Jeffries, on Friday the 29th inst.

We are happy in being the organs of this communication, and avail ourselves of this opportunity of adding assurances of the high consideration with which we have the honor to be yours, &c.

To hon. J. S. Johnston.

Alexandria, April 28th, 1828.

GENTLEMEN—I received yesterday your letter in behalf of a number of my fellow citizens of the parish of Rapide, inviting me to a public dinner on Friday the 29th inst. I accept with great pleasure the invitation, which will afford me the opportunity of renewing my acquaintance with so many of my friends and constituents, and of offering them personally my grateful acknowledgements for the kindness and the confidence they have uniformly manifested towards me. I receive with due sensibility this testimonial of the respect and approbation of my immediate constituents, to whom more than to any others, are known the views I entertain of the public interest and the high value I set upon their favorable consideration of my public services. I thank them for this unmerited honor and beg you to accept the assurance of my great personal regard for you individually. I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant, J. S. JOHNSTON.

The honorable T. C. Scott, H. A. Bullard, F. A. Bynum, Silas Talbert, Thos. Hooper, M. Wells, esqrs.

During the entertainment, the health of Mr. Johnston having been given and drank.* He arose and addressed the company as follows:

I am very far from supposing that any services I have rendered the state have deserved the estimate you are pleased to place on them, or that I have in any way merited the distinguished honor you award me.

I receive this testimony of respect as an evidence of that personal regard, you have so often manifested towards me, which has endured so many years, and stood the test of so many trials, and which still survives all the contests personal, professional and political, in which we have been engaged.

I value most highly the good opinion of those with whom I have so long lived, and I appreciate as I ought to do the sentiments you express; I am most grateful for this and the numerous marks of public favor and public confidence I have received for more than twenty years at your hands.

I owe indeed much to the people of this parish, among whom I first started in the career of life. I owe to them whatever personal honors or political preferment I have obtained, and I am too sensible of their kindness not to feel the deepest sense of gratitude to them and the liveliest interest in their prosperity and happiness. It has created an attachment which is neither weakened by time or distance. Wherever I go, and in whatever I engage, whether in the pleasures of society or the duties of my station, my mind turns at every interval, like that of the exile to the country it has left, and the friends and the home it has lost.

I return therefore, after the political contests of the winter are over, with sincere pleasure to meet your cordial welcome, to participate in your social enjoyments, to mingle in your concerns and to feel again that I have an interest and a common stake with you in that country which it is my pride and duty to represent, and without which no man can truly represent his constituents.

I am happy in the occasion which it presents of meeting so many esteemed friends, of knowing those who have more recently settled here and of forming an acquaintance with the new generation, rising up around us. But I am most happy to witness the growth of your families, the increase of your fortunes, and the general improvement of the country.

*Our distinguished guest, the hon. Josiah S. Johnston. The able and unwearied advocate of the true interests of Louisiana, in the senate of the United States.

There is at this time an uncommon degree of prosperity in our country. Wherever I have been throughout the northern, middle and western states, labor, capital and skill, are now employed with the greatest activity and enterprise, in all the channels of industry. Every where we meet the external and visible signs of the influence they diffuse. It affords me great pleasure to be able to congratulate you on the condition of our own state, I speak particularly now of the cotton region. We have suffered a great depression in the price of our staple, one of the most extraordinary revolutions of property and one of the severest trials. Within a short period, cotton has fallen to one-third of its former price. —Yet you have sustained the shock.—There has been, in consequence of your foresight and prudence, no distress or sacrifice, your fortunes have steadily advanced, capital is still productive, property in demand, money abundant, and credit and confidence unlimited.

I am the more surprised at this, after having heard and read so much of the distress in the southern states. —How is this, that two countries very similar, with like productions, with the same people and living under the same laws, present such different results. Have we a kinder soil, a more genial sun, greater enterprise or more industry or more economy?—They have indeed some advantages, they are nearer the market, near the sources of supply, labor cheaper and the price of the staple article higher by the difference of freight. How is it, that they are sinking in utter and irretrievable ruin, while we are in a comparatively flourishing condition?

The depression in the south has been ascribed to the operation of the tariff, but those laws act equally upon us; and we cannot comprehend how they exert the mysterious and extraordinary influence attributed to them. The decline in the price, was for a time imputed to the tariff. It was supposed to be affected by some indirect means, beyond the reach of common observation. But this I believe is now abandoned. It is known that the price fell with the increasing production; it was the excess of supply pressing on the demand for consumption; it was the natural effect of a redundant market.

We have heard also of a new theory, by which it is maintained that the producers and not the consumers pay all the duties, and that therefore the cotton interest is taxed with two-thirds of all the revenue. This struck us at first by its boldness and originality. It had the merit of being a cause, which, if true in principle, would adequately account for all the evils whether real or imaginary, ascribed to the tariff; but the fact not being true, the theory has been exploded, and we have returned to the old opinion, that in reality the consumer, whoever he is and wherever he may be, pays all the duties levied upon all the articles he buys, and that therefore they fall very equally upon all: and consequently the duties of 20 millions paid to the government are levied upon all the people and draw from all the labor of the country amounting to many hundred millions, and not upon the mere producers of the articles that enter into foreign commerce that do not exceed sixty millions.

But it has been said the tariff is most unjust and oppressive, and is producing the most fatal effects upon the south. Let us see how this stands with us. The price of cotton has fallen, but so has every thing else, and from the same cause. The taxes are necessarily high, to defray the expenses of government and discharge a heavy public debt, but then all contribute according to their means.

In regard to ourselves, we know, that the whole expenses of our plantations do not exceed one-third of the value of our crops, that is less than three cents a pound, and that the residue is profit upon the capital employed. That half of this amount of expenses is for articles made in the United States, and not included in the tariff, and not in any way effected by it. The other half is composed of articles that are embraced by it and furnish a fair example of the general operation of those laws. The whole of them have fallen since the tariff of 1824 from 50 to 100 per cent. in value; some of them especially cotton goods are cheaper than in England and fairly compete with them. Others, such as cotton bagging, which constitutes a considerable item of expense, is now made in the western states of a quality superior to the foreign at 16 cents, and to which it is reduced by our own competition; this article together with the cordage is now so low that it fully reimburses the planter by the weight for all the cost. Upon the remainder of the articles we may perhaps pay 25 per cent. but the prices are continually falling, we must contribute our quota to the government in some form; could we expect to pay less upon the amount of our property or our revenue, or could we pay it in a more convenient form? Or can we complain when we look to the protection it affords and the effect of that security upon the value of our labor and our property. Besides in the present regulated state we are secure from great fluctuations, the market is well supplied, at a fair and steady price which will not be materially affected during a war.

But in any view of this question. It is clear that two-thirds of the productions of your estates is gain upon the capital, actual profit. This annual accession to your fortunes is again invested, and becomes new capital; and thus we see large estates created in a few years, as if by magic, by means of industry and economy.

I speak in the presence of those who know their interests and comprehend this subject.

Do you believe that the tariff has depressed the price of cotton, do you believe the cotton growers pay all the revenue, or that any considerable portion of what you make goes in any way to the government; can you believe that so far as we are concerned, that the tariff is unjust, or unequal, or oppressive.

In the southern states not only are these doctrines promulgated, but the exercise of the power to protect the domestic industry of the country, in any form, is pronounced a palpable and dangerous violation of the constitution, and so oppressive that the states have a right to declare them void; principles which I believe after the most mature reflection to be utterly erroneous, and dangerous to the peace and union of the states.

The great staple of our state, sugar, which promises to become one of the most valuable interests of the south, and one of the most essential and useful to the whole country, owes its existence to the policy of the government, and can continue to exist only by the favor and protection of the laws, and the operation of those principles upon which the whole system is founded.

At the close of the war, it became the avowed policy, to protect the domestic industry, and especially the agricultural industry of the country. The people of this state conforming themselves to the views of government, embarked immense capital under the faith of the laws in the cultivation of sugar. The hazardous experiment has been rendered successful by their industry and enterprise. It has become the prominent interest of the state. I may with truth say that this great and growing interest depends now essentially upon the protection of the government, nay, the withdrawal of it would reduce us below the condition of the West Indies, and involve us in utter and hopeless ruin and bankruptcy.

This distant and isolated interest has been singled out for attack by a most formidable combination of political parties. It seems to have provoked the especial displeasure of the southern politicians, who for the last year have concentrated their whole force upon this particular object. We received timely admonition of the attack. We were informed that notwithstanding the fatal consequences to this state, the attempt would be made to take off the protecting duty of sugar, for the double purpose of punishing the people of Louisiana for the free expression of their opinions upon questions of deepest concern to them, and of breaking down the American system, by assailing its separate interests in detail. The press at proper time, opened at various points along the whole line, and the plan of operation began to disclose itself. The attack was made by every species of popular appeal, every prejudice was awakened, every weakness and every passion moved. It was said to be a tax upon labor for the benefit of capital, to be levied upon the poor for the benefit of the rich, that it was an enormous duty of two or three hundred per cent on the cost, and yielded a profit of thirty or forty per cent. upon the capital, every kind of exaggeration and misrepresentation were employed. Then came the president's message, recommending a modification of the tariff and announcing the new principles upon which it should be revised; to wit:

"That objects of national importance alone ought to be protected," which seemed to look only to a few objects of general, not local interests, and to exclude in its terms every branch of industry confined to particular states or sections, as if the protection of labor in all its forms, wherever employed, was not the object of the national legislation. It was then declared no interest should be protected unless it could stand singly and alone; without any aid or support from any other interests, as if any interest could stand alone, and as if the labor of the country could consent to be taxed for the benefit of one or a few peculiar interests; as if any system of government or of legislation could be founded upon such exclusive principles. Then we were advised that, "some of the comforts of life were taxed unnecessarily high," an intimation which we cannot effect to misunderstand, and finally, the great scheme was consummated by a formal attack in the form of a proposition to reduce the duty on sugar. A deep impression was now made on the public mind and a formidable opposition was arrayed. I was assured with an air of confidence that the duty would be taken off. In the mean time the citizens of this state, (to many of whom we are greatly indebted), prepared a body of facts drawn from the most correct and authentic sources, and laid them before the public. This served in a considerable degree to correct the erroneous impressions and dispel the illusions thrown around this subject. It began to be seen in its true light, as really a great national interest, opening a vast field for capital and labor, that, in fact, sugar was produced by contributions from all the states, and diffused its effects among the whole people of the United States.

The proposition was met by our delegation in the house of representatives, and successfully resisted. The attempts proved entirely abortive.

This attack from our brethren of the south, with whom we have so many ties of interest and feeling, shows us how little we could rely upon them for protection;—when their sense of public duty leads them to sacrifice their own, and our interests to their principles, what confidence can we repose in principles that lead to such results, that begin by doing evil, that good may come of it? Can those speculative opinions be just, as regards the first operation of which would prostrate a whole state, and paralize the whole south.

I am very happy to believe the intelligent men of that quarter, begin to view this particular question in a different light; and that they do not consider it necessary to prove their patriotism by sacrificing their interest, or their disinterestedness by ruining the people. But it must be acknowledged that some of their writers advance sentiments the most extravagant and the most extraordinary. They said their friends in congress were preparing a blow for them, and nobly sacrificing their interest to their principles, that they were encouraging them in it, that it would be speedily and severely felt throughout the south. They said the duty on sugar had produced an immense diversion from the cultivation of cotton, that it had retarded the fall of that article, that it had sustained the value, and created the demand for slave labor, they said the removal of the duty, would be not only total ruin to nine-tenths of the sugar planters, that it would turn from 50 to 100,000 laborers back to the cultivation of cotton, which would produce a further depression in the cotton market and a serious decline in the value of slave property. They said the shock would be felt almost instantaneously throughout the slave holding states. That "the south in proposing and advocating this repeal, was gallantly sacrificing herself on the altar of principle and patriotism." I trust the sober and intelligent people of the south are not prepared to adopt these sentiments or to act on their suggestion.

It was not my intention to introduce any political matter on such an occasion, but these are questions of vital interest to our country, which it is the duty of every citizen to examine, and of every public man to discuss, it would be unpardonable in you to be indifferent, and criminal in me to be silent. I come here not to divide, but to unite, not to create dissentions, but to heal them, to turn from the conflicts of parties, to the real and solid interests of our country.

I owe you gentlemen, a thousand acknowledgements, for the sentiment you express and the kindness you show me.

Mr. Johnston gave the following toast:

The constitution of the United States. The happy medium between the extremes of consolidation of government and confederation of states, having neither the dangerous power of the one, nor the dangerous weakness of the other, it will preserve the integrity of the union, the rights of the states, and the liberties of the people.

DINNER TO MR. BERRIEN.

We take from the Georgian the following toasts which were given at a public dinner in hon. of Mr. Berrien, by the warm-hearted citizens of Savannah. Mr. B's speech, which we also publish, will be read with interest. If its pure style and patriotic bearing, does not recommend it to the reader, we are confident that the absence of the political rant of the day, which disfigures too many of our dinner speeches, will not fail to receive their approbation. [Ed. Adv.

1. The United States—The Pharos, to guide the nations of the world to the haven of liberty.

2. The state of Georgia—She has triumphantly sustained the majesty of the constitution, by preserving unsullied the dignity of her own sovereignty.

3. The president of the United States.

4. The governor of the state of Georgia.

The president of the day, John Cumming, esq. then rose and prefaced the following toast with these remarks:

The terms in which our invitation was accepted forbid a reference to the public services of our respected guest. If it were otherwise, the fair honor of his career in the forum, on the bench, in the senate, and in the cabinet, would form a theme on which the philanthropist and patriot might delight to dwell: but since he has desired to be received as our fellow citizen, we have only to tender to him our friendly salutations.

5. Our guest—We esteem him for his virtues—we honor him for his services.

Mr. Berrien then rose and responded to the observations from the chair, and the sentiments of the company, in nearly the following words:

I thank you very cordially, gentlemen, for this expression of your kindness. I could not be insensible to the approbation of so respectable an assemblage of any portion of my fellow citizens; but such a reception from this community, leaves me without the power adequately to express my grateful sense of the honor which it confers. It brings with it, however, the cheering conviction, that I am in the midst of those, to whom I may safely confide the interpretation of my feelings. Accept, then, gentlemen, the simple acknowledgments of my gratitude, for this renewed manifestation of your unvarying kindness. I should vainly attempt to describe to you my feelings on this occasion, but your own hearts will bear me witness, and I cheerfully submit myself to their testimony.

Returning, after an absence which has seemed to me to be a protracted one, to this cherished spot, which is endeared to us all, by a thousand recollections, I have the gratification to see, in this assembly, many of those who have been my companions in the journey of life. I meet you, therefore, with no ordinary emotion, and with little qualification for the discharge of the duty which your kindness, and the customs of the festive board, have devolved upon me. The stranger who visits our city, contemplates it as the abode of hospitality and the home of the domestic virtues; and leaving it, carries with him a lively remembrance of the intelligence and the courtesy which constitute the charm of its social intercourse. But to me, it presents itself with all those awakening recollections which are connected with the idea of home—of youthful friendships, and the graver associations of maturer years; with the cherished remembrance of the best and happiest portion of my life—of bright and sunny hours, which are destined never to return.

I wish I could have found you gentlemen, in the enjoyment of that prosperity, which the natural advantages of our location, and the intelligence and enterprise of our citizens entitle us to claim. There was a time when the success of our agricultural, and the consequent prosperity of our commercial operations, gave animation to every thing around us—when the busy hum of commerce was heard in our streets, and its fruits were exhibited in the rapid improvement of our city—when here, as well as elsewhere, all the comforts and enjoyments of life, were placed within the reach of individual exertion. Why does this state of things no longer exist in the same degree as heretofore? Why is it that stillness now pervades those places, which in times past were the scene of bustle and activity? Whence comes it that the best exertions of the planter, and the most intelligent efforts of the merchant, fail to receive the rewards which heretofore awaited them?

I will not do violence to the social feeling, to which this occasion is devoted, by the discussion of a much agitated and highly agitating question, which is connected with this subject. I purposely limit myself to the inquiry, whether some of the evils which we suffer may not have resulted from our failure to keep pace with the changes which have occurred elsewhere, and especially in the other states of the union? Extending our view to the state at large, whether we have not relied too much on the value of our products, and the natural advantages of our position; and looking rather to our past prosperity than to those unwelcome indications which menaced its continuance, have remained to a certain degree stationary, while others have been advancing in the career of internal improvement? I do not disguise from myself the fact, that the change in our condition, has been greatly influenced by causes over which we could exercise no control; by the altered political and commercial state of the other portions of the world. Constituting a part of the great family of nations, we cannot be insensible to that which materially affects its other members; for that law of his nature which ordains that man shall be a social being, forbids that, either as an individual or as a member of society, he should be wholly independent of his fellow men.

Still it may be worth the inquiry, whether all which we have lost can be justly imputed to this cause? and especially, whether some thing may not be regained by intelligence and unremitted exertions to facilitate our communications, and to improve the ocean inlet, on which we are so advantageously posted? When the great staple product of our state commanded three times the price which can now be obtained for it, the difficulties of communication were overcome, because the value of the articles compensated the labor and expense, which were necessary to the accomplishment of this object. Our storehouses were then filled with the fruits of our agriculture; and here, also, were sought, as an almost necessary consequence, those supplies which our citizens derived from the skill and industry of other nations. Our city was then the great mart of the agricultural productions of the state, as well as of those foreign supplies which then reached us, in no inconsiderable quantity, by direct importation. But this is unhappily a picture of by-gone times; a state of things which we can scarcely expect to see realized again, in all its former extent. The condition of the world affords little prospect of any material advance in the market value of our principal staple. Apart, then, from such improvements in agriculture, as may reduce the cost of production, its value to the producer, is chiefly to be increased, by facilitating, and thereby diminishing the expense of its transportation to an eligible market. Elesewhere this truth has been felt and acted upon, and we are in no inconsiderable degree, the victims of the diversion, which it has already occasioned. Does it become us, I speak of our fellow-citizens throughout the state, to await in listless inactivity, the consummation of this result?

It is now several years ago, since a distinguished engineer, who had been engaged in making surveys in various parts of the union pronounced this port to be the appropriate Atlantic outlet of the southern and southwestern states, and the truth of this opinion, would ere this have been demonstrated, if the requisite exertions had been made, to improve those interior communications, which are suggested by the natural advantages of our position. Such an operation however, in the extent, which ought to be given to it; belongs emphatically to the state, because the capital which it would require, transcends the resources of our city, and because also, the benefits which it would confer, would be co-extensive with the whole line of communication. May we not hope that this subject will find favor in the councils of our state, and that some portion of the ample fund, which must ere long be placed at our disposal, will be set apart for purposes of internal improvement. Whoever shall succeed in awakening the attention of the legislature to this vitally important subject, and shall have the good fortune to effect a successful result, will deserve to be ranked among the benefactors of the age, and will justly acquire to himself an enviable place in the esteem and affections of our people.

I hope I shall not be considered to have given to these remarks a character unsuited to the occasion of our assemblage, if discarding every partizan feeling, I indulge myself in adverting for a moment, to some considerations connected with our political condition. In this view, we have abundant cause of thankfulness to the author of all good, for the bounties which he has bestowed upon us, and even around this festive board, it becomes us reverently to acknowledge our gratitude for the blessings we enjoy. In the agitations of the old world, which seem to be destined to unsettle the institutions of ages—to hurl the titled monarch from his throne, and in their unavoidable consequences, to carry dismay and desolation into the cottage of the peasant, we have a striking illustration of the wisdom, which guided the councils of the founders of this republic. It is impossible not to remark, how completely the first half century of our political existence, has demonstrated the fallacy of anterior theories of government. The maxims which they inculcated, denounced the freedom of our institutions, as fatal to their permanency. The recognition of the sovereignty of the people—the principles that government is a trust, for the benefit of those who created it—and that all granted power is revocable at the will of the people, by whom it was conferred, were supposed to constitute the evidences of our weakness. Our experience has proved that they are the sources of our strength. A struggle of three days has sufficed to precipitate a monarch from a throne, surrounded by the instruments of his power, who were impotent to resist the shock. Another, yet another, has been called to prove the divine origin of his right to rule, by the exhibition of his physical ability to subdue the multitude who have questioned it. Every where the march of free principles is onward—and they will advance—and they will advance in quick pace to the consummation of their object. Meanwhile the American republic, resting on the firm basis of the sovereignty of the people, is alike secure from internal commotion, and from external assault. Differences of opinion will exist, and conflicting interests will arise in our widely extended empire, but the principle of mutual concession, which gave birth to our fundamental charter, will reconcile these jarring pretensions—and the profound attachment of the people to the government of their choice, will rebuke the spirit of discord, wherever it may arise. In one sentiment we are all agreed it is that which inculcates as a primary duty, the preservation of the union of these free, sovereign and independent states. The organic law which proclaims it, is a precious memorial of the wisdom of our fathers, and the assurance of its permanency, is in the affections of a free enlightened people. No where is this sentiment more strongly felt than by those to whom I have the honor to address myself. It is indeed the cherished feeling of the south. Vigilant in the assertion of the rights of state sovereignty, the people of Georgia, have ever been prompt to rally round the general government, in vindication of its claim to the full exercise of its constitutional authority. They are ready too I assure myself, however much on this subject, they may have been misrepresented, to meet the conflicting pretensions of their brothers, who differ from them, in that spirit of just and mutual concession, in which the union of these states, had its origin, and to which alone we can look for its preservation. Happily, to this source, we may look, with unwavering confidence. An enlightened public opinion which constitutes the mural and efficient strength of our government, will still perpetuate the bond of our union, coercing obedience to the legitimate mandates of authority, while it exercises also a salutary restraint upon rulers—checking the arrogance of power, and rebuking its excess.

I congratulate you gentlemen on the prospect which is afforded by recent events of the favorable adjustment of our Indian relations. As citizens of Georgia we have a deep interest, in the correct solution of this difficult and embarrassing question. It is not merely that a valuable portion of our domain, is withheld from our occupancy, by the remnant of a tribe, which still lingers on our chartered limits. The pretensions which have been asserted in their behalf, are in direct conflict with our sovereignty—and in the heat of the controversy, which they have engendered, we have been subjected to imputations alike unworthy of our character as a people—and revolting to our individual feelings! The illusion in which these prejudices originated, is however rapidly passing away. The prejudices of our brethren are subsiding and all that remains to secure the favorable award of public opinion, is that we should exercise our acknowledged rights, with the moderation and in the spirit of benevolence, which it becomes us to exhibit to the feeble remnant of a once great and powerful, though savage people.

For the accomplishment of what has been already attained, in relation to this vitally important interest. I need not say that you are indebted to the zeal and intelligence of your representatives, in the national legislature, to the steady vigilance, with which they have vindicated your rights. Nor are you without the full measure of obligation, to the chief of that department, to which this branch of the public service, is particularly confided, for the fidelity and firmness, with which he has discharged this important trust. But honor to whom honor is due. It is to the distinguished individual who presides over the interests of this republic—to his own correct and thorough knowledge of this whole subject—in its origin, and progress—in all its bearings, and in all its details—to his unwavering determination not to surrender his own correct views, to the suggestions of a false and misguided humanity—to his just estimate of the rights of the states, and to the paternal care, which watches over those rights, as mainly essential to the perpetuity of that union, which must be preserved—it is to him that you are chiefly indebted for the gratifying prospect which is now presented to your view.

I will not however gentlemen, prolong this trespass upon your time—but before I set down, will ask to offer to you this sentiment:

The city of Savannah—The liberal and enlightened policy of the state, seconding the intelligence and enterprise of her citizens, will yet restore her commercial prosperity.

6. George M. Troup—His cool judgment and fixed determination, have triumphantly established the rights of our state.

7. Poland—Often has her soil been moistened with the blood of her patriots; may it now be the grave of her oppressors.

8. Louis Philippe, of France—May he realise the idea of a patriot king, and prepare his subjects to become freemen.

9. Modern philanthropists—Full and free exercise to their sickly sentiments, at home.

10. Education—The brightest national ornament, the surest basis upon which a republic can erect its permanency and its glory.

11. Lafayette—The champion of liberty in both hemispheres: If chains and dungeons await him in the eastern, an asylum and a home are his in the western world.

12. The memory of judge Davies.

13. The fair—May they ever frown on the advocates of disunion.

POPULATION OF VIRGINIA.

The industrious editor of the "Winchester Republican" has presented a very interesting view of the population and taxation of Virginia—but the following results are all that it seems necessary for us to publish just now—intending hereafter to give the official accounts, of different censuses, in contrast by counties.

Trans-Alleghany counties—26.

Population, 1820	white	131,552

The exact number of the gross population is added up in the Richmond Enquirer, as being 1,211,252, which is probably correct; but we cannot make the figures before us tally with it by 319 persons.

The following will show the gradual increase of Virginia since the adoption of the constitution.

The whole increase of the white population since 1820 is 91,116—of which 51,693 are in the Trans-Alleghany counties—having gained that large amount on a capital of only 131,552, or at the rate of nearly 40 per cent.—whereas the tide-water counties have actually decreased in their white inhabitants, and the middle district, with 190,615 in 1820, and now 212,079, has advanced at the rate of only a little more than 11 per cent.

VIRGINIA, IN 1703.

The following census of Virginia, which was taken in 1703, presents a view of the strength of that colony one hundred and twenty-eight years ago. The statement, however, does not embrace the inhabitants of the Northern Neck, or the French Protestant refugees at Monachan town; these it was estimated would have increased the number of souls to near 70,000. The French refugees were sent over by king William, and had a rich territory assigned them twenty miles above the falls of James river, on the south side of the river

By an economical application and investment of these funds, the state will be enabled after the completion of the canal, which will shortly be effected, rapidly to extinguish the public debt on canal loans." On Saturday, M. de Belleyme, as president of the tribunal de premiere instance, delivered the following judgment in the case of M. Dumonteil, who after having been admitted into holy orders, quitted the church and wished to marry, but was opposed by his father, and refused the ceremony by the civil magistrate:—

"Considering that neither the political institutions nor the civil laws of the country expressly confirm the disqualification on entering into holy orders, and as the charter of 1830 has established a profound distinction between the affairs of the state and those of the church, and inasmuch as the concordat cannot give to the canons the binding force of civil law; considering also that these canons can be only applicable to those who minister at the altar, and that Dumontiel, jun. has renounced the priesthood, and consequently is no longer subject to ecclesiastical government: the court quashes the opposition formed by Dumonteil, senior, against the marriage of his son and orders that it shall be celebrated before the mayor of the —— arrondissement of Paris."

We understand that orders have been given for the execution of several public works, for which the sums annexed have been appropriated:—

Place de la Bastile, 20 000fr.; Place St. Benoit, 900; Rotonde du Temple, 1,100; Place du Pantheon, 24,000; Quay de l'Hospital 3,000; Boulevard de la Barriere du Throne, 20,000; Boulavard de la Barriere de Charonne, 20,000; Avennes to the Church of Nutre Dame de Lorrette, 30,000; Place de la Madeleine, 8,000; improvements at the prisons, 250,000, &c. &c. making a total of 1,881,000 francs.

STATUE OF NAPOLEON.

Report to the king of the French.

Sire—Fifteen years ago the statue which crowned the column of the Place Vendome, that monument of immortal victories, was destroyed. This, mutilation still exists, and is a sad vestige of foreign invasion.

Monuments serve as history; they are like her, inviolable; they ought to preserve all national recollections, and yield only to the ravages of time.

Certain it is, that history will not forget the name of the great captain, whose genius presided over our victorious legions—of the able monarch, who caused order to succeed anarchy—restored her altars to religion—and gave society that immortal code which still governs us; happy had it been, had his glory cost nothing to the liberty of his country.

Your majesty must be unwilling to destroy a single brilliant page of our history; you admire all that France admires, and are proud in whatever the nation takes pride.

I believe I respond to these noble sentiments in proposing to your majesty the replacing of the statue of Napoleon upon the column of the Place Vendome.

The reign of your majesty has restored to France all her independence, with all her freedom. It should obliterate every trace of a terrible reaction; henceforth, no glory should rest in the shade; no great reminiscence should be denied to France, by any species of jealous timidity. The generous and popular principles on which the constitutional government of your majesty is founded, should guarantee France forever, from the evils attached to absolute power, and the policy of conquerors. But in rendering honor to great renown; in again raising the monument which consecrates a remembrance in which France glories; the king forms, in some sort, a bond between the throne and the country; and I am bold enough to believe that the decree which I submit for the royal sanction, will be regarded as a just homage to public opinion, and as a new and brilliant proof of the strength and justice of a government, which like that of your majesty is entirely national.

I am, sire, with the most profound respect, your majesty's most humble and most obedient servant,

The president of the council, and minister secretary of state, for the interior, CASIMIR PERIER.

On the 8th April, an ordonnance was published in the official journal, in the following words:—

"The statue of Napoleon shall be replaced on the column of the Place Vendome.

THE ENGLISH WARS.

A late English paper gives some very interesting statements of the money paid out by Old England, during the sixty-five years of war, which she has waged, since the year 1688. The war which commenced that year, lasted nine years, and ended with the treaty at Ryswick: expenses, £.26,000,000

The war of the Spanish succession, commenced in 1705, and ended in 1713: cost, 62,500,000

The Spanish war of 1739, ended in 1748, by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle: cost, 54,000,000

The old French war commenced in 1756, and ended in 1763, by the treaty of Paris: cost, 112,000,000

The American revolutionary war, commenced in 1775, and ended by the treaty of peace, in 1783: this cost the sum of 186,000,000

The French revolutionary war of 1793, ended in 1802: expenditures of the English government during this period were, 464,000,000

The war against Bonaparte, began in 1803, and ended in 1815: during that time England's expenses, (which probably included the expenditures of the late American war), were, 1,150,000,000

Total,	£.2,054,500,000
During the Spanish war, the government borrowed	£.20,000,000
Spanish succession,	3 ,500,000
Spanish war of 1739,	29,000,000
Old French war,	60,000,000
American revolution,	104,000,000
French revolution,	201,000,000
War against Bonaparte,	411,000,000
Raised by taxes, during these 65 years of war	893,000,000
Total,	£.2,054,500,000

This period ends with the general peace of 1815. What an immense sacrifice of money, and also of human life, in those seven wars. These were not wars for preserving the integrity of the English government: they were mostly wars of conquest, or wars of intervention, to help one nation to crush another. How many millions more might be added to this fearful amount by searching among the archives of the English East India Company during their bloody wars of conquest and extermination against the natives of the East?

The annals of those wars, with an accurate account of the horrid butcheries and cruelties, practised by the troops of the honorable company, will never see the light. How many of these millions went to subsidize Prussia, Austria, Russia and the petty German states, to fight against Bonaparte? How many of these millions went to pay foreign troops to fight in the ranks of Old England, against our own armies, during the war of the revolution?

These inquiries are not made to create any national hostile feeling at this time against the English; but these statements are truths drawn from history, and are very proper for reflection and instruction.

The money thus worse than wasted, and the labor of the men engaged in those seven wars, combined, would have built the city of London entire, of granite and marble! would have raised her towers and monuments to vie with those now crumbling at Rome. What a blind policy has swayed the minds of the successive English cabinets during the last century?—What a spectacle would it present, had we the means of stating the loss of English lives, in those wars, together with the money expended, and the lives lost, by the nations engaged in opposing the arms of Britain. It would be oppressive to contemplate it.

We gladly turn from this gloomy picture, to dwell with rapture upon the present glorious and prosperous condition of our own country, at peace with the world, and at peace with itself. The people seem to be turning their attention from political broils, and are uniting with their best energies and means, to connect all the important points of the country, by internal communications. And, considering all our privileges, political, religious and social, where is there one who is not proud of his country and of her institutions?

BRITISH STOCKS.

From the N. Y. Daily Advertiser.

Very few persons are aware of the great fluctuations which take place in the British funds, and of the immense changes which are thereby made in the value of property in the stocks of that country. A mercantile friend has favored us with a statement of the lowest and highest prices of the 3 per cent. consols and reduced 3 per cents. each year, from 1779 to 1823 inclusive, and the greatest variation for that period, making 44 years—he has considered the two kinds of 3 per cents. for this purpose as one kind, they paying the same interest.

It will be seen by this statement that the smallest variation during any one year is 3 3-4 per cent. and the greatest 23 3 4 per cent. the probability of a war with France in 1792, the bank restriction and mutiny in the fleets 1797, the depreciation of bank notes from the restriction in 1797 onwards, the peace of Amiens in 1801, the renewal of the war in 1803, war with the United States in 1812, the peace of Paris in 1814, and the return of Bonaparte in 1815, produced greater influence on the funds than other events between the periods stated. The highest price was in the early part of 1792 at the time of Mr. Pitt's celebrated speech on the finances, and the lowest at the time of the bank restriction May 1797.

In 1817 the variation was 21 1-2 per cent. equal to 172 millions of pounds sterling on a debt of 800 millions—in 1820 it was 3 3-4 per cent. equal on the same amount to 30 millions. These facts show the uncertain value of a description of property so liable to be effected by political and other events, and show also the disastrous effects on the fortunes and happiness of individuals, which are produced by such rapid and extreme changes.

Highest and lowest prices of 3 per cent. consols and 3 per cent. reduced, from 1779 to 1823, inclusive.

STATE OF IRELAND.

The Newry Telegraph, says—It is really a melancholy spectacle to witness the crowds of families that, day after day pass through Newry, on their way to Warrenpoint, to embark for America. These, too consist—not of the idle and worthless, hundreds of whom could be happily spared,—but of the industrious and the able, of that class which may justly be considered as constituting an essential part of the heart's blood of the country,—the "bold peasantry, a nation's pride,"—such is, with very few exceptions, indeed, the description of persons now leaving, or about to leave the land of their fathers, in search of that which we ardently hope they will not fail to obtain—namely, an independent subsistence, for themselves and their offspring, in a distant country. Besides one vessel, (the Josephine), which, with about 160 passengers sailed nearly a month ago, for New York, the following have already sailed, or cleared out for the British possessions in North America:—Billow, for St. John's with 156 passengers; Princess Charlotte, for Quebec, 266 ditto; Pilgrim, for Quebec, 170 ditto; Tarbolton, for Quebec, 286 ditto. Total number of passengers, 938: of which five-sixths are Protestants. There are three others at present taking in the full complement of passengers for the same destination.

The Enniskillen Reporter, says—The oldest persons with whom we have conversed, never remember to have witnessed such a spirit of emigration as prevails in this country at present. Hundreds of persons are daily passing through this town, and from this country, to Derry, and Newry, and Belfast, to embark, in general, for British America; and it is much to be lamented that it is the useful and industrious class that are going—principally Protestants—and persons able to take some capital with them; who, if encouraged at home, could benefit the country and themselves by the outlay of capital in useful speculations, if, at least, countenanced, if not securely encouraged by the government.

☞ We see many other paragraphs of the like character—the rush from Ireland to America, promises to be alarmingly great in the present year—but they are flying from starvation, and we hope that, through honest labor, they may find plenty in our land.

The "Baltimore Chronicle" has an essay concerning Ireland, from which we make the following extract, as shewing some of the causes of the distresses of Ireland—

Edinburg Review, vol. 43, page 483. "We find in the evidence of no less an authority than Mr. Leslie Foster, that the annual income which is derived from tithes in Ireland by the parochial clergy, amounts to £600,000; and that they possess in addition to this, 83,000 acres of Glebe land, worth on an average £.1 per acre. We also find in the same evidence, that the estates of the bishops consist of 617,593 Irish acres, which are equal to about 990,000 English acres. If we take the average income of the twenty-two Irish bishops at so low a rate as £.10,000, the account of the charge, at this very moderate estimate, for the support of the established clergy will be as follows:

Received from tithes by the parochial clergy, per annum			£.600,000
Received from Glebe lands,	do.	do,	83,000
22 bishops, at £.10,000 each,	do.	do.	220,000
Lutherans,	do.	do.	11,160

Vol. 41, page 378. "Place yourselves," says Mr. Wakefield, "in the situation of a half-famished cottager, surrounded by a wretched family clamorous for food; and judge what his feelings must be, when he sees the tenth part of the produce of his potatoe-garden exposed at harvest time to public cant; or if, (as is most common), he has given a promissory note for the payment of a certain sum of money, to compensate for such tithe, when it becomes due, to hear the heart-rending cries of his offspring clinging around him, and lamenting for the milk of which they are deprived by the cow's being driven to the pound to be sold to discharge the debt." He mentions many other melting particulars, which he has witnessed.

Vol. 41, page 383. "With respect to the second great branch of our inquiry, or that which has for its object to discover the causes of the extreme poverty and destitution of the Irish peasantry, we believe it would be correct to say, that the oppression and misgovernment to which they have been so long subjected have had, even in this respect, a very powerful influence. Political degradation, most frequently leads to extreme poverty."

Dr. McMahon, the Roman Catholic bishop, of Killaloe, in the county of Clare, has just addressed to the peasantry of his diocese, a pastoral letter, from which we extract the following interesting and forcible passage.

"The lord lieutenant has been pleased to invite me, accompanied by my clergy, to a gracious interview, in order to consult together about the peace and prosperity of this distracted country. Nothing could exceed the wise and benevolent views expressed by his excellency, as to the means most likely to remedy the evils and remove the cause from which the present disorganized state of the country took its rise. But nothing can be done till peace be restored. His excellency, well acquainted with the horrors of war, wishes to avoid proceedings of blood; and while he holds the olive branch in one hand, he will, if necessary, unsheath the sword with the other. He declares he will come to no terms with a deluded people, while they are in open violation of the laws of the land: his humane views, and the best exertions of the friends of the country, will be useless, unless peace and subordination be immediately restored. If not, martial law will be proclaimed, and destruction and devastation will necessarily follow: the country may be laid in ashes; hundreds shot or brought to the gibbet; and thousands of widows and orphans thrown houseless and helpless on the world. Recollect the saying of the apostle—'the governor does not carry the sword in vain, but as a terror to evil-doers!' This day, then, good and evil is placed before you—bloodshed and ruin, or peace and prospects of redress. Make your choice in time—depend on it, a moment is not to be lost."

☞Let our friends rejoice with us—we have "heard" from mister Thomas Ritchie, being "pricked;"* and behold! he has thus delivered himself—in roman, italics and SMALL CAPITALS:

"A word to Mr. Hezekiah Niles!

"We are preparing to enlarge our paper—Our arrangements have been delayed by circumstances, which were beyond our controul. It will give us "verge and scope enough" for the discussion which Mr. N. has invited, upon the principles and consequences of the tariff—In the very first number we will put forth the propositions which we should wish to discuss. As soon as Mr. N. shall agree to that course of discussion, we will forthwith proceed to enter upon it—This arrangement will be accompanied with some delay—but it will have the advantage of bringing us nearer to the session of congress—and of avoiding some of the heats of the dog-days.

"In the meantime, we invite Mr. Niles to re-consider the opinion he expressed in 1828, upon the present "bill of abominations"—We should like to know, whether he still retains the same favorable opinions of this amiable measure! It is a writer in the "Banner of the Constitution," signing himself "A MANUFACTURER, but not an advocate of high duties" who refreshes our memory with the following extract: "The act of 1828," (says Mr. Niles), "the act of 1828 was projected, arranged and passed—as we confidently believe—on principles disreputable to the congress of the United States. There is no manner of doubt in our mind, from much personal observation, and some private knowledge, that it was the result of a POLITICAL COMPROMISE OR BARGAIN."

This is good news. When "verge and scope" enough are obtained, we shall have a discussion—but an awfully lengthy one seems threatened. It has a fearful looking to a "world of words"—more extensive than that which was occupied by the never-read-by-any-body-author of the "GOLDEN CASKET" who long held absolute dominion over the heavy columns of the "Richmond Enquirer," and was sleepless himself, give to his readers sleep—i. e. if they attempted to read.* Must I enlarge the "Register," to get "verge and scope enough" for this discussion? To enter upon this proceeding seems to have required an effort on the part of Mr. Ritchie of no small magnitude, "at this momentous crisis"—and to be beaten after such a tremendous gathering of force will hardly be dishonor, when such a veteran commands the attack. But—"let him come on," and quickly! I care little what sort of "propositions" he shall put forth—the selection of the ground and of the weapons, are left altogether to himself, only desiring that we may not battle about speculative nothings, or attempt to make a stand on points so fine and thin and ghostly, as Mr. McDuffie's. And, whether Mr. Ritchie shall "come on" with a quill plucked from the wing of the Condor, whose resting place is far in air above the highest peak of the "eternally snow-capt Chimborazo"—or use the feather of a foul bird that caws, and caws and caws, and consumes the corn as it begins to germinate—or attack me with a pen of iron, is a matter of indifference: I hope to grapple him in some way, and put down the theories of his closet by practical operations of that policy which I have so long and heartily supported. At any rate, we may amuse the public—and I have much love for the saying of old Job—"O, that mine enemy had written a book!" But still, I have strong objections to the delay. Mr. Ritchie would instruct the members of congress—I would reason with their masters, the free people of the United States: and I will soon speak to them, hoping for a kind hearing, for my cause is their cause.

The gentleman, perhaps, may think it rash—but the opinion that I expressed of the tariff of 1828 will not be withdrawn. That it was "conceived in sin and supported in iniquity," I do most firmly believe; but that much greater good than was expected has flowed from it, I am happy to admit. The words quoted—"bill of abominations," are not mine; but if it shall better please Mr. Ritchie, I am ready to adopt them, as applicable to what is afterwards stated—to wit: that the bill was projected, arranged and passed—"on principles disreputable to a congress of the United States"—"that it was the result of POLITICAL COMPROMISE OR BARGAIN."

Mr. Ritchie, certainly, has altogether forgotten the history of the tariff bill of 1828, or he would not have brought forward this extract from Mr. Raguet's wandering "Banner of the Constitution." Does he not know that the whole matter was wrested from the hands of Mr. Mallary and other undoubted friends of the "American System" by the agency of the southern members of congress—that the great and important amendments offered by the gentleman named, obtained the vote of only one gentleman south of the Potomac—that Virginia gave but one vote against the high and really oppressive duty

*The "Richmond Whig" of the 9th inst. speaking of my enquiry as to what had become of Mr. Ritchie, in the "Register" of the 4th, had the following paragraph, which it is pretty manifest brought out Mr. R's "word to Mr. Hezekiah Niles" in the "Richmond Enquirer" of the 10th. We thank Mr. Pleasants for his help in this matter. He seems to have accomplished his purpose, in obtaining a "committal!"

From the Richmond Whig, of June 9.

"No! No! Friend Hezekiah. If you expect to get footing in the columns of the Richmond Enquirer, by means of this threatened controversy, you will find your self mistaken. Depend on it, that immaculate sheet will never be contaminated with any of your tariff speculations. Is it not much better for its readers to have your opinions and facts compressed and set forth in the deductions of its worthy editor! You cannot be so unreasonable as to think otherwise, particularly as by passing through this crucible your notions will be more readable, and improved, both in the sense and style."

*I have good "authority" for thus using the word if; in the following line from an old epitaph; but had I needed such authority, I could have found it half-a-dozen times in any half column of Mr. R's controversial essays—even since he spoke of the "republican party," and the famous Van-Buren-Crawford caucus of Feb. 1824, when sixty-six private gentlemen at Washington attempted to make a president of the United States—or since the time when, as if with Prospero's wand, he transformed a political Caliban [as he esteemed it] into "a thing divine—for nothing natural" can be so noble as that which he worships, and offers the homage of a virgin heart to! But to the "authority"— on coarse wool—only one against the ridiculous increase of the duty on molasses, since repealed, in shame, by the acts of those who imposed it; that these high duties had the support of the late "nuisance and curse," but present mild and useful philosopher of Roanoke—the immortal minister for St. Petersburg! That he who was claimed as "our man" by a drab-gaitered Yorkshireman at Washington, voted for these and other repulsive items—that the present secretary of state, Mr. Livingston, supported them—that Mr. Gilmer, the present governor of Georgia, "found it difficult to bring his mind to pursue such a "SYSTEM OF LEGISLATION?" We have abundant materials at hand to shew the "disreputable principles" that we spoke of—and had not these principles prevailed among the southern members in "combination," the tariff law of 1828 would not have passed! They sustained the bill, as reported, until the final vote, when they wheeled about—and the other [great] party, believing that if there was much evil in the bill there was also some good, accepted and carried it, because it was the best that they could get*—hoping that some of its most obnoxious features might be removed thereafter; as the duty on molasses has been, and the frauds then feared, as to the introduction of foreign woollen goods, attempted to be checked, by subsequent acts—for which purpose the bill of 1830 was prepared and introduced by the committee on manufactures. But that law is, unhappily defective, through the ingenuity and perjury of foreign adventurers, sent hither to cheat the government and wrong the people of the U. States. There are yet, however, several important items in this bill which are really injurious—instance, the high duty on coarse wool, which has had effect nearly to destroy the manufacture of coarse cloths and advance the price of them considerably, without rendering the least benefit to our farmers—and the increased duty on indigo, which materially increases the cost of manufacture in the U. States, without doing good to the planters. A like remark, perhaps, might be made about flax. It is well known that these things were forced into the bill, and kept there by the votes of the south, to render it so odious that the friends of the American System would reject it. So much for the "disreputable principles" that we ascribed to the management of this bill.

On the latter point—that it was "the result of political compromise or bargain," we have overflowing testimony: and to shew Mr. Ritchie how well we are posted-up on the subject generally, we shall make a reference that he must highly respect! .

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEB. 5, 1829.

"The house then proceeded to the consideration of the bill to repeal the tonnage duty on vessels.

"After certain other amendments were proposed, Mr. Kremer then proposed that the committee of ways and means, be instructed to include in the bill, a provision to abolish the duties on sugar, tea and coffee.

"Mr. Hamilton, of South Carolina, said:

"We all know how the tariff was passed, in its fell swoop embracing all interests. Do not, therefore, let us begin by partial remedies; if we commence in one section of the union to take off its burdens, we shall end where we begin. Our only security for a common participation of all, in the benefits of a repeal of this odious system, is the common suffering of the various members of this union, which is infinitely more likely than an abstract case of justice to procure relief.

"It is true, that the tariff was enacted during the strife for the chief magistracy of this republic, and equally true that we have been justly rebuked by a British minister in his place in parliament, for permitting this measure to be governed by the POLITICAL CALCULATIONS OF THAT EVENT. The truth of which no member of this house would have the hardihood to deny. If there was such a man present, he challenged him to come forward. From the evils of such legislation the country called loudly for redress."

*The passage of the bill, also, again sanctioned an important principle—that it was the right and duty of congress to protect the national industry; which, of itself, was very interesting, and perhaps worth the vote, at that particular period.

No man better knew than Mr. Hamilton the secret motives and movements of the members of congress, on the occasion referred to. There was great difficulty to persuade some of the most earnest friends of the "American System" to vote for the bill—as it was. I have some personal knowledge of this. We believed it far short of what the interests of the nation required, in some respects—and decidedly injurious in others. It was generally accepted, however, by them, as containing more good than evil, though several felt yet compelled to vote against it, and were found in the negative: but look at the vote of New York and Kentucky—then the chief battle grounds of political parties! Does any one believe that 27 of the 33 members present from New York were really friendly to the protecting system—that the 12 from Kentucky were unanimously in favor of it? I cannot! On the other hand, how shall we believe that every member from Tennessee was really against that system? The votes of New York, Kentucky, and Tennessee had never shewn such complexions before—nor have they since. Well then might Mr. Hamilton so boldly, if not rudely, declare that "POLITICAL CALCULATIONS" had governed the passage of the bill—seeing that he himself had voted with John Randolph and C. C. Cambreleng, and even that most consistent and mild of all the politicians—the long-speaking and hair-splitting, Mr. MCDUFFIE to impose excessive duties on coarse wool and molasses, &c. These fell into the trap that had been set to "catch the northern weasel." Because they went through "thick and thin" for certain obnoxious parts of the bill, they calculated a return of the compliment on the final vote, and a defeat of the whole project. But the hearts of certain of the "combined" forces were stricken with fear—they were compelled to abandon "their southern friends," and the latter uttered many and loud grumblings about it.

FLOUR AND COTTON. The latest accounts from England afford us no reason to hope a beneficial change in the price of these staples. The free-trade-prohibitory corn laws operate against the first, and over-production has reduced the selling value of the last. We must more and more eat our own bread, and spin and consume our own cotton. Flour at Baltimore has been steady during the week at 4½ dollars per barrel. The stock of old wheat has been much reduced, and it seems probable that the crop just ready for the sickle will not be a heavy one. In many parts, it has been almost totally cut off by the fly, which made great progress during the dry weather in the early part of last month.

The Ontario (N. Y.) Messenger, speaking of wool, says—The prices of this article, in our market, the present season, have, thus far, on an average, been at least 100 per cent. higher than they were last year. From 35,000 to 40,000 lbs. have been bought, by our merchants, in the last two weeks, for which they have paid from 40 to 75 cents. Farmers who intend to sell their wool, should immediately improve the opportunity now presented, as the present high prices cannot be long maintained.

A VERY INTERESTING WORK is about to be published—entitled a "History of the Indian tribes of North America, with biographical sketches and anecdotes of the principal chiefs, embellished with one hundred and twenty portraits from the Indian gallery, in the department of war, at Washington."

These portraits were executed from nature, and intended, by the dress and ornaments of the subjects, to hand down to posterity the red-man as he was—They will be accurately copied and colored under the able supervision of Messrs. Childs and Inman, of Philadelphia—the biographical notices, &c. will be from the pen of col. McKenney, who so long had charge of the Indian bureau at Washington. It is designed to be brought out in a magnificent manner—and to preserve a correct representation and account of the chiefs of the just past, or passing, generation of Indians. It will be published in twenty numbers, each containing six portraits.

The "Indian gallery," at Washington, was, in the uproar about "retrenchment and reform," attacked by several ephemeras in and out of congress;—but, unless destroyed by fire or some other accident, it will remain as a monument to the national honor longer than a belief can be entertained that our country ever held things so mean as to snarl at the cost of collecting it, unless the fact is preserved because of its remarkable littleness; as is that which refers to MILTON'S PARADISE LOST—for the copy-right of which a bookseller refused to give ten pounds. The latter, however, was the act of a private individual—the former of men honored with high public places, whose names will soon be forgotten—though a lively and contemptuous remembrance of their doings will be cherished, while the gallery endures and presents to man a faithful history of his fellow.

FAYETTEVILLE. It is suppposed, says the National Intelligencer, that, by the destruction of the town of Fayetteville, three thousand souls were suddenly rendered houseless and destitute of the present means of subsistence. Provisions, furniture, clothing, and every thing shared the common destruction; and this in a country thinly settled, and comparatively poor. A passenger from the south saw twelve hundred of the sufferers in one body, encamped in the neighboring woods. These distressing facts must appeal irresistibly to every heart not made of flint, and prompt even the poorest to contribute his mite.

A gentleman in Fayetteville, under date of May 31, writes his brother, that there is but one block of buildings standing in that town. For a mile in length, and half a mile width, there is not a house standing. It is peculiarly fortunate that no lives were lost in the general conflagration. Since the fire several people have died, probably from excessive anxiety and fatigue. The town affords no medicine for the sick, and provisions are said to be 100 per cent. advance. The case of our distressed fellow-citizens in Fayetteville, calls for the humane and charitable disposition of all. Hundreds of those who were in comfortable circumstances before the fire, found themselves, by the act of Providence, reduced immediately to absolute penury and want, without the means of providing for themselves and families food and raiment; they had not where to lay their heads. The distress is general throughout the whole community; they are all sufferers, without the means of administering to each other's relief.

"I am ruined, having lost every thing in my store—all my notes, books and accounts—all my provisions, corn, flour and bacon, and some money. My house was also burned, and we saved nothing but our beds and part of our clothes. All my furniture, such as tables, bureaus, sideboard, bedsteads, &c. nearly all gone. I have nothing left to eat or drink, and am dependent upon charity, and must make an appeal to you, and through you to the charitable of your place, in behalf of my wife and children.

The town of Norfolk, Va. has sent 2,500 dollars to the relief of the sufferers at Fayetteville, besides 104 dollars subscribed by two masonic lodges. Philadelphia has forwarded 5,000 dollars, and would probably send at least as much more. New York was going on handsomely in the work of benevolence; and other cities and towns were preparing to lend a helping hand. If the many would give a little of what they could spare, this almost unprecedented calamity might be a little relieved.

At Boston, the meeting was addressed by Mr. Webster, and 2,000 dollars instantly forwarded in anticipation of subscriptions to be made, and a schooner was chartered to proceed forthwith to Fayetteville, laden with provisions.

The corporation of Petersburg, Va. has voted 700 dollars from the Fire Subscription Fund for the relief of Fayetteville, and the people of the town have contributed about 1,000 more.

Baltimore has forwarded $2,000 in anticipate of subscriptions—and the "Mechanical Fire company" out of their own small means, (because of the constant expense of their powerful apparatus), have sent on $100, to relieve a calamity the range of which they might have limited, had they been present when and where it happened. The sympathies of the people seem every where roused. We shall probably have the pleasure of registering a long list of benefactions.

The following strong address of the Boston committee, on behalf of the people of Fayetteville, is applicable to all the parts, and all the people of the United States, and we take pleasure in laying it before our readers, hoping that it may excite some to make a small but kind exertion to relieve a case of unparalleled privation:

The committee appointed at a meeting held at Faneuil Hall on Friday last, for the purpose of adopting measures for affording relief to the sufferers by the late disastrous fire at Fayetteville, inform their fellow citizens, that they have appointed the committee specified in the subjoined list, to receive subscriptions from all persons residing within their respective districts, who may be disposed to contribute towards this charitable object. It must be quite unnecessary for the committee to say any thing to excite the sympathy of this community, for the unfortunate sufferers on this occasion.—The result of all similar appeals has shown how universally the obligation is recognized among us, of contributing, each according to his ability, to the relief of our fellow citizens, however remotely they may be situated, whenever it is apparent that they are suffering under a dipensation of Providence too severe in its effects, and too extensive in the sphere of its visitation, to find adequate relief from the charity of those who are nearer to the seat of the calamity. Such the committee believe unquestionably the present case. Fayetteville was one of the largest towns of the state of North Carolina, containing nearly three thousand inhabitants. It was compactly built, containing a good proportion of large and commodious houses, and several handsome churches and other public buildings. It had recently suffered some diminution of its population from the decline of its commercial business, yet its inhabitants enjoyed a good degree of prosperity and affluence. The surrounding country, for a great distance, is very thinly peopled. The nearest village is twenty miles and the nearest considerable town fifty miles distant from it. Thus situated, this ill-fated town, the centre of population and wealth, and the chief seat of civilization in a country of a hundred miles in extent, is suddenly swept out of existence by a frightful conflagration. The inhabitants who rose in the morning in the enjoyment of comfort and affluence, who repaired to their respective churches for the morning services in a state of quiet and supposed security, were called before the day closed to see their dwellings in flames, their property destroyed and their town a heap of ruins. Instead of retiring at night to their beds, after the fatigues of this disastrous day, they found themselves even without a refuge in the charity of neighbors, for the houses which remained were far too few to furnish them even a shelter.

In the number of two thousand persons, thus cut off from the resources of present comfort and of future subsistence, many must be reduced to a condition of extreme suffering, unless relieved by the hand of charity, and the relief to be afforded them from this source must be entirely disproportioned to the urgency of the case, unless it is promptly furnished from remote places. Under these circumstances, the citizens of Boston, have taken measures to collect and to send forward the aid which the benevolence of individuals may prompt them to contribute, and appointed us their agents for the performance of this duty. The committee hope that no individual appointed on the committees for receiving subscriptions will shrink from the duty assigned him, as it is only by the faithful discharge of these duties by every individual that the benevolence of the community can be efficiently exerted. It is hoped also that our citizens when called on for their contributions, while they bestow their bounty according to their own estimate of their ability and obligation, will lighten the labors of the collecting committees as far as possible, by relieving them from the necessity of repeated calls.

DANIEL WEBSTER, for the committee.

MESSRS. BRANCH AND EATON. Every one at all acquainted with the state of things, as they were said to exist at Washington previous to the extinction of the late "cabinet," must have ascribed the bold defiance hurled at Mr. Branch, through the "Globe" newspaper [see page 252], to Mr. Eaton, late secretary of war—and the subjects referred to are thought to be also well understood; having a delicate relation to matters which, surely, ought not to have disturbed the harmony of the "cabinet" and to which Mr. Branch probably alluded when speaking of "malign influences," and saying, that he had gone as far to prevent "discord" as "a man of honor could go," &c. With reference to this defiance, the "Richmond Enquirer" says—

"We re-publish an article from the last No. of the Washington Globe. It is impossible to mistake the hand that is in this thing.—Whether Mr. Branch will take up the gauntlet thus thrown down to him by Mr. Eaton, we are unable to conjecture.—It is one of those scenes in the political drama which may prepare the way for some event calculated to interest our readers. As such we lay it before our readers. At the same time, that we must deeply regret the prosecution of such a controversy in such a spirit, as must array against each other two gentlemen, who were natives of the same state and neighborhood, pupils of the same school,* intimate friends for so many years, and lately members of the same cabinet and politicians of the same school."

☞ The letter of Mr. Branch, dated 31st May, and published in our last, would rather shew that he will not "take up the gauntlet," though he could not have known that it would be so roughly cast before him when he made that very singular exposition—which exhibits, in our apprehension, much want of firmness of character, according with what we have hitherto heard attributed to him. We suppose, therefore, that he will quietly submit to the severe imputations made upon him in the "authorised" article in the "Globe"—and the bold invitation given to "act like a man."

The "Telegraph," on publishing the "authorised" article, lifts the veil a little, and remarks—

"This publication is perfectly in character with the blind infatuation which presumes upon the ignorance of the American people. Why this idle gasconade about an appeal to God or the country? Does the individual who authorised this publication, suppose that it will be a substitute for a duel, or the verdict of a jury? Does any one suppose that he who intends to fight, would publish his challenge in the Globe? No!

> "True courage scorns
> To vent her prowess in a storm of words,
> And to the valiant actions speaks alone." And > "There is no courage but in innocence."

"We are told that 'an honest cause always looks with confidence to an issue which depends on an appeal to God or the country!!' Are we to understand this as a threat, that the "individual" in question is prepared to put the test of these "hinted slanders" before a jury of the country, whenever an accuser 'whose standing in the country subjects him to the proper responsibilities' shall appear? Is this the tone and manner of 'a still and quiet conscience?' Would the individual in question put a good name, which should be dearer than life, on such an issue? That he would not, is made manifest by the fact that he did not, when emphatically challenged to do so. When there was a responsible accuser, no suit was then brought; and no one can suppose that such a proceeding is now contemplated. The authorised insertion of such an article in the Globe had another object. It was to silence inquiry, by making a false issue before the public. The delicacy of the subject, the difficulty of arriving at the truth, and usage, refer it to the decision of society. As far back as January, 1830, an ineffectual attempt to regulate this matter, of which we may hereafter have occasion to speak, was made through a distinguished member of congress; and the propriety of the refusal of the dismissed secretaries to permit the wishes of the executive to control the conduct of their families in relation to it, was for a long time acquiesced in by the president himself. But the "malign influence" at length prevailed. By constant importunity he has been induced to yield his own judgment, and put his own fame, the interests of the country, and of the republican party, upon a desperate attempt to control the private intercourse of society."

[There is more of it in the "Telegraph," but the preceding is enough. Without going into particulars which have long been the subject of common conversation and of late pretty plainly stated in a good many public newspapers, it is, perhaps, due to the information of some of our distant readers, as well as to a future understanding of the things hinted at in the various letters recorded by us, to say—that attempts are said to have been made to force the admission of the lady of Mr. Eaton into certain "families" at Washington—that the subjects relating thereto have long and oft been gravely discussed in "high places," but remained in a perplexed and perplexing state, because of the stand taken by the different parties—the one in earnestly pushing forward, and the other in resolutely resisting, the claims of the lady to that rank which the public employment of her husband was thought, on the one hand, to entitle her to hold—but would not be acknowledged, on the other, because of strong objections against her private, or personal, character. The "responsible accuser" mentioned in the "Telegraph," is understood to be one of the most brave and distinguished officers in the late war—who, at the very "cannon's mouth" earned two brevets, and stands high, indeed, in the public estimation as a worthy and good man.

These "hints," perhaps, are sufficient to explain some things which must appear obscure to those of our readers who are unacquainted with "circumstances" that are freely, and with great positiveness, spoken of; and if sufficient, it is all that we desire to say about them—now, henceforth, and forever, in this work—though perhaps, and most probably, a full exposure of them may be forced upon us, as "faithful chroniclers" of the events of the times, if sent forth under the sanction of names which shall give them "authority." We know nothing of these matters more than seems to be in the mouth of every body, presuming to some knowledge of affairs at the seat of government.]

The following significant queries from the "Telegraph," shew that things are ripening for a most unpleasant, if not disgraceful exposition of "circumstances." Indeed, it seems to us now impossible to avoid it, the parties being "committed." There is a boldness in the queries of the "Telegraph" that may well surprise every one.

"Will the Globe deny that Mr. Ingham, gov. Branch and Mr. Berrien were dismissed, because they refused to compel their families to associate with that of major Eaton?

"Will the Globe deny that, in January 1830, a member of congress waited upon these gentlemen, and informed them that it was the president's determination to remove them from office unless they conformed to his wishes in this respect?

* "Pupils of the same school!"—'intimate friends, &c. We think that the gentlemen were not brought up in the same school—and that it is only for a short period, indeed, that they harmonized on any point of general policy, as their opposing votes in the senate, and rigid preferences of adverse persons conclusively shewed. "Where as the friends of Mr. Crawford?" "Bought up," said John Randolph. ED. REG.

"Will the Globe deny that Mr. Van Buren availed himself of his peculiar situation to ingratiate himself into the favor of the president by urging the propriety of doing so?

"Will the Globe deny that these gentlemen gave an unqualified refusal; and that they, at that time, declared their readiness to give up their respective offices rather than hold them on such condition?

"Will the Globe deny that the 'malign influence' now controls the public patronage? If it does, we pledge ourselves to prove the truth of our assertions, either in a court of justice, or before a committee of congress."

"THE CABINET." We have not heard that Mr. Berrien had resigned the office of attorney-general, but the "Richmond Enquirer" of the 10th inst. says, as if by authority, that P. P. Barbour, esq. has declined that office. Mr. Berrien arrived at Washington on Tuesday last—and we shall soon know the result of the speculations about his place in the "cabinet."

Mr. White, of Tennessee, it is well known was offered and declined the place of secretary of war, on the resignation of Mr. Eaton. It is said since to have been offered to several gentlemen, among them col. Drayton, and declined—who, indeed, could not accept after being twice passed over. The report now is, that Mr. White, out of his strong personal attachment to the president, will give up his private feelings and wishes, and take the place for the time being—but it is also said, that he will make certain conditions as to the resignation of two persons, holding office at Washington.

"OFFICIAL." The war department has never been offered to any one but Mr. White, of Tennessee. He declined it in consequence of his recent domestic affliction, in the loss of his wife and some of his children. There is reason, however to believe, that he will make a sacrifice of his private feelings to the public service.

THE INDIANS. Six companies of United States troops left Jefferson barracks, at St. Louis, Missouri, on the 30th ult. accompanied by gen. Gaines, for Rock island, because of some existing difficulties between our citizens and the Sac and Fox indians in that neighborhood,—and gov. Reynolds, of Illinois, and gov. Miller, of Missouri, have called for a portion of the militia of those states, to hold themselves in readiness! There is no definite account of the origin of these disturbances, but the Indians, of course, are reported to be the aggressors. The mere presence of the troops will, probably, be sufficient to quiet any fears that may have been entertained of the fragments of the Indian tribes about Rock island. The calling out of the militia is much censured, and thought to be wholly unnecessary.

PEACE AMONG THE INDIANS. The Cherokees, Creeks, Osages, &c. bordering upon the territory of Arkansas, lately met together in council at Cantonment Gibson and arranged their differences, after much shew of hostile feelings and a fear of sudden mischief. Much credit for this is given to col. Arbuckle, Chilly McIntosh, and others.

NEW HAMPSHIRE. The legislature of this state commenced its session on the 1st inst. Mr. Franklin Pierce (ad.) was elected speaker of the house of representatives—for him 155, all others 58. The votes for governor at the late election being officially counted, there appeared for Mr. Dinsmore (ad.) 23,503, for Mr. Bartlett (op.) 18,681, and 110 scattering.

BOSTON. The ancient and honorable artillery company celebrated its 193rd anniversary on the 6th inst.—which is always a holiday at Boston. It was thought that 20,000 persons were present to witness the manœuvres of this company on the Common. It is made up of militia officers—colonels sometimes being privates in its ranks—and has been well called "the soul of the soldiery."

VERMONT. A fifth unsuccessful trial has been had to elect the yet "missing" member of congress from the state of Vermont, and a sixth attempt is to be made in Aug. There are three parties—National Republican—Anti-Masonic and Jackson. Mr. Allen had 3,538 votes, Mr. Baily 3,476, and 1,112 "scattering."

NORTH CAROLINA. The branch of the bank of the United States at Fayetteville, on application, has made a loan to the university of North Carolina, which is said to have been necessary to save it from a "most degraded condition."

TENNESSEE. The "Farmers' Journal," of Jonesborough, Ten. says that perhaps the upper counties of East Tennessee "were never so destitute of the necessaries of life as at the present time," and speaks of the growing crops of corn as unpromising. Adding, that some of the poorer classes were suffering for the want of bread! The wealthy, however, had begun the good work of relief—refusing to sell their produce, and distributing it among the poor and destitute of their several neighborhoods, to be paid for in future labor. It is not often that we hear of a state of things like this, in any part of the United States.

THE STEAM BOAT Home, one of the most splendid vessels on the western waters, took fire and was nearly destroyed, about four miles above Beaver Town, on the 28th ult. The flames spread with fearful rapidity, and a cry being made that there was gunpowder on board, the passengers, (about 50 men, women and children) jumped over-board, or were thrown into the river, to take their chance of being drowned in preference to being blown into atoms, and it wonderfully turned out that all were saved—the women being buoyed up by their clothes, until aid came to them.

The steam boats Coosa and Huntress lately came into contact on the Mississippi about 90 miles below the mouth of the Ohio, when the former sunk in three minutes, by which thirteen persons perished. The accident happened at 3 o'clock in the morning of the 14th May. An explosion of the boiler, because that the cold water of the river came into contact with it, adding to the horror and confusion of the passengers and crew, probably caused the loss of several lives.

The steam boats Charleston and Sylph recently encountered one another off Fredericksburg, Kentucky. A passenger on board the latter was crushed to death in his berth, and the vessel immediately sunk. The passengers lost all their baggage—so quickly did she go down.

The steam boats Orleans and Hudson have also had a butting match on the Mississippi, and both much injured.

The St. Louis Times, says—"The steam boat Missouri, in her passage down from Franklin, a few days ago, struck a snag, five or six miles below the mouth of the Osage river, and sunk immediately.

The steam boat Western Virginian exploded one of her boilers in Bayou Plaquemine, but no further injury was sustained.

The steam boat Philadelphia while landing a passenger about 15 miles below Fredericksburg, Virginia, struck a snag, which entered her bottom, and caused her sinking. No lives were endangered.

The whole loss of life because of the explosion of the general Jackson on the Hudson, is now counted up twelve—besides the maimed. Nothing has yet been offered in extenuation of this enormous outrage—perhaps, it ought to be called murder, for it seems to have resulted from a criminal disregard of human life.

STEAM VESSELS OF WAR. The French have 18 or 20 steam vessels of war. They are very important since the acquisition of Algiers, and exceedingly well fitted for the navigation of the Mediterranean the greater part of the year. The British are building several of these vessels. The first used for war-purposes was by the United States, on the suggestion of commodore Porter, though we have not now a single one in our service.

OUR GOLD MINES. We almost every week hear of the discovery of new and valuable gold mines in the south; and it is manifest that immense quantities of the precious metals are hidden under the surface of the earth, in large districts of Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee, and Alabama—though the latter, we believe are not yet much worked.

We received some time ago, (but mislaid it), a letter from a very respectable gentleman of Virginia, describing certain mines that had been discovered about 15 miles above Fredericksburg—the vein appearing to be several miles wide. The metal gathered is called dust gold—but we have no particulars of its product.

A late number of the "Petersburg Intelligencer" has the following article—

"I have just returned from a visit to the gold mines in Pittsylvania county, Virginia, and am thoroughly convinced, that with proper management, the business might be made very profitable.

While in Pittsylvania, I visited several mines, among which was the valuable one owned by Mr. William R. Haywood, of Pittsylvania, and Frances L. Royall, esq. of Halifax. There are several mines in the county, but none so valuable as this, which is generally thought to be the richest in the United States. The indications which present themselves on the surface of this mine are common; but its appearance in the vein underneath, is most singularly striking. The vein is composed partly of large white flint rocks, compactly laid, and presents the appearance of a perpendicular wall. Between these rocks are layers of hard clay, or dirt, of a copper color, mixed throughout with particles of gold. Large pieces of gold are also frequently found embedded in these solid rocks. This vein of rocks continues solid to water, after which is found what is termed "honey comb," or ore containing more gold than is found in any other substance in the mine. The ore seems to be a soft rock, remarkably porous, exhibiting all the symptoms of having once been in a state of fusion.—Gold is not the only metal which has been discovered in this mine. Several pieces of metal which at first seemed an anomaly, have been gathered, and after undergoing an analysis, were found to be a singular mixture of copper and silver in the crudest state. There is also found, crowded in the same vein, several minerals of different kinds—sulphur, Prussian blue, arsenic, pyrites, &c."

[The tract of land containing those mines was purchased, not long since, for a very trifling sum of money, and the working of them for gold soon abandoned; but the business was resumed under better instruction, and has become so important that the London mining company is said to have offered, through an agent, 150,000 dollars for one half the interest in this mine, or 275,000 for the whole of it.]

Speaking of the rich mines in Rowan county, North Carolina, it is said that every branch and rivulet in that region of the country, contains a great quantity of fine gold—indeed some pieces of four and five dwts. have been found. Some of these branches are worked with great success. The gold, too, is of a fine quality. A parcel recently sent to the mint, was sold for ninety-six cents per dwt. which must have been nearly pure.

And the "Petersburg Intelligencer" says—We were on Tuesday shewn a mass of virgin gold, taken from a mine in Mecklenburg county, N. C. of about 7 by 4 inches superfice, perhaps 3-4th of an inch thick, and weighing, as we were told, 60 ounces. It was in the possession of a Baltimore gentleman; and its value we were assured, was upwards of $1,000.

A new mine at Fair Forest, N. C. is said to yield from 4 to 8 dollars per day to the hand! This is really a golden business.

It is thought that the gold mines of the south employ about 2,000 men, and are producing at the rate of five millions a year! A large part of the laborers are foreigners, and to such also belong a chief part of the capital employed—and the most of the gold is sent, as it is found, to Europe: but if even so, a very considerable proportion of the general profit rests and must remain with us, in the subsistence of the laborers and supply of many things which they need. They make a handsome HOME-MARKET.

Humboldt's account of the gold and platina district of Russia. The following account is part of a letter from M. Humboldt to M. Arago.—"We spent a month in visiting the gold mines of Berisovsk, the malachite mines of Gumeselevski, and of Tagilsk, and the washings of gold and platinum. We were astonished at the pepilas (water-worn masses) of gold, from two to three pounds, and even from eighteen to twenty pounds, found a few inches below the turf, where they had lain unknown for ages. The position and probable origin of these alluvia, mixed generally with fragments of green stone, chlorite slate, and serpentine, was one of the principal objects of this journey. The gold annually procured from the washings amounts to 6,000 kil. The discoveries beyond 59 and 60 degrees latitude become very important. We possess the teeth of fossil elephants enveloped in these alluvia of auriferous sand. Their formation, consequent on local irruptions and on levelings, is, perhaps, even posterior to the destruction of the large animals. The amber and the lignites, which we discovered on the eastern side of the Ural, are decidedly more ancient. With the auriferous sand are found grains of cinnabar, native copper, ceylanites, garnets, little white zircons, as brilliant as diamonds, anatase, alvite, &c. It is very remarkable, that in the middle and northern parts of the Ural, the platinum is found only on the western European side. The rich gold washings of the Demidov family, at Nijnei-tagilsk, are on the Asiatic side, on the two acclivities of Bartiraya, where the alluvium of Vilkni alone has already produced more than 2,800 lbs. of gold.

The platinum is found about a league to the east of the separation of waters (which must not be confounded with the axis of the high summits), on the European side, near the course of the Oulka, at Sukoi Visnin, and at Martian. M. Schvetsov, who had the good fortune to study under Berthier, and whose learning and activity have been most useful during our travels in the Ural, discovered chromate of iron, containing grains of platinum, which an able chemist at Catherineburgh, M. Helm, has analyzed. The washings of platinum at Nijnei-tagilsk are so rich, that 100 puds (about 400 lbs. Russian) of sand afford 30 (sometimes 40) solotniks of platinum, whilst the rich alluvia of gold at Vilkni, and other gold washings on the Asiatic side, do not give more than 1½ or 2 solotniks in 100 puds of sand. In South America, a very low chain of the Cordilleras, that of Cali, also separates the auriferous and non-platiniferous sand on the eastern declivity, (Popayan), from the sands of the isthmus of the Raspadura of Choco, which are very rich in platinum as well as gold."

LAFAYETTE. The following letter has been handed to us, for the purpose of explaining the reason that the answer to the resolutions adopted by the citizens of Baltimore in relation to the French revolution, has never been received. [American.

"La Grange, 26th April, 1831.

"My dear friend—I have reason to fear my acknowledgements and those of the Prefect de la Seine for the great celebration in Baltimore in October last, the address to the people of France, and Mr. Wirt's speech on the occasion, have not reached you. My regret would be the greater, as the high sense of public French gratitude is united in my heart with the feelings of an American patriot and the particular devotion that binds me to the beloved city of Baltimore. Upon you, my dear general, I depend to do and say every thing that is proper, grateful and affectionate in the case, such as it will be when you receive my letter—Miscarriages that may have taken place are not to be attributed to the service of the packets, which is admirably done, but to the bustle of officers at the Hotel de Ville and elsewhere, the consequence of which I would much lament. This letter will be delivered by gen. Bernard, who will inform you of the state of affairs on this side of the Atlantic.

"Remember me very affectionately to family and friends, and believe me forever, your most affectionate brother soldier, LAFAYETTE."

Gen. Samuel Smith, Baltimore.

COTTON CROP. We learn from a respectable gentleman recently returned from a visit in the back part of this state and Georgia, that the prospect of the cotton crop is very unpromising. The season has been cool, and for several weeks there was but little rain. The several plantings were successively killed, when the plants reached a few inches in height; and our informant states that many planters in Abbeville, and the upper part of Edgefield, as well as in the counties on the opposite side of the river, in Georgia, had ploughed in their cotton, with the intention of supplying its place with corn. We are also informed that several hail storms have contributed not a little to this disastrous result. On the sea-board, we know that some have been obliged to plant cotton four times this season; and the planters in a more elevated and cooler region, may fairly be presumed to have suffered to a much greater extent. [Charleston Cour.

And a letter dated Wadesborough, May 28, says—"The cotton crops in this section are extremely unpromising. From what I can learn, our planters do not calculate on more than half an average crop, the cold weather having proved fatal to this kind of vegetation. In many cases, the stands have been cut off, and, to add to the distress, seed cannot be procured for the purposes of re-planting. Some of our farmers have ploughed up their fields and planted them in corn. I admit that it is, as yet, too soon to make a correct estimate of the ensuing crop, but these facts will have some consideration, and cotton holders will look to their interests."

☞ This is bad news—because we wish abundant products. But if the crop shall fall short one-fourth, the value of the residue, (it is very possible), may fully equal that of the the last year's heavy production. And, as the politicians of the south have attributed the reduced price of cotton; per lb. to the "abominable tariff," we must insist upon it, that they shall give us credit for any such increased value as may follow a DEFICIENT SUPPLY! This is altogether fair. We shall go further, and say—that if Brazil, in this season of revolutions, should have her cotton plantations destroyed, and the price of the article be raised 5 or 10 cents per lb. in consequence of such destruction, as it probably would be, we may contend that it is "all owing to the tariff!" and attempt to overthrow every law of reason and trade which relates to the prices of articles, because they are plenty or scarce!

COTTON CROP OF 1830. From the New York American, addressed to the editor—To correct some misrepresentations and erroneous impressions, you will much oblige a subscriber by publishing the subjoined view of the disposition of the last crop of cotton:

Already exported to Great Britain		406,264
To be shipped to Great Britain, without overstocking that market,	243,763
Already exported to France, against 156,612 at same time last year		59,264
To be shipped to France	85,000
Already exported to other continental ports against 32,410 at same time last year		15,307
To be shipped to these places	15,000
Consumption of the U. States		150,000
To lay over in the United States (some say more than 100,000),		75,000
	343,736	705,835

Assuming this calculation to be a reasonable one, the shippers after the present time (taking into view the reduced stocks in Great Britain and on the continent) may, with judicious management, prescribe prices that will leave them profitable results. And with this knowledge, will they permit their agents to sell at losing rates?

BRITISH REFORM. As noticed in our last, the "boroughmongers" have been completely overthrown. They confess themselves soundly beaten—in England, in Scotland and Ireland they have "suffered." Even the "tory city of Dublin" has deserted them. The Beresfords, the most filthy and foul cormorants that ever preyed on the vitals of the poor, have been compelled to give way, and lord Castlereagh would be beaten in Down. A rer. Mr. Mosley, having forbidden a ringing of the bells at Birmingham, because of the dissolution of parliament—the people, forgetting the priest in the person of a tory, warmly assailed him and he escaped with difficulty. But they "dusted his coat" for him.

Bell's Messenger says that wherever an attempt was made at the county meetings to cajole the poorer classes, it failed, the people remembering that it came from a quarter where no anxiety had ever before been shown for their rights.

"It was remarked by the lord chancellor upon this measure, that it was as old as the time of a well-known intriguer, some eighteen centuries ago, and quoted these verses from the gospel; "And Judas Iscariot said, why is not all this sold for three hundred pence, and given to the poor?" Not that he cared any thing for the poor, but because he was a thief."

Mr. Hobhouse in his address to the electors of Westminster, speaking of the report that sir Robert Peel had subscribed £50,000 to aid the cause of the boroughmongers, said "I wish he had subscribed one hundred thousand pounds, and that he should find one hundred thousand electors to take his money, and to laugh at him afterwards." He hoped that the noble duke who lived near the Strand, would subscribe three times that money. He hoped the duke would manure the lands of all Northumberland with his bank notes, and that every elector would drink a glass of good ale at the expense of that peer, and go then to vote for the popular candidate. The hon. baronet who subscribed that large sum, for the purpose of deceiving and defrauding the people of England, thought, no doubt, that he could not better employ the money which had, no doubt, been honestly earned by his father. That gentleman had ventured to assert, that there was a conspiracy entered into for the purpose of carrying the reform bill. * * * He (Mr. H.) remembered to have seen a somewhat similar complaint of conspiracy in the preface to the history of a great man, called Jonathan Wild, who, in some points of his character, had no small resemblance to other great men (laughter.)—Well, the author of that work (which, at the time of its publication, was considered to relate facts, and to represent circumstances so like those of every day occurrence, that it was called a "true history"), tells us that an ancestor of the great man was put to death by a conspiracy; that forsooth, twelve honest men were put into a box, and, having come to an understanding among themselves, they conspired to hang him [laughter.] So it was with the boroughmongers.

BRITISH NAVIGATION. We have received from our London correspondent (says the N. Y. Journal of Commerce) a general statement of the shipping employed in the trade of the United Kingdom, as laid before parliament. The totals from all parts of the world are as follows:

BRITISH MONOPOLY. The following extract from a speech of a warm-hearted Irishman, lately delivered at Belfast, is well worthy of notice on several accounts—but how strongly does it point to that jealousy of our commerce and manufactures to which we have so often alluded, and soon intend very fully to shew!

From the Alexandria Gazette.

No people are more enthusiastic and sincere in their admiration of our country, and our great men, than the Irish. Indeed, they cherish the glory of America with a warmth of affection as generous as it is characteristic. Their orators and their poets have vied with each other, in recording the honors of our heroes and statesmen.

We are led to these observations by the perusal of a speech delivered at a late meeting in Belfast, by Mr. Emerson; from which we make the following extract:

Mr. Emerson, being called on, spoke to the following effect:

On occasions of this kind, when the preservation of their common liberties induces men to assemble together for the interchange of ideas, and the strengthening of principles of action, it is usual to call to their recollection those fundamental maxims of natural law which form the basis of all human liberty and all national justice. Experience has taught us, that however monotonous the reiteration of these may appear, it is still fraught with incalculable advantages; and that, like the Bismillah of the Mahometans, the "invocation of heaven," with which the Arab prophet has commenced each chapter of the Koran, the names of "liberty" and "justice" should be perpetually sounding in the ears of freemen. With these we are accustomed to associate the memory of men whose energies have been devoted to the cause of mankind, and whose lives have been each a long apostleship of philanthropy. These are sentiments which find an echo in every bosom; these are names which require no labored panegyric to elicit admiration. What eulogium, in fact, could exalt the character of a WASHINGTON? or what encomiums could add honor to his memory, who has the freedom of a hemisphere for his living epitaph, and one half the solid world his monument!—(Loud cheers.) There is no occasion on which the memory of that great man can be so appropriately introduced as at a meeting like the present; the grandest, the most practical reformer the universe ever produced was George Washington. He found his country (the widest in the world) a mere servile province, at the mercy of a distant island; he left it the admiration of modern times, and the rival of ancient freedom: he found it unrepresented, misgoverned and oppressed; he left it a senate, a constitution, and a code.—(Cheers.) The short-sighted policy of despotism had denied it the advantages of commerce, had demolished its factories as "nuisances," and forbade it the POSSESSION OF MANUFACTURES, lest they "should LOOSEN ITS DEPENDENCY ON THE MOTHER-COUNTRY;" he left it in the enjoyment of all the traffic of the known world, and with an export trade of £25,000,000 per annum. He found America in reality in a state of pauperism, since its haughty mistress claimed the right of appropriating its property as she pleased; he left it free, independent, uncontrolled and in receipt of a revenue equal to £13,000,000. (Cheers.) When men will ask us what we wish to accomplish by "reform," let us point to the achievements of Washington: let us show them a country free from that insidious remnant of the superstition of a darker age, a pampered prelacy, and a domineering church establishment. (Loud and continued applause.) Let us show them men who scorn to intrust their liberties to the guardianship of hereditary legislators: who have cut off from their constitution the incubus of a "second estate," and who can protect their property without the assistance of grace of "Tenth transmitters of a foolish face."

Let us point to a people who spurn the idea of impoverishing nine younger brothers to confer a name and inheritance upon a tenth, who can boast no other precedency than the accident of priority at its birth. A people who own no distinctions of blood, and who worship no aristocracy save that of virtue and talent. (Loud cheers.) Let us show them a people, the pageant of whose government costs about £5,000 a year, and let them contrast it with our own civil list of upwards of £1,000,000; a country whose military establishment in peace costs about 5,000,000,* while that of Great Britain exceeds 34,000,000!* a country whose efficient navy is maintained for £700,000 a year, while the wooden walls of old England, no longer her superior, are scarcely kept in repair for more than ten times the amount. (Cheers.) In fine, let us show them a country, without a national debt, without a sinking fund, and without a sinecure list; a country where the taxes of the subject are about 8s. per annum; and if the inquirer be still unsatisfied, let us refer him to his corrupt houses of parliament—to his custom returns—and his chancellor's budget, and they will tell him, in more explicit terms than we can, what we wish to see accomplished by reform. (Loud cheers.) These are the achievements that consecrate the name of Washington, and have won for him, from a grateful people, the proud title of the "MAN first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

*Dollars, we suppose, are meant here.

HORRIBLE. A Cork paper mentions that the dreadful evil of a war against property had forced its way into that country, and that the northern parts of it were suffering under insurrectionary outrage. Several hundreds of the peasantry collected together near Doonass, in the county of Clare, to dig up the lands; the military were called in to them, and in the affray which ensued, thirteen persons were killed and wounded. Some extracts from a letter by the right rev. Dr. Machell, a Roman Catholic bishop, to earl Grey, in behalf of the suffering poor of the west of Ireland, are contained in the London papers of the 6th May. They give a frightful picture of the ravages of famine. The following is a description of a scene which fell under the writer's own eye.

"In one instance, the father, mother, and three children were stretched on the same bed, without a morsel of nourishment or a penny to procure it, or a human being to go in quest of relief, but as it was administered by the casual visits of some charitable neighbors; and that the first intimation the father received of the death of his wife, was, from the lips of the suckling babe being besmeared with the blood, which, instead of milk, it extracted from the breast of its deceased mother!"

THE NORTH EASTERN BOUNDARY, THE STATES OF MAINE AND NEW YORK, AND DUTCH SYMPATHIES.—Mr. Baylies, a member of the Massachusetts legislature, now in session, recently made a speech on the subject of the arbitration of the king of the Netherlands, respecting the north eastern boundary, in the settlement of which, Massachusetts, as co-proprietor with Maine, in the public lands involved in the controversy, has an interest.

After giving a history of the dispute, Mr. Baylies thus concludes with a slap at New York, and her Dutch denizens:

The king of the Netherlands has heard the parties and has made his award—and a most extraordinary award it is. It appeared to me, sir, that he had only to select the line claimed by Great Britain or the line claimed by the United States. If he intended to decide this case on strict principle, he could have taken no middle ground—but he has selected a line claimed by neither party, and to complete the absurdity, he has made, (if I may be permitted to make a bull) the bed of a river the dividing highlands. None but a Dutchman could have done this, for in Holland, the beds of rivers are frequently more elevated than the surrounding country. He has fulfilled Mr. Gallatin's prediction, and to please both parties he has undertaken "to split the difference," not giving to Great Britain, indeed, the whole of the territory which she claimed, but precisely that part which is valuable to her, as it secures the means of free communication between New Brunswick and Quebec, and then fearing perhaps that he had transcended the limits of strict and rigid justice to favor Great Britain in this quarter, he makes the equivalent to the United States at the other end of the line, and gives Rouse's point and the works there to the state of New York, to which, (as far as I understand) that state has no better claim than she has to Quebec. Now, sir, I do not intend to say that there was sympathy in this case, but New York is a Dutch state, and Dutchmen certainly are capable of sympathy. The equivalent for the wrong done to Massachusetts and Maine to favor Great Britain, is made up by wronging Great Britain to favor New York!

POLISH NAMES. A correspondent of the New York Gazette furnishes a key to the pronunciation of certain Polish "jaw breakers" as follows:

"To put an end to the general complaint of the impossibility, or, at least, the difficulty, of pronouncing some Polish names, I will make the following brief remarks.

"As we have learned from a French paper the name of the brave Skrzynecki to be pronounced Skrejinetski, I will only add that this, expressed with English characters would be written Skerzhinetski, or Skerskinetski, the accent resting, as in most Polish polysyllables, on the penultimate.

"In a similar manner pronounce the e in all Polish names like ts in English (as Ploek, read Plotsk); the Polish sz like English sh (as Kalisz, read Kalish); and lastly, the Polish cz like ch in church. (as Lovicz, read Lovich or Lovitch.)

"This is all that is chiefly to be noticed about Polish names, by attending to which you will preserve the true sound of the name of many a champion of FREEDOM."

The New York Standard says—The Paris papers having instructed us how to pronounce the name of the "cannon provider"—Skrzynecki, we wish somebody would be good enough to walk into our office, at some cool opportunity, and pronounce, in intelligible tongue, the name of the head of his staff. It runs, spellatim,—thus—General Chrzanwski!

GREAT EMIGRATION. It is stated that since the opening of the navigation of the St. Lawrence this season, eighteen thousand four hundred emigrants have arrived at Quebec. The largest number of these were from Ireland, most of whom are accustomed to agricultural pursuits. It is estimated that 40,000 emigrants from Great Britain will arrive at Quebec in the course of the present year.

Very many emigrants from Europe have also arrived at New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore—among them a large number of Germans, not rich, but sufficiently provided with money, supported by their industry and economy, to get forward handsomely.

More than two hundred foreign emigrants arrived at Troy from New York on Monday, and took passage on the canal for the western country. They were principally, says the Sentinel, from Great Britain, and mostly Englishmen. The greater number of them are men of substance and character, such as add real strength and prosperity to a nation. Many of them go to take possession of property purchased before they left Europe.

SELF-DEFENCE! About twenty miles from Mount Hora, New York, there is a house which is built in two states, three counties, and four towns. The states are New York and Vermont; the counties are Rensselaer, Bennington, and Washington; and the towns are Bennington, Shaftsbury, White Creek, and Housac. The "Temperance Advocate" gives the following history of it:—It was built by a Mr. Mathews, who, through some freak of fortune, became subject to those unwelcome visiters yelept sheriffs. On one occasion the sheriff of Bennington county, Vermont, called at the house, and on inquiry found that Mr. M. had gone to the state of New York. The hall being quite capacious, and the division line of the states running longitudinally through the centre, he, with his wonted hospitality, invited the sheriff to dine with him. The sheriff accepted the invitation, and seated himself in his own state, while Mr. M. preferring the other side, sat down with him, bidding defiance to all the authority of "John Doe and Richard Roe."

MECHANICS. Few persons, we apprehend, are sufficiently sensible how much the mechanics of the country are protected by the tariff laws. Let us look at a single trade by way of example. Formerly a vast amount of boots and shoes were imported into this country from Great Britain. In 1829 the whole amount imported was only $310,943, and this is the largest amount imported for several years past. Now the proportion this bears to the boots and shoes made in the country, we can form some idea of, when we find that the value of those made in the single state of New York is estimated, in returns made by the state authorities, at five millions of dollars. If the repeal of the tariff would enable us to buy English boots and shoes cheaper, so it would throw thousands of men out of employ, sink many millions of capital, depress the price of agricultural produce and, of course, land, and cause a revulsion which would affect the business of every man in the country.

Hats afford us an example nearly as striking.

Many other mechanics are protected in like manner, and all are protected in some degree; yet we every day see the British party shedding crocodile tears for the "POOR," who they pretend are taxed heavily by the lordly manufacturer. All these pathetic appeals to the "poor people" are beginning to be well understood in Maine. A vast relief to the poor, no doubt, to take away the means of profitable employment!

GENERAL ORDER.

Navy department, 15th June, 1831.

All persons in the naval service entitled to rations, who shall voluntarily relinquish the use of that part of them composed of spirits, shall be paid therefor at the rate of six cents per ration, it being the estimated value of that part, as approved by this department, September 17th, 1817.

The payments made in pursuance of this regulation, are to be charged to the appropriation for provisions.

LEVI WOODBURY.

To commanders of navy yards, stations, and cruising vessels.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, }
Comptroller's office, May 11, 1831. }

SIR—I have received your letter of the 9th inst. accompanied by a cotton shawl, with a small woollen fringe border sewed to it, in relation to the duty of 33½ per ct. heretofore charged on articles of which kind a question is now made.

The reason of subjecting it to that duty was, that although wool was a component part, yet that part was of such a character as to render it impracticable to reduce it into square yards, and therefore it was considered as one of those woollen manufactures which was not affected by the act of 19th May, 1830.

The body or main part, however, being composed of cotton, and the square yards of that part being easy of ascertainment, the article more properly comes under the square yard cotton duty.

I conceive, however, that this new classification should not be enforced, until the merchants generally shall have been thereof notified by you, and they shall have had a reasonable time allowed them to arrange their subsequent orders with a view to such change. Respectfully, (Signed) JOSEPH ANDERSON, comptroller.

LAW CASES. From the Wilmington, (Del.) Journal of May 31—An action was tried in the court of common pleas of this county last week, which, from several considerations, has excited an unusual degree of interest. It was an action of trespass on the case, brought by John Higgins and others, of Red Lion hundred, against the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, to recover damages for permitting the waters of the canal to overflow a large body of marsh belonging to the plaintiffs, by which they have lost the use of the marsh, and the health of the neighborhood, it is said, is materially affected. The nuisance had existed several years before the action was brought.

The case was tried by a special jury:—the trial commenced on Monday morning, and continued three days. The two first days being devoted to the examination of witnesses, the whole of Wednesday was occupied with the arguments of counsel. The argument on both sides was ably conducted. The jury were but a short time absent, and returned a verdict for the plaintiffs—damages five thousand four hundred and fifty dollars—The damages laid in the declaration were six thousand dollars.

Circuit court of the United States—New York, May term 1831—judge Thompson presiding.

United States, vs. Samuel H. Eakin, Henry Post, jr. and Alexander Coffin—This suit was brought upon a bond given by defendants to the United States, for maj. Eakin as paymaster during the late war, and had been pending about ten years. After a trial which occupied the two first days of the court, the jury gave a verdict for the defendants in pursuance of a charge of the court in their favor. In the course of the trial several important principles of law were discussed or decided in favor of the defendants—that there could not be two district paymasters for the same district, for the same time—that the appointment of the second was a dismission of the first—that though the first might again resume his duties, his bondsmen were not holden, that when bondsmen are sued, the accounts must be made up directly for the time for which it is deemed they were holden, and must not be an account mixed with other accounts for which they are not holden—that subsequent payment and credits must apply in discharge of the earliest debts, unless where a special application has been made. Several other questions were also decided during the trial.

Mr. Hamilton, district attorney, conducted the trial on the part of the plaintiff, and Mr. Staples on the part of the defendants. [N. Y. Com. Adv.

Supreme court, North Carolina. A very interesting case has been mentioned to us, which was tried at the late superior court of Camden county, judge Donnel presiding.

Jesse Eason, a man apparently about sixty years of age, was arraigned for the murder of ——— Gregory. They had a dispute about some corn, to which both claimed title. Gregory was in the act of carting it away, when the prisoner shot and killed him. The accused appeared to have acted under the fatal delusion that he was justified in killing his fellow-man, who was committing a trespass on his own property. But the circumstance giving particular interest to this trial, is yet to be mentioned.

The sole witness of the prisoner's crime was his own son. That son arrested him, conveyed him to prison, and gave evidence against him on his trial; and the evidence had full credit with the jury, who returned a verdict of "guilty of murder," after a few minutes absence from the box. It is due to the character of the son to add, that he assigned as his reason for arresting his father, the danger he apprehended to his own life, in consequence of threats made against him by the father. After the verdict, and when brought up for sentence, he asked the judge to allow him as much time to prepare for a future state, as the nature of the case would permit. The sentence of death was to be carried into effect on Friday the 3d of June. [N. C. Sentinel.

The circuit court for the District of Columbia, the marshal and the juries, are severely attacked, because they did not find Messrs. Nourse, Fillebrown and Macdaniel guilty of defaulting the money of the U. States. This shews the "improved state of the press."

ANTHRACITE COAL.—Mr. Featherstonhaugh, in a late lecture in the city of Philadelphia, said, that

"The difficulty attending the smelting of iron with this fuel, he had reason to believe would soon be obviated: and he was confident, that its application to steam navigation, and generally to the production of steam, would soon be universal. In England, bituminous coals are used for steam navigation, because they give out flame which is essential to the economical production of steam: in this country, wood has been hitherto used. As anthracite coal is composed of carbon, with a small portion of the inflammable principle of hydrogen, this last is always feeble and soon exhausted; hence it had been predicted impossible to apply it to the production of steam. To shew how easily difficulties of this character, which are so often augmented by the bungling writings of theorists, are overcome by the unsophisticated ingenuity of practical men, he instanced the structure of a furnace in this city, at the white lead works of Mr. Price Wetherill. This furnace is supplied by anthracite coal, which of itself produces an insufficient quantity of hydrogen to make flame. But Mr. Wetherill, who is in the habit of surmounting difficulties by simple means, carries a little steam from his boiler by a cock, and leads it by a small pipe under the grate of his furnace. The steam, which is vaporized water composed of oxygen and hydrogen, passes into the hot coals of the furnace, is there decomposed, and the hydrogen, when it reaches the surface, becomes a powerful flame. When the cock is stopped the flame dies away; when it is turned revives. Here we see, as Mr. F. observed, the causes of an immediate preference to be given to anthracite coal for steam navigation, and particularly for long voyages; for a vessel can carry three times as much anthracite as she can bituminous coal, and the inflammable principle, the absence of which appeared to render it valueless for this purpose, is always to be borrowed from the fluid in which the vessel moves. Of what value then will anthracite become, when marine steam navigation will be general, as we think it reasonably may.

GREAT LUCK IN FISHING! The crew of the British king's ship Ætna, while lying at the Isle of Los, on the coast of Africa, caught fifteen sharks in three hours—the average weight of these monsters was supposed to be 700 lbs. The largest was 12 feet long and four feet eight inches in girth. There was only one male among them. A large number more were seen, and might probably have been caught, had not a further lumbering of the ship been forbidden.

STARVING JURIES. We have always considered this requisition of the common law as a barbarous relic of antiquity, which should be scouted from our jurisprudence. What is the value of an opinion exorted from the fainting and exhausted energies of nature? It is a mean contemptible appeal to a man, to address his mind and conscience through the medium of his stomach, to say nothing of the inhumanity of compelling him, through fear of starvation, to stifle the operations of conscience and act in opposition to his settled convictions of propriety. If a juror should die from the effects of hunger, what cognizance should be taken of this judicial murder? If a jailor should starve a felon under sentence of death, he would be hung for it, but it seems there is no harm in starving a juror. Judges frequently hesitate in the formation of their opinion for weeks, but who ever heard of a proposal to imprison or starve a judge until he decided a cause. Judges too, where the courts are so constituted, are allowed to differ, and the majority governs—but jurymen are not permitted to differ or hesitate. It is high time a regulation, so absurd in principle and cruel in practice, should be done away.

VERY IMPORTANT. We find the following in the Pittsburg Statesman, not receiving the Harrisburg Reporter, which has the credit of it:

☞ "The governor accompanied by the surveyor general and the editor of this paper, and parts of their respective families, left Harrisburg yesterday morning, on a tour of three or four weeks. They intend visiting the line of canal from this place to Pittsburg, and will probably return by way of Erie and the New York canal." [Har. Rep.

An arrival at New York brings Liverpool papers to the 17th ult.

POLAND.

A despatch from the Polish commander in chief states that general Deibitsch had, on the 25th April, at the head of his advanced guard near Kuflew, attacked the rear guard of the Polish army under colonel Dembinski. The engagement lasted several hours. The Russians had 18 pieces of cannon, whilst the Poles had but four. General Deibitsch endeavored to surround the Polish right-wing with his main army. Col. Dembinski finding his situation disadvantageous, retreated to Koterzya. Gen. Gielgud and part of general Skrznecki's corps, formed a reserve guard at Minsk, which was attacked the following morning at 11 o'clock. The Russians lost 30 men killed, and one officer, and a captain with 72 men and horses were made prisoners. The Poles lost 3 officers and 5 soldiers wounded.

Deibitsch was retreating, followed by the Poles.

The Poles in a preceding affair lost 9,000 men, but many of them it was believed were dispersed in the woods or among the villages.

A despatch of the 2nd May speaks of the conduct of general Geilgud in very complimentary terms, and details an affair in which a regiment of Cossacks were surprised, and routed. The general in chief complains of the conduct of a part of the Russian forces in taking the physicians, who were attending to the sick, as prisoners of war, while he speaks in high terms of commendation of the humanity shewn by generals Deibitsch and Kreutz to the officers of a Polish corps taken prisoners.

At Lublin there was great mortality among the Jews, and the Russians had converted a convent into a hospital.

The report of the defeat and capture of general Rudiger by general Dwernicki appears to be incorrect, though it is certain that he had gained an advantage over the Russian corps previous to the 25th of April—another account published in the evening edition of the London Times, states that general Dwernicki's corps had been defeated, and, after retreating into Austria, surrendered their arms—to the Austrians.

☞ On the whole—the accounts from Poland are cheering—the retreat of the Russians seems to support various rumors that we have heard of their great sufferings by sickness,* caused by the harrassments of the Poles, who also intercept and prevent regular supplies of provisions—but we cannot see any thing in the details to justify the exultations of many that we would gladly rejoice with, as to the decided success of the Poles, which they encourage a belief has happened.

PORTUGAL.

The imbecile tyrant Miguel, had, on the appearance of a British fleet off the Tagus, yielded to certain humiliating demands made of him by the consul of that nation to dismiss certain officers. He also yielded to the demands of the French government.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The elections in England, Ireland and Scotland, as far as ascertained have resulted favorably to the cause of the people.

The king owing to ill health had been obliged to abandon his intended visit to Portsmoth, and to decline dining with the lord mayor and citizens of London.

The king had created his son, col. Fitzclarence, baron, viscount, and earl of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, by the names, stiles and titles of baron Tewksbury, viscount Fitzclarence and earl of Munster. It was stated that he had created several other peers.

The governor general of India and the captain general of the forces have had a serious difference, and the latter is under arrest.

IRELAND.

The lord lieutenant has issued a proclamation declaring that the county of Clare and several baronies in Galway, Limerick and Tipperary are placed under the protection of the peace-preservation act.

Sir Holt Leighs' brother was killed by the mob at the election of Wigan.

FRANCE.

A slight disturbance had taken place about the decorations for July; and some of the papers say the king has lost his popularity with the actors in the revolution. Negotiations it is said are carrying on in Paris in relation to the Poles.

BELGIUM.

The national congress was to have convened on the 14th of May, when the decision of the prince of Coburg with respect to the crown, would be announced.

A messenger had arrived at Brussels from London. Lord Ponsonby had left Brussels for London, whither he had been called to give the latest information relative to the internal condition of Belgium.

BUENOS AYRES.

These provinces are in a most wretched condition—every district, as it were, having its general to lead the people to battle against their neighbors. The history of such proceedings is not worth recording. Every man of intelligence and virtue is compelled to take a part in these things, leave the country or perish. Such have generally been killed-off, and the very dregs of society have chief dominion. The miserable fate of the South American republics, as they are called, will serve as another awful warning to posterity of the danger of entrusting military men with civil power.—There was only one Cincinnatus in ancient times, only one WASHINGTON in these our days.

COLOMBIA

Is in a desperate state. We hear of general Monagas, general Paez, general Luque, general Carmona, general Flores, general Urdaneta, general Obando, general Briceno, general Bustamente, general Maza, &c. pulling for themselves in all manner of ways and causing the people, poor fools, to shoot one another. If the latter hope for peace, they must shoot off many military chieftains.

PERU AND CHILI

Are devoured by fifty or an hundred generals.

HAYTI.

Two French frigates have arrived charged with the French ultimatum, which requires the government of Hayti to pay up the sum agreed upon, long since, as the price of the independence of the island—which has become very poor.

"BARGAIN AND INTRIGUE!"

From the Washington Globe.

Dutchess county, March 29th, 1831.

Dear sir: Having seen some allusion in your paper to the election of gen. Green, as printer for the house of representatives, I was reminded of a correspondence which took place between gen. Green and myself on the morning of the day of that election. I enclose the communications which passed between us, which I wish you at all events to preserve, and by which it will be seen that the impression sought to be made by gen. Green was, that he would give a faithful support to gen. Jackson for the presidency, against every competitor. It was under this impression that I gave my vote for gen. Green as public printer. I am, respectfully, yours, &c. ABM. BOCKEE.

Gen. Duff Green: I hope it will not be considered impertinent for me to inquire whether you intend to support gen Jackson's re-election to the office of president of the United States, in opposition to any other candidate that can be named. I may be too suspicious, but, to my mind, the paragraph in your paper of this morning does not indicate your future political course. You therein state what you have done, not what you will do. I am, respectfully, yours, &c.

Washington, 1st Feb. 1831.

Hon. Abraham Bockee:

Dear sir: I have frequently and unequivocally declared myself in favor of the re-election of general Jackson, and regret that any thing should have caused a suspicion on your mind that a contingency may arise in which my opinion on that subject may undergo any change. Believing that your letter of this date was dictated in a friendly spirit, I do not hesitate to say to you in reply, that I am now, as heretofore, in favor of the re-election of our present chief magistrate, and intend to support it. Very respectfully, your friend.

DUFF GREEN.

On the preceding correspondence the "Telegraph" says—

"General Jackson and Mr. Clay are the only candidates before the public. Gen. Jackson is, by many, believed to be the only candidate who can defeat the election of Mr. Clay—an event which no one can believe that the editor of this press desires to promote. But however anxious we may be to defeat the election of Mr. Clay, there is a self-respect which no considerations of policy will induce us to sacrifice. By that we are required to defend our press and character against the intrigues practised by those who assume to speak in the name of the president. It is not enough for us to support such measures of the administration as we approve. It is not enough for us to support the re-election of general Jackson. No, it is required of us that we denounce those without whose support general Jackson cannot be elected, and silently to permit those who, supposing that we are reaping a golden harvest in the patronage of congress, labor to destroy our character, that they may supplant us. That is all: we are required to prostitute our press to the use of a "profligate politician," and of the "circumstances" which he has used to obtain an admitted control over the affairs of government."

☞ The correspondence, we think, proves a great deal more than that Mr. Bockee,* or the editor of the "Globe," seems to have thought of. It is a bare-faced exposition of a political bargain. Mr. Bockee exacted a promise from gen. Green, that he would support the re-election of gen. Jackson, before he, (Mr. Bockee), could vote for said Green, as printer to the house of representatives—and yet how many thousands of times have these "high contracting parties" charged Messrs. Adams and Clay with doing the same thing, and called it "CORRUPTION." Suppose it had been shewn that Mr. Clay had written a letter to Mr. Adams on the morning of the 9th February, 1825, saying I am "suspicious" that you will not appoint me, or certain of my friends, to office—and Mr. Adams should not have "hesitated" to say, I will appoint, or support, you and your friends—what might not have been proclaimed of them? Mr. Bockee has placed himself in the very predicament which he and his friends have so much abused Mr. Clay, because they suspected, or at least, pretended, that he had placed himself in. The obligation of an oath, to select the best man, was just as strong on Mr. Bockee as on Mr. Clay; and there is no sort of sophistry, no hardihood of assertion, no recklessness of party, that can relieve that gentleman, of making a "bargain," affecting his own vote, as a member of congress. But it shews the extreme of zeal, and we had like to have added, the prostration of common sense, to which men are led, by party—that Mr. Bockee has voluntarily furnished evidence of his own participation in a political "intrigue."

SOUTH CAROLINA.

At a meeting of the "Unionists" lately held at Charleston it was determined to celebrate the approaching anniversary together, as an evidence of their attachment to the union, and their opposition to nullification, at which meeting col. Drayton was requested and consented to deliver an oration in honor of the day. The "state-rights party," taking umbrage at this course on the part of those who differ from them, also held a meeting, of which the following account is given in the Charleston City Gazette:

"A meeting of the party which professes to be exclusively attached to the state, and which has therefore called itself the "state-rights party," was held on Saturday evening, at the Carolina coffee house, "for the purpose," it is said, "of making arrangements for celebrating the fourth of July," but in reality to revive party excitement, to organize party power, and, if possible, to obtain and secure ascendancy and domination. It is certainly to be regreted that the day which, of all others, should be devoted to peace and harmony, and to a general and indiscriminate celebration of the virtues and achievements of our ancestors, should have been selected by that party as the special occasion for conflict. But, on their heads be the responsibility of this most unfortunate and unprecedented movement, and of all the consequences which may follow from it—This "gathering of the people," as it has been called, consisted, we understand, of from 250 to 300 persons. The hon. Samuel Prioleau presided, and the meeting was addressed, it is said by the chairman; and resolutions were adopted, appointing a committee of arrangements, and requesting general Hayne to deliver an oration on the fourth. Whether that gentleman has complied with the invitation we know not. Numerous officers have been elected."

On a reference to the Charleston Mercury of the 6th instant, (says the Pennsylvania Inquirer,) we find a large portion of the columns of that journal devoted to the proceedings of the meeting adverted to above. We give the three first resolutions passed at this assemblage:

"Resolved, 1st. That we will yield to no portion of our fellow citizens, by whatever name they may be called, or to whatever political denomination they may belong, in a sincere and honest attachment to those GREAT PRINCIPLES OF CIVIL, RELIGIOUS, AND POLITICAL LIBERTY, which it was the crowning glory of the American revolution to have established, the end of the constitution to secure and preserve, and the great object of the union to perpetuate.

"2d. Resolved, That we regard the preservation of the union, in the spirit in which it was formed, that spirit which promises "an equal participation in all of its benefits, as well as of its burthens;" "as the sheet anchor of our peace at home and security abroad;" and that to preserve it inviolate according to the true principles of the constitution, is our sacred and imperishable aim.

"3d. Resolved, That we regard the preservation of the rights which belonged to the several states before the formation of the constitution, and which, according to the fair interpretation, and plain intent and meaning of that compact, have never been surrendered, as essential to the preservation of liberty, the best safeguard of all our rights and interests—and never to be abandoned until we become recreant to the principles of our glorious revolution, and utterly unworthy of the blessings bequeathed to us by our fathers."

One president, four assistant presidents, and eight vice presidents, besides a committee of arrangements, were then appointed for the occasion.

☞ A great excitement prevails in Charleston because of these things. There is much bitterness on the part of the "state-rights party"—and some fear the "trial by battle," on the 4th July!

OMINOUS. We extract what follows from the Columbia South Carolina Telescope, of May 27, 1831.

"The more we see and hear of general Jackson, the more unfit he appears to be for the situation he occupies."

☞ STILL MORE OMINOUS.

From the same paper, of June 3.

The cabinet is not yet formed: nor does it promise to be one of much vigour either of intellect or action. In fact, general Jackson's influence in the nation is prostrated: he is good for nothing to the north, good for nothing to the south, good for nothing to the west. There are no prominent men now before the people as next president but Mr. Clay and Mr. Calhoun. The north and the west prefer the former: the south, from the Potomac southward, the latter: but Georgia has prejudices not yet conquered, although her manifest interest is the same with that of Virginia, the Carolinas, Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi. The prospects of Henry Clay brighten. If he comes in, the south will be absolutely driven in self-defence to nullification or seeession: and the sooner the former measure is adopted the better. Submission cannot cost South Carolina less than five millions of dollars a year. If the constitution is to be maintained, there must be some means of stopping the progress of usurpation: are there any other, than nullification or secession? We know of no other: nor do we see any danger in either: we prefer the former: let our enemies compel, if they think fit, the latter. Can any of our readers enlighten us on this subject?

POLITICAL ANTIQUITIES.

Salisbury, (N. C.) May 11.

Mr. Bingham—I was really astonished the other day to find in an extract from gov. Hamilton's inaugural address to the legislature of South Carolina, the following sentenee: "it is true that one of the apostles of liberty, who kindled this light thirty years ago on the watch towers of state sovereignty, has reeently attempted to quench it in darkness." That Mr. Madisnn is the most eminent civilian now living, that he always has been uniform in his politieal opinions, is, I trust, generally admitted. This question of state sovereignty will then be best solved by reeurring to the sentiments of Mr. Madison, the father of our present national constitution, to whom the people of the United States owe a debt of gratitude more than any other now living, and who has ever supported a dignity equal to our obligations, and a consistency very unlike some ephemeral characters now in our political horizon, who emit their brilliant corusecations to perplex, mislead and deceive. And for additional explication, we will state the sentiments and prineiples of those great apostles of liberty and patriotism of South Carolina, who at the same time assisted in forming our present federal eonstitution—the most perfeet charter of civil liberty and human happiness ever adopted—in doing which, a few only of their declarations can be here inserted. I copy from that which should be in the hands of every American citizen, "The Journal of the Debates and Proceedings of the Convention which formed our present national eonstitution."

May 29, 1787—C. Pinckney, of South Carolina, and gov. Randolph, of Virginia, each presented a form of constitution, nearly similar, which each declared "he meant as a strong consolidated union, in which the idea of states should be nearly annihilated." Mr. Pinckney's plan proposed "that the house of delegates be chosen by the people, and that members of the senate be chosen hy the house of delegates from among the citizens of the respective states," &c.

June 8—Mr. Pinckney "moved that the national legislature shall have the power to negative all laws passed by the state legislatures, which they may judge improper, &c.

Mr. Butler—"We are still copying from the British parliament; with us both houses are appointed by the people."

Gov. Rutledge—"It is said an election by representatives is not an eleetion by the people—this is not correet—what is done by my order, is done by myself."

Mr. King—"None of the states are now sovereign or independent. Congress, by the confederation, possesses the rights of the United States; this is a union of the men of these states," &c.

Mr. Wilson—"The declaration of independenee by congress, precede the state constitutions. In the name of the people of these states, (and not in the name or by the authority of the states), we are declared to be free and independent," &c.

Mr. Madison—"I apprehend the greatest danger is from the encroachment of the states on the national government. I am inclined for a general government," &c.

Mr. Madison—"The necessity would then be discovered circumscribing more effectually the state governments, and enlarging the bounds of the general government. Some contend that states are sovereign; when, in fact, they are only political societies. The states never possessed the essential rights of sovereignty; these were always vested in congress:—Their voting as states in congress, is no evidence of sovereignty. The state of Maryland voted by counties;—did this make the counties sovereign? The states, at present, are only great corporations, having the power of making by-laws, and these are effectual only, if they are not contradictory to the general confederation.—The states ought to be placed under the control of the general government, at least as much as they formerly were under the king and British parliament. We know the effect of the old confederation; and without a general government, this will be like the former. If the power is not immediately derived from the people, we may make a paper confederacy, but that will be all."

Mr. Madison, on an equal vote in the senate, says:—"Has experience evinced any good in the old confederation? I know it never can answer. I do assert that a national senate not elected and paid by the people will have no more efficiency than the old congress; for the states will usurp the general government. The vote was put and carried against an equal representation in the senate.

Mr. Pinckney—"Candor obliges me to own, that equality of suffrage in the senate is wrong. I renew my former motion—senate to be eleeted by the house of delegates."

These are a very few of the sentiments and principles of our present national constitution, which stands and will forever stand the most perfect model of wisdom and patriotism, and which has led us onward to higher prosperity and happiness, honor and power, than has ever been reached, in the same period, by any other nation beneath the sun. This is that light which Mr. Madison and his co-patriots of South Carolina, with Washington, the father of his country, kindled on the watch-towers of American independenee and constitutional jurisprudence; the elements of which are as eternal as the principles are correct.—They are the antitheses to those ephemeral bubbles, which now float in our southern atmosphere, and which receive their buoyancy alone, from the sordid selfishness of personal aggrandisement and disappointed ambition; who after writing down an opponent, (see the numbers signed "One of the People," collected, printed and prefaced by gov. Hamilton), who after advocating internal improvement, and the tariff, even to voting 30 cents on a square yard of coarse cottons, have now turned a somerset, unwrote all their former writings, and by their latter votes nullified all their former principles; and it is said wish now to establish a southern government and form a free trade alliance with their prototype. Conformable to these views, it has lately been proclaimed to the world, from the most elevated legislative seats, that previously to our revolution, South Carolina had no extortion, no oppression, no collision with the king's ministers." My God! What principles, what sentiments, from the descendants of the revolutionary patriots of South Carolina.—Infinitely different were the principles of that murdered patriot, and equally different were the feelings of the American bard, when with indignation he exclaims,

"For Hayne, for Hayne, no blood but thine atones,
For thee, Cornwallis, how the gallows groans,
Sunk to perdition, in eternal pain,
Thy doom is justice—for a murder'd Hayne."

There is a very dark blot on the revolutionary transactions of South Carolina, which it was hoped the chivalrous and pure patriotism of her few revolutionary heroes and patriotic statesmen, had wiped from the records of her state, and consigned to oblivion; and it is yet hoped these views are confined to a few aristocrats, who believe with Giles of Virginia, their great coadjutor, "that the corrupting influence of free suffrage in our elections by the people, will crumble into atoms our republican institutions." Such patriotism and such principles enjoin on the people, at least, a cautious scrutiny.

But while the great advocate of equal rights, equal liberty and unsuborned press,* while a Drayton lives, South Carolina has a pillar at whose base she may repose in safety, and whose summit resplendent with the light of disinterested patriotism, is conspicuous even at the confines of this desert of conflicting political principles, and will even direct the bewildered pilgrim to a dignified and patriotic repose, securely sheltered from the blighting siroceo of sordid selfishness and aristocratic predilection.

The declaration of independence on British perfidy and British domination, the sole birth-right of every Mecklenburg citizen, (and by legislative enactment, of every citizen of North Carolina), is too sacred a deposit to be torn from them by patriots, who circumnavigate the world of political principles, sail under all colors, explore every clime of popularity, run all points of the compass, under any and every propitious breeze, and ride over the breakers of nullification and dismemberment, to land eventually in the lucrative harbor of personal aggrandisement; or to yield this their patrimony to the solicitation or dictation of those who may wish now to throw us back under colonial bondage and British aristocracy, and thus build up a discriminating distinction in society, by wealth, equipage, titles and dress.

Our country and our republican institutions, as they are, one and indivisible forever, is the aspiration of every real American patriot, of every citizen of North Carolina. OLD BEN FRANKLIN.

POLITICAL CONVENTIONS.

IN NEW YORK.

We have already briefly mentioned that a convention of the national republicans of New York had been held at Albany, at which Peter R. Livingston was president, John D. Dickinson and Heman H. Bogart, vice presidents, and Joseph Hoxey and Oran Follett, secretaries.

The following counties were represented—Albany, Cayuga, Columbia, Cortland, Dutchess, Erie, Essex, Franklin, Greene, Herkimer, Kings, Montgomery, New York, Oneida, Ontario, Orange, Oswego, Queens, Rensselaer, Richmond, Rockland, Saratoga, Seneca, and Tompkins.

Among other proceedings had, a brief and strong address to the electors of the state of New York was adopted—which is omitted because it is not within the range of our practice to insert such articles, unless in extraordinary cases.

The following are the resolutions that were agreed to—

Resolved, That the power of nomination to office, vested by the constitution in the president of the United States was designed to be employed for the public good; and that the exercise of this power by the present executive, in removing officers of government of admitted capability, tried integrity, and known attachment to republican principles, to give their places to men, in numerous instances, devoid of the requisite qualifications, or of profligate character, merely because of their personal attachment to himself, and activity in promoting his election, is an abuse of the power delegated to the president; that in this perversion of power, general Jackson has not only violated the plain spirit of the constitution, but insulted the moral sense of the nation, and put in practical operation the principal of persecution for opinion sake, utterly repugnant to the genius of our republican institutions, one of whose chief excellencies is, that they secure the freedom of the mind.

Resolved, That the irregularities which have been committed during the present administration, in the post office department, are deserving of severe reprehension, and this convention regard as a great evil and national disgrace the suspicion which prevails extensively, of the sancity of this department, the character of which for integrity should be not only unimpeached but unsuspected.

Resolved, That the amount of moneys already expended by the present administration for foreign embassies, and the additional amounts which will be required in fitting out the contemplated embassy to England, and one to Russia, manifest a total disregard of that economy which was promised by the present executive on his entering into office.

Resolved, That the countenance given by the present administration, to the attack made at the late session of congress, upon the supreme court of the United States, shows that the judicial power is regarded with no friendly feeling by the executive, and should unite in vigorous opposition to his re-election, all those who set a high value upon the union of the states, and believe that the permanency of that court is essential to the preservation of this union.

Resolved, That when a treaty is ratified according to the requirements of the constitution, it is the supreme law of the land; that when a bill has passed both houses of congress, and received the approval of the president, it becomes a law, and the president is bound to execute the articles of such treaty, and the provisions of such law, and his omission or refusal to do so on the ground of the invalidity of the treaty or unconstitutionality of the law, is an usurpation of the power of the judiciary, and is in the opinion of this convention, an offence for which the president deserves impeachment; and this offence has general Jackson committed in his refusing to execute the plain articles of treaties between the United States and the Cherokee Indians, and the provisions of the law now in force, designed to protect the lands of the Cherokees from invasion by citizens of the United States.

Resolved, That the practice which prevails almost universally among the friends of the present administration, of ascribing the errors of the executive department of the government, not to the president himself, but to his cabinet or his advisers, can only be justified by resorting to a principle which, in a hereditary monarchy, might protect the king, but which is not less repugnant to the theory of our government than to the former practice under it. The president, not less than the humblest officer of the government, is invested with power delegated by the people, and for the exercise of which he is responsible.

Resolved, That no principles of political economy are worthy an American statesman, but such as appropriate the energies of our own soil, and reward the industry of our own citizens; and that HENRY CLAY, by his early and undeviating support to the American System, has secured to himself the imperishable gratitude of his countrymen.

Resolved, That congress have the power to construct internal improvements for the promotion of the general welfare. To deny this is to sever the main arteries of the constitution, impair its energies in war and prostrate them in peace.

Resolved, That the citizens of Washington, in the District of Columbia, by their proceedings and resolutions at their public meeting on the 4th of May last, have displayed an independence, a fidelity and a vigilance which entitle them to the confidence of the national republicans throughout the union, as zealous and efficient sentinels to give the alarm whenever a corrupt or imbecile administration attempts profanely to touch the ark of the constitution, or wickedly to abuse the powers which have been committed to his hands, and that this convention considers it to be its duty to explicitly declare its warm admiration of the spirit of those proceedings, and its entire coincidence with the tone of the resolutions which were adopted at that meeting.

*See col. Drayton's speech on publishing public documents, &c. He should be the vice president, or at least secretary of war.

Resolved, That the dissolution of the late cabinet, whether it be the result of internal feuds, of a consciousness of incapacity, or of a loss of public confidence, is alike unprecedented in our history and disgraceful to our country.

Resolved, That the talents and integrity of HENRY CLAY, his onward, fearless, efficient public life, devoted to the cause of his country, her constitution and laws, entitle him to the confidence of the republic, and we do earnestly recommend him to the electors of this state as a candidate for the presidency of these United States.

The following plan of organization was adopted:—

1. Resolved, That this convention appoint delegates from the several congressional districts, together with two delegates to represent the U. States senators for this state, to meet the national republican convention to be held at Baltimore, in December next. That in the event of any vacancy or vacancies in the delegation, the same be supplied by the respective county committees, in the congressional districts where they may occur. And that if either of the delegates to represent the said United States senators shall decline, or be prevented from attending the said convention, such vacancy be filled by the state corresponding committee.

2. Resolved, That a state corresponding committee be appointed, to consist of seven members.

3. Resolved, That it be recommended to the counties which have not appointed corresponding committees, to appoint the same forthwith. That the said committees take measures to have committees appointed in each town, whose business it shall be to call all town meetings, and to correspond with the county committees.

4. Resolved, That the several county committees shall, at all times, keep the state corresponding committee advised of the condition of their respective colonies.

5. Resolved, That the state corresponding committee keep up a constant correspondence with the several committees, and also with the corresponding committees of other states.

CONNECTICUT.

An adjourned meeting of the republican members of the legislature was held in the representatives' chamber, at which the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

The republican members of the legislature who are friendly to the election of HENRY CLAY to the presidency of the United States, and desirous to sustain those principles of civil government and national policy which have been proclaimed and ably vindicated by that distinguished statesman and patriot, believe that it is due to themselves and their constituents, to make known and declare the principles by which they are governed in assembling on the present occasion:

Therefore, Resolved, That the efforts which have been made and are making by the friends of the present administration to blast the reputation of HENRY CLAY, and to destroy the confidence of the people in his patriotism, integrity and fidelity, demand our most unqualified reprehension.

Resolved, That the attempt made in the last congress, to prostrate the authority of the supreme court, should excite alarm, as the measure, if successful, would have soon severed the bonds of the union.

Resolved, That the protection of American industry, in every branch thereof, by a tariff of duties on importation, so as to secure to the agricultural and manufacturing interests the benefit of a home market, is the only true policy of our government.

Resolved, That works of internal improvements, are proper objects of national patronage, and that in the opinion of this meeting it is competent for congress to appropriate our surplus revenues for their promotion.

Resolved, That as Henry Clay has on all proper occasions, fearlessly and eloquently defended these great interests, and did, during the last war proclaim his attachment to them, and is now entirely devoted to their success, we do therefore unanimously recommend him to the people of this state for the office of president of the United States, and that we will make all suitable and proper exertions to promote his election.

Resolved, That while we acknowledge with gratitude the services which Andrew Jackson has rendered his country in the field, yet in the opinion of this meeting, his incompetency to discharge the responsible duties of the chief magistracy, has become apparent, and that we deprecate his re-election to that high station as incompatible with the welfare of the nation.

Resolved, That we disapprove of the leading measures of his administration, as they are inconsistent with principles which he avowed on various occasions, before and pending the late presidential contest, and that it is manifest that he has been induced to lend the influence of his name to these measures, by the arts of designing men, who are willing to sacrifice the interest of their country and the honor of the president, to promote their own personal aggrandizement.

Resolved, That the dissolution of the late cabinet, (being an event unexampled in the history of this country), proves that president Jackson cannot subdue and control those elements of discord and repulsion which were concentrated with a view to insure his election, the constant presence of which has involved him in inextricable difficulties; and that unity of administration can only be secured by the decision of character, integrity of life, liberality of principles, and devotion to the cause of liberty and the rights of man, by which Henry Clay has ever been distinguished.

Resolved, That these resolutions be signed by the chairman of the meeting and countersigned by the secretaries, and that the editors of this state friendly to their object, be requested to insert them in their respective papers. ROGER HUNTINGTON, chairman.

INDIAN POPULATION IN THE U. STATES.

The following statement may not be unacceptable to our readers, at the present time, when the condition and future welfare of the Indians residing within the limits of the states and territories, are exciting uncommon interest, and have given rise to much speculation. The statements may not be minutely correct. We have endeavored from the documents in our possession, to make them as correct as they possibly could be, considering the difficulties which have always existed in ascertaining the number of each tribe of Indians. It is our belief, that we are not far from the facts, respecting the actual population and names of the Indian tribes in the United States and their territories.

SCRAPS RELATING TO MANUFACTURES, INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS, FOREIGN COMMERCE, &c. The capital for a new factory at Lowell was lately subscribed for at Boston, and the arrangements for commencing the work are in rapid progress. The capital of the new concern is to be $1,200,000, being the fourth in that vicinity, in a few months.

A great deal of abundant capital is passing into manufacturing establishments—not because they are so profitable as some in the south believe, but to give employment to money; it being now a great object to obtain six per cent. on safe investments of it. Yet a little while of continued prosperity, and the capital of the old world, thus employed, will not injuriously interfere with that of the United States. It is of great interest to the nation that capital should accumulate. At every turn, it creates new profits and employments for all sorts of working people, and enriches society generally.

Two boats lately arrived at Milton, Pennsylvania, by the canals, with 20 tons of freight, for which the cost of transportation was 200 dollars. The same weight would have cost $600, by the old way, in wagons—400 dollars are therefore saved to the people, though the canal may not yield a profit to the state. It is in this light that the effects of internal improvements should be mainly considered, in a free country—the good of the people being the supreme law.

At the cotton manufactory at Richmond, Va. slave-labor is exclusively employed, except in superintending the operations. A fair experiment has been made, and the proprietors are said to prefer it. This should relieve one of the great objections of the south to the "American System."

A dry dock has been constructed at Cleveland, Ohio, for the benefit of navigation on lake Erie and the canal. There had arrived at that place from the interior, by way of the canal, prior to the 15th May, 13,034 bushels of wheat and 15,223 bbls. of flour.

The New York Courier says—A writer of the nullification school, in the Charleston Mercury, argues very learnedly against the construction of the Charleston rail road, into the interior of that state, on the ground that it would only facilitate the transportation of cotton to New York, Philadelphia and Boston. Had they not better place a long chain across Charleston harbor at once, and stop all navigation with the rascally states north of them.

Some high-spirited and worthy men are loudly urging the people of North Carolina to enter with zeal into internal improvements. May success attend their efforts!

The population of Lynn, Mass. is over 5,000, nearly all of whom are supported by the shoe business. From 1,200,000 to 1,400,000 pairs of shoes are made annually in the town, of an average value of 76 cts. per pair, making nearly $1,000,000. The females of the town earn more than $60,000 annually by binding and ornamenting shoes. Millions of low priced fancy shoes have been sent to South America, and sold at a profit. There is a chocolate manufactory in Lynn, which makes sixty tons of chucolate in a year. The Lynn fishermen at this time bring in 6,000 pounds of fish daily.

The fine water-power at Trenton, N. J. is about to be brought into use, by a stock company. Trenton is an admirable location for extensive manufactures, and by canals or rail roads will soon be almost as close to New York as it now stands to Philadelphia. The Delaware and Raritan canal, and the Camden and Amboy rail-roads, are rapidly advancing.

Cast iron is freely used at Pittsburg for pillars, and the caps and sills of windows. Goods by the canals, &c. are received at Pittsburg in 14 or 16 days from Philadelphia.

A pair of silk socks, the production throughout of a young lady of Winnsborough, S. C. have lately been exhibited and pronounced excellent. This is a good anti-nullification sign.

The people of New Orleans are much pleased with their rail road to lake Ponchartrain—it is 4½ miles long, perfectly straight, and its ascent and descent is only 16 inches. The avenue on which the road runs is 150 feet in width, and, being perfectly straight, the eye easily traverses its whole length. Standing on the bank of the Mississippi, you readily see the vessels sailing across the opening at the end of the avenue of trees—At the extremity of the road, the company are constructing an artificial harbor and breakwater.

Palm leaf hats are now manufactured extensively in New England, but principally in Massachusetts. The New York Daily Advertiser, on the authority of a gentleman who deals largely in them, states that the manufacture of them commenced in 1826, in consequence of the encouragement afforded by the duty laid on imported Leghorn straw, and grass hats. It is believed that in this year alone upwards of two millions of hats will be made, the average value of which is about three dollars a dozen, amounting to half a million of dollars. In Worcester county it is supposed half the quantity above stated will be made. The leaf is imported from the island of Cuba; last year six hundred tons, worth fifty thousand dollars, were received. The hats are all made at the dwellings of the inhabitants, by girls from four years old and upwards; they are then sold to the country merchants, who collect them together and send them to the Boston, New York and other markets. They are made of every quality, varying from 25 cents to $2 00, and suited to the man of fashion or the laborer. This is another instance of the enterprise and industry of the New England people, who are enabled to commence the manufacture of a new article, from which they are greatly enriching themselves, and furnishing the public with a cheaper and better commodity than they had before received.

The Charleston rail road to Hamburg, 135 miles, is going bravely on. The greater part of the route is under contract. A locomotive engine is plying on the part that is finished—its speed is not allowed to exceed 15 miles an hour. The present disbursements are about 20,000 dollars a month. Eight miles are completed. The capital paid in is $143,820. This road promises to be very profitable.

A steam boat arrived at Windsor, Vermont, on the Connecticut river, about the 10th ult. laden with merchandise. One was thereafter to arrive weekly—the navigation of the river having been lately improved.

The four towns in New Hampshire, in which the principal manufacturing establishments of that state are located, shew the following rapidity of increase in population from 1820 to 1830:

	1820.	1830.
Dover,	2,871	5,449
Somersworth,	841	3,090
Dunstable,	1,142	2,417
New Market,	1,033	2,013

The Portland Advertiser says—Boston has given us a powerful, and we may say without exaggeration, a splendid illustration of the excellence of the American system. Her trade before the tariff of '28, and for some time after, (till the country was invigorated by new protecting duties), was drooping. Her stores and shops and houses were untenanted. Real estate decreased in value; mechanics were out of employ; and even misery was lifting up its visage. Now the tarff of '28 is under full wing. An impulse like that of an electric battery is given to trade. Our eastern traders who have purchased goods there this season, tell us, old Babylon was not more noisy. Nothing but bustle;—bustle,—or to use the expressive language of the day (which is always best in matters of this sort) "they are making money hand over fist."

[All our cities and large towns, certainly, are in a state of wonderful prosperity. We have seen this laughably ascribed to the opening of the [British] West India trade, though less business is doing with the West Indies than before "the" ports were opened!]

690,000 tons of iron were made in Great Britain in the year 1827, of which three-tenths were used for home consumption, and the other seven-tenths were exported.

The Augusta Courier says,—"We saw, on Saturday morning last, in the hands of a South Carolina gentleman, a pocket handkerchief made of American silk, and stamped with rail road emblems, beneath which were the words "South Carolina rail road." The handkerchief was manufactured in Baltimore, [more probably New York] and thus stamped in compliment to the South Carolina company. The material was very soft and silky—sufficiently so for the hands of a princess."

From the 1st October, 1830, to April 23, 1831—147,524 bales of cotton were exported from New Orleans to foreign ports, and 76,293 bales coastwise—total 223,807 bales. The Providence American remarks—Of the whole export, one-third has been transported coastwise [chiefly] for home consumption, to be manufactured, and in a new shape to give employment to shipping. The freighting of this amount of cotton has employed 31,750 tons of shipping, at an average of 250 tons for 600 bales, thus requiring 127 ships of 250 tons each. The freight on the cotton exported from New Orleans into ports of the United States, at five dollars per bale, will amount to $381,465. We have here great and positive advantages to the shipping interest, resulting from the establishment of home manufactures. How then can it be said that the American System is injurious to commerce?

We have a report of the present state of the Petersburg, (Va.) manufacturing company—they are running 2,500 spindles and 15 power looms, employ 100 persons, all white, who are of good moral character and seem pleased with their occupation. The factory consumes 1,000 bales of cotton a year, and is now doing well. The concern appears to be well managed.

Three or four years since large quantities of China wrought combs were imported, and to the value of many thousand dollars annually. But since 1828 this whole business has been destroyed by the abominable tariff, or something, and one house in Boston which had imported $50,000 in the preceding ten years, (as a sample of the trade in general), has ceased to import such combs altogether. The greatest comb factory, we believe, is at Providence—it employs a large capital and many hands—and there are many others at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, &c. Some Yankee took a "notion" that he would make a machine to cut the teeth, and without wasting any of the stuff. He carried his notion into effect; and American wrought combs, at less than half the price of those that were imported, now form a pretty little item in the exports of our country. This is not a small business. The combs manufactured in the United States are not worth less than two millions a year. One comb valued at 25 dollars, has lately been made by Mr. Willard, of Boston, as a present to gen. Jackson. It is surmounted by the Eagle, with portraits of Washington, Lafayette and the president, and has other highly finished ornaments.

Seventeen loaded wagons from Tennessee, with cotton, feathers, &c. lately passed through Charlestown, Jefferson county, Virginia, in one day. Virginia, by her location, soil, &c. ought to have been the first state in the union. The people now seem disposed to whip "Let-us-alone" out of the commonwealth, and we may expect a happy change in its present state of population and wealth. A doing-people are rapidly increasing in the west. It is almost needless to add, that they have not many slaves, and are becoming rich. They won't let the iron and coal mines alone—they won't let sand remain sand, but make it into glass—and out of water they make salt!

The Ithaca, N. Y. Republican mentions that real estate in that village has risen twenty-five per cent. in consequence of the contemplated rail road.

The following facts relating to cotton thread are interesting: The fineness with which the cotton thread can be drawn out, by machinery, may be gathered from the fact, that Mr. John Pollard, of Manchester, spun in 1792, on the mule, (the name of a particular description of the cotton spinning machinery), no fewer than 278 hanks of yarn, forming a thread upwards of 132 miles in length, from a single pound of raw cotton. Of the rapidity with which some portions of the machinery work, you may form an idea, when you learn that the very finest thread which is used in making lace is passed through the strong flame of a lamp, which burns off the fibres, without burning the thread itself. The velocity with which the thread moves is so great, that you cannot perceive any motion at all. The line of thread passing off a wheel through the flame, looks as if it were at rest; and it appears a miracle that it is not burnt.

Two Spear-grass bonnets lately made by Miss Selina Parker, of Fitzwilliam, N. H. were sold for fifty dollars, and she has made others which pass for the finest Leghorn. This manufacture is worth more to the industrious New England states than the crop of rice to the southern—and is far more productive of profit, inasmuch as it employs persons whose time would otherwise be as if wasted. The girls are not the worse wives or mothers because they know how to work, and are not ashamed to earn money, in an honest way. Yet they sing and dance and dress, as neatly—and know as well that New York aint in Georgia, as any of their sisters who do nothing but sleep, read novels, and flutter in the sun-beams.

The salt springs of Onondago county, N. Y. are more valuable than any known gold or diamond mines located in the same space of country—1,500,000 bushels of salt were made at Salina, only, last year. The aggregate duties paid to the canal fund on salt, (levied by the state of New York), already exceeds 1,570,000 dollars, and is yearly increased.

A factory of pen and pocket knives was lately commenced by Moses L. Morse & Co. at Worcester, Massachusetts, and they are made to the value of seven or eight thousand dollars a year, employing between 20 and 30 persons. There are two other like establishments in the vicinity. The quality and finish of these knives, (one of which we have in use), is excellent.

A little while ago, wheat on the shores of lake Erie was worth only 31 cents per bushel. It is now worth 75 cents, the rise being almost exclusively caused by the reduced cost of transportation to market. What a change in the profits of the farmer is here! The labor is the same—but the price of the product is advanced 150 per cent. Some years since we received a letter from a gentleman in Indiana or Illinois, enclosing a five dollar bank note in payment for the REGISTER, for which he said that he had given 20 bushels of wheat, after hauling it a whole day's journey in his cart.

Mr. J. T. Cornell, of Randolph, Vermont, has invented and put in operation, a machine for felting and napping hats, by which one individual will perform the labor of four in the usual way, in a workmanlike manner. It has been examined by several hatters who recommend it as a valuable improvement. This machine is put in motion by water or horse power, and may be built for about fifty dollars.

It is probable that the Leghorn and other straw or grass hats—palm leaf hats, lace and buttons, manufactured chiefly by female children in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut, have a much greater annual value than the tobacco crops of Virginia! These are not "wooden nutmegs."

The New Orleans Bee of May 21, says—The sale of the Milneburg lots was closed yesterday; twenty-six squares were sold for 3,425 dollars, which to the amount already published, say 250,822—makes in all $259,247. It is the establishment of the port of Pontchartrain and the rail road, which have given so much value to these lots. It is said that the whole of that property, extending about three leagues towards lake Borgne, was bought of the Spanish government for 105 dollars.

Messrs. Dunott & Fairlamb, of Wilmington, Delaware, have lately invented a machine, by which, (says the Delaware Journal) they are enabled to expedite the production of biscuit or crackers, to almost any extent. It is added that, in the present incipient state of the machine, it will make sixty thousand handsomely finished crackers in an hour! The machine is said to be a neat piece of workmanship, occupying little more space than a common spinning wheel. The inventors have obtained a patent for this notable cracker-spinner, and propose sending a model to England.

Mr. J. Reed, residing near Fredonia, (Del.) offers for sale ten thousand white mulberry trees. The Delaware Journal well observes, that the silk manufacture will become a large business in this country—and advises the farmers to follow Mr. Reed's example, in planting the white mulberry, as a prelude to the cultivation of the raw material.

There is a large establishment at Philadelphia, directly employing thirty skillful workmen, well assisted by machinery, for the manufacture of knives and forks, pen-knives and other articles of cutlery. We believe that this is the second or third of its kind in that city—in which also is manufactured a great quantity of mill, cross-cut and hand saws.

BRIEF NOTICES.

Ohio. The present amount of the canal debt of this state is $4,569,460—of the interest payable 270,150. The balance on hand, lands, &c. are supposed sufficient to complete the canal. The tolls are estimated at 80,000 dollars for the present year.

A British clerk or agent lately applied for the benefit of the insolvent laws of New York. His accounts with his employers shewed a deficiency of 87,000 dollars, in the short space of 18 months. Among other items were these—lost in gambling at New Orleans 2,300, in gambling in Fulton street, New York, 10,000, ditto in Limber street, New York, 29,000, presents to a married woman, not his own wife, 5,000, &c. He seems to have been an agent for purchases; had he been one for the sale of goods, it is very possible that he might have balanced his account with his employers, in managements at the custom house, for their benefit! His discharge was ordered, though opposed by his European creditors. About thirty persons like this one might retain in the United States pretty nearly the annual amount of frauds on the revenue at New York!!!

Printing. In the course of a lecture lately delivered at the Royal institution, London, on some of the recent improvements in the manufacture of paper, Mr. Cowper, the lecturer, observed that the Bible society expended between £50,000 and £60,000 annually on paper and printing; the Tract society frequently printing upwards of 400,000 copies of a single tract; other societies for the diffusion of knowledge printed of each number of a series as many as 20,000; and of the new edition of sir Walter Scott's Tales, the almost incredible number of about 1,000 volumes were printed in a day.

Hydrophobia! A person whose trade was that of a tanner, lately died at Cincinnatti, and a post mortuum examination being had, his disease was pronounced the hydrophobia, though it was ascertained that the deceased had never been bitten by a rabid animal. It was thought that the poison must have somehow been imparted from his handling the skins of mad-dogs.

The Arabian horses, brought to the United States from Constantinople by Mr. Rhind, were some time since sold by auction at New York for 575, 535, 450 and 430 dollars respectively, which did not pay the cost of their importation and keeping. The purchaser of one of them immediately after refused 1,000 dollars for his bargain, and the animals have been valued at from 2,500 to 3,000 dollars each.

The postage bills of the members of the legislature of Pennsylvania, at the last session, paid by the state, amounted to $4,251 82.

Death of judge Trumbull. The venerable judge Trumbull, the author of M'Fingal, and a patriot of the revolution, died at Detroit on the 10th ult. in the 82nd year of his age. He went to Detroit a few years ago, to reside with one of his children.

Revenue from crime. It is stated in the message of the governor of Connecticut, that for the year ending 31st March last, the net gain of the state prison, after paying every expense of guarding, feeding, clothing and instruction, was $7,824.

Mineral coal, of an excellent quality, has recently been discovered on the Savannah river for several miles below Augusta. These mines may be more valuable than any of those of gold yet discovered.

Fish. The largest quantity (by weight) of fresh fish that we have seen at once, we beheld yesterday morning at the Centre-market-wharf, says the National Intelligencer of the 28th May—It consisted of several hundred sturgeon, taken in seines and gill-nets in the Potomac in the course of the day preceding. The size of them varied from six to nine or ten feet in length, and some of them, we should think, would have weighed two hundred pounds each. Of these, we learnt from one of the fishermen, twenty-eight were caught in one haul of the seine at Geesborough (opposite to the U. S. arsenal in this city) and eighty in the whole were taken at that landing alone in one day.

These monsters of fish were many of them sold at fifty cents a piece. Cheap living this.

Miss Foot, an English actress, notorious in the annals of gallantry as was Mrs. Jordan, (whose sons and daughters by the present king of England throng the palace), has lately been married to the earl of Harrington, and is a countess,—one of the "Corinthian pillars of society!" She is the sixth of her trade who has reached nobility. Miss Fenton married the duke of Bolton, Miss Farren the earl of Derby, Miss Brenton the earl of Craven, Miss Bolton lord Thurlow, and Miss Mellon, late Mrs. Coutts, the duke of St. Albans.

The Steam mill at Washington, Pennsylvania, owned by judge Baird, was recently destroyed by fire. The loss is a heavy one.

"The Chanting Cherubs," a beautiful piece of sculpture, executed by Mr Greenough, a native artist now in Italy, have been lately exhibited in Boston with small pieces of muslin festooned round a part of the figures, which has caused no small amount of censure and of wit. One person hopes that the "pure spirit of delicacy may be extended over Boston common, until every cow shall wear panteletts!" The offensive rags have been removed.

Temperance. The crew of the Brandywine frigate consists of four hundred and eighty-six men, of whom, in February last, only one hundred and sixty were drawing their grog.

Mademoiselle Sontag, alias the countess of Rossi, has taken a final leave of the stage at Hamburg. The press of the people to hear her last public songs was exceedingly great.

Cold water. A large number of deaths have happened in our cities because of imprudent drinkings of cold water.

Col. Gerrit G. Lansing died on the 29th ult. at Oriskany, New York, in the 71st year of his age. He was a volunteer at the battle of Stilliwater, and present at the surrender of Burgoyne, and afterwards commanded a company in the forlorn hope at the storming of York Town. After the war he filled many civil offices with ability and integrity, and was much beloved for the goodness of his heart.

Money. Somewhere about two millions of dollars were recently subscribed to the New York and Harlaem rail road stock, though only 250,000 could be taken—that being the amount of the stock to be disposed of.

A new bank to be called the "Bank of Buffalo," with a capital of $200,000, was authorised at the last session of the legislature of New York. On opening the books, $1,654,250 dollars were subscribed!

Steam boats—ninety-three have been built and fitted at Pittsburg since 1813.

Mr. Barry, post-master general, being at Harrisburg, Pa. on the 21st ult. was invited to a public dinner, which he declined.

The Mohegans. A church, for the survivors of the Mohegan Indians, has been erected near Norwich, Conn. The land on which that city stands was a gift from this tribe to Thomas Leffingwell and his associates, for aid rendered in provisions, when the Mohegans were besieged by the Narragansetts. Several distinguished clergymen assisted at the dedication of the church, and a hymn, written for the occasion by Mrs. Sigourney, was sung.

Western literature. We were somewhat surprised and not a little gratified, to learn from the last number of the Illinois Magazine, the extent to which the publication of books has been lately carried at Cincinnati. Something like 85,000 volumes have been issued within three months from the presses of Cincinnati; and, within the same time, 8,000 primers and pamphlets, sermons, &c. equal altogether to about 3,000 duodecimo volumes more. Within the same time the daily and periodical presses have issued as follows: 3 daily papers, 700 copies daily; 2 semi-weekly, 850 semi-weekly; 6 weekly papers, 6,800 per week; 2 semi-monthly, 2,700; 1 monthly, 2,000 per month; 1 quarterly, 1,000 per quarter."

Vessels of war for foreigners. Mr. Eckford, of New York, has lately launched an elegant corvette ship to carry 24 guns, said to be for the Russian navy. It is reported that he is also about to build a 74 gun ship, for the same destination.

Spinsters. Among our industrious forefathers, it was a fixed maxim that a young lady should never be permitted to marry until she had spun for herself a set of body, bed and table linen. From this custom all unmarried women are called spinsters in legal proceedings. What a scene of busy industry would be presented, if all the young ladies who long to be married were obliged to cast away the Waverly novels, and abandon all their fashionable amusements, in order to approach the goal of matrimonial felicity, by that path of preparation which their great-grandmothers pursued.

The Potomac, a frigate of the first class, lately dropped down from the navy yard, at Washington, prepared for sea, on her first cruise. She easily passed out of the Eastern Branch, though drawing 18 feet water.

German theatre. By an ordonnance of the king of Bavaria the theatres of that country are forbidden to represent pieces of which the subject is taken from the New Testament.

The St. Johns. The first steam boat that ever floated on the waters of the river St. Johns, Florida, was the George Washington. She took the inland passage from Savannah, the whole distance; and arrived, on the 18th May, at Jacksonville, in 34 hours running from Savannah.

Green county, Illinois. The first settlement was made in this county in 1817—the first sale of lands took place in 1821, and under the cash system, so that the people have avoided all the vexation of speculation which has so wretchedly embarrassed those of many parts of the western country. This county now contains 7,874 inhabitants and has 1,207 militia on the muster roll. Large quantities of flour, whiskey, &c. are manufactured in it, and shipped down the Illinois river. Carrollton, the seat of justice, has from 5 to 600 inhabitants, and contains a number of excellent brick buildings. This is a specimen, though not a very remarkable one, of the progress of population and improvement in the west.

A New Jersey editor has recently been challenged to fight a duel. He says he always settles such difficulties with "pen and ink," and threatens to put his antagonist into the Black Sea.

Indian eloquence. The following is extracted from a late speech before the governor and assembly of Pennsylvania, by the chief of the Menomonies. It has all the figurative energy of Indian eloquence.

"Brother—We see your council house. It is large and beautiful. But the council house of the red man is much larger. The earth is the floor—the clear sky is the roof—a blazing fire is the chair of the chief orator, and the green grass the seats of our chiefs. You speak by papers, and record your words in books; but we speak from our hearts, and memory records our words in the hearts of our people."

Fine asparagus. On Saturday we were presented by Mr. Rudolph Field, of Passyunk township, with a bunch of asparagus, containing twenty heads, which weighed three pounds ten ounces. [Phil. Sent.

Temperance in New Hampshire. According to a late report of the New Hampshire temperance society, as given in the New Hampshire Statesman, the consumption of ardent spirits in that state has been reduced in the proportion of about four-ninths, making an annual saving of expenditure in this article of $268,000. The present consumption is estimated to be 2½ gallons to each individual of the state, at an annual cost of $335,000.

Rats, &c. We find it mentioned in one of the latest London papers, that steam has been applied with great success, in some of the French ports, in the destruction of vermin on board of merchant vessels. After having carefully closed the hatches and every aperture, the steam is suddenly introduced, and in twenty-four hours every living thing which may have been brought in with the cargoes is destroyed.

Carriage of bullion. The British government has fixed the rates of freightage to be charged by commanders of ships of war on bullion, jewels, &c. after the first of September next, as follows:—For the freight of crown treasures from the port of lading to any distance not exceeding 600 leagues, ¾ per cent.; exceeding 600 and not exceeding 2,000 leagues, 1 per cent.; exceeding 2,000 leagues, 1¼ per cent. For gold and silver belonging to other parties the freights are to be as follows: on gold and jewels, from the port of lading to any distance not exceeding 600 leagues, ¾ per cent.; exceeding 600 and not exceeding 2,000, 1¼ per cent.; and exceeding 2,000 leagues, 1½ per cent. In silver the freights are fixed thus—Not exceeding 600 leagues, 1 per cent.; exceeding 600 and not exceeding 2,000 leagues, 1½ per cent.; exceeding 2,000 leagues, 2 per cent.

The New Orleans canal and banking company, with a capital of $4,000,000, has gone into operation. Archibald R. Taylor, was unanimously chosen president, and Beverly Chew, cashier.

Col. George Jackson died at Zanesville, Ohio, on the 17th ult. in the 75th year of his age. He was a native of Maryland—a brave soldier of the revolution, and, with gen. George Rogers Clark, engaged in many of the chief battles with the Indians. In early life he removed to Virginia, and was elected to congress in 1796—and succeeded in that honorable place by his son, the late judge John G. Jackson.

Rock salt in Armenia. Armenia was incorporated with Russia in 1828, by the treaty of Tourkmatchoi, made with Persia. The salt is found in a mountain two leagues and a half from Nakchitchevane, situated on an extensive plain extending along the left bank of the Araxes. The mountain is seven leagues and a half in circumference, and, from the appearance of very ancient works, has evidently yielded salt for many ages. These remains consist of enormous horizontal galleries supported by pillars of salt; and, according to the traditions of the people, many mines have been abandoned from the difficulties of working them, occasioned by the depth of the strata, and frequent inundations. The Persian government for the last fourteen or fifteen years of its time, let them for a sum equal to 16,000 francs annually.

The salt is worked by gunpowder; the works are wrought by the inhabitants of a small neighboring village, consisting of Armenians and Tartars, from three to twenty persons being required at a time. The Russian government has let the works, since March, 1829, for a sum equal to 16,000 francs.

Outrageous! The steam boat Gleaner lately taking fire on the Ohio, was scuttled and sunk near Portsmouth. On opening some of the packages taken from the wreck, a large box supposed to contain dry goods from the manner in which it was put up, was found to be filled with gun-powder. The agents in this abominable transaction ought to be severely exposed that they may be "put into Coventry," and their goods excluded from future transportations by land or water, by the refusal of passengers to travel in carriages or boats in which they should be found.

"Retiracy." The Intelligencer commented, the other day, upon the word "retiracy," recently introduced into our vocabulary by a Kentucky editor. The Western Herald claims the honor of the discovery of this word as belonging to Ohio. An orator in the legislature of that state having once spoken to the following effect:

"Mr. Chairman—It really doth appear unto me, that the gentleman up last is somewhat chagrinated at my remarks about the aborgoynes—Now, rather than take the course that gentleman has taken, I would rather pull stakes and go into a state of retiracy among those same aborgoynes."

Early marriages. A family at Southport consists of an infant, its mother, and grandmother, of whom, the latter is only thirty years of age. She was married at fourteen years old. [London Atlas.

We knew a lady in this city who was a grandmother at the age of twenty-eight. She was married at thirteen, and had a daughter married at the same age.

[Eds. N. Y. Gaz.

Col. James Swan died in Paris, March 18. Mr. S. was a merchant, a politician, a whig, a soldier, and an author before he was 22. He had published a work against the slave trade;—he had helped to destroy the tea in Boston harbor;—he accompanied gen. Warren on Bunker Hill, as his aid, 17th June, '75. The year 1787 found Mr. Swan bereft of fortune, and deeply a debtor. He went to France, and there made himself known by a volume on the commerce of the U. S. with France. He acquired reputation and confidence, and before the year 1794 he had gained an immense fortune, and had paid off all debts principal and interest, not excepting those from which he had been fully discharged. In 1795 he came to the U. States, and there are many who remember him at this period, and who know that he was charitable and munificent. He returned to Europe in July, 1798, and was engaged in different places in arranging many complicated affairs, which had been probably more extensive than any man but himself would have undertaken to manage. Among other persons with whom he had dealt was a German gentleman, who claimed to be a large creditor of Mr. S. and on the other hand, Mr. Swan claimed to be creditor of him. On this claim Mr. S. was imprisoned in the St. Pelagie in Paris in 1808, and there he remained till July, 1830, during all which time a most zealous and indefatigable litigation was kept up between them, in the courts of France. In March, 1830, Mr. Swan's prosecutor died, debtor to Mr. Swan, on judgment, according to his representation. It was expected that he would have returned to the United States on being liberated, but he had still great purposes in view, and remained in Paris till his decease.

Capt. Downes is to relieve com. Thompson in the command of our squadron in the Pacific, and will shortly proceed for that station, in the frigate Potomac.

Murder. A certain George Hill, of Alabama, lately whipped a slave to death, and then fled. He seems to have been no better than a savage.

Wooden lamps, Yankee ware, a handsome and useful article, are coming into use at New York. They were sold at 25 cents the dozen, the "tax" because of the tariff included! Thus are the people "oppressed."

The younger Desha. The noted governor Desha's son, who fled from the United States, died in Texas about the middle of March. On his death-bed he made confession of the murder of Baker, and one other individual living in Texas, "besides being guilty of crimes equally criminal as murder."

The West Indies. The following paragraphs are taken from a letter dated on board the U. S. ship Vincennes, and published in the Journal of Commerce:

"The Danish Islands are greatly impoverished by the ruinous reduction that has taken place in the price of sugar and rum. These misfortunes they must charge in some measure to the temperance societies,—the growth of the cane in our own country—and the operation of our tariff.

"We put in, for a few days, at Havanah, to supply the Peacock with provisions for her return home, and to show our castle of floating thunder. The Moro Castle is indeed a strong fortification, and well it may be; for it is said to have cost the Spanish government $120,000,000. It is no wonder Ferdinand thought the clouds might pause upon it, though poor Sam Patch would have made but little in leaping from its highest battlements. It would puzzle the most prodigal financier to tell where and how this enormous sum was expended. One of the greatest evils connected with an absolute government, is the liability of the public treasures to be squandered by the weakness, vanity, or pride of a single individual."

Uproarious! According to the "official" account of the late Tammany dinner at New York, three hundred and forty-five cheers were given. This must have kept those present pretty busy, without allowing time for eating, drinking or hearing the speeches or toasts, said to have been pronounced. We rather suspect that the printers make the cheers, in the newspaper, as their boys make the weather for almanacs.

Michigan. There is a mighty emigration to this territory, the present season. The steam-boats and all other water-craft on the lake are filled with men, women and children, beds, cradles, kettles and frying pans.

Louisville and Portland canal. This important improvement in the navigation of the Ohio, at the falls, is now in extensive and successful operation, and its results will meet the most sanguine expectations of its promoters, the veto notwithstanding.

Jamaica. A plantation of 3,400 acres, containing 190 negroes, and 100 horned cattle in Jamaica, was sold at auction in London, for £49,000. The auctioneer was constantly interrupted by persons, who exclaimed aloud that the sale was irreligious and illegal.

Coal on the canal. We examined yesterday a sample of fine looking anthracite coal, which was found on the line of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, a mile or two above Seneca. The vein was discovered in excavating the canal, on the side of a high bluff on the river bank; and though small at the surface, it enlarged regularly as far as the excavation proceeded, and indicates an extensive deposite of that valuable mineral. [Nat. Intel.

Louisiana. Mr. Brown, late minister to France, Messrs. George A. Waggaman and Henry Carleton, are mentioned as successors of Mr. Livingston in the senate of the United States. The latter is a friend of the administration.

Alabama gold. The editor of the Mobile Register has been shown a specimen of pure virgin gold, found in Autauga county, near the Coosa river. From experiments already made, it is said, we are told, that the mines in that quarter are equal in richness to those of North Carolina or of the Cherokee country.

A sheet of paper. At White-hall mill, in Derbyshire, England, a sheet of paper was manufactured last year, which measured 13,800 feet in length, four feet in width, and would cover an acre and an half of ground.

[By the machines now in use, there need be no limit to the length of a sheet, except because of the want of a supply of materials, or some defect in the machine.]

Napoleon Louis, the son of Louis Bonaparte, ex-king of Holland, lately died at Forlic in Italy. He was a married man.

Martinico. It is now said that only two executions had taken place at Martinico, because of the late revolt of the slaves, and not 150 as heretofore stated!

Massachusetts. The new legislature of this state assembled at Boston on the 25th ult. Mr. Calhoun had 389 votes as speaker of the house of representatives, and Mr. Wallis, "the Jackson candidate," 26.

Huron territory. There is, at present, a very large emigration to this territory—and at Green Bay the population is already of a pretty large amount. There are several other flourishing settlements. But some are seeking the yet further and furthest west; and associations are forming for settlements in the Oregon territory, on the shores of the Pacific! Steam boats may proceed we know not how far up the Missouri river, and a rail road across the Rocky Mountains may soon enter into the speculations of some of the enterprising people of the "far west!" A journey of a couple of thousand miles in our country, is reducing down into a mere excursion.

Gen. Bernard has returned from France to the United States, and resumed his place in the service.

More pirates. Collanet and Gadett, one a Portuguese and the other an Italian, late of the crew of the brig Orbit, of New York, and charged with piracy and murder, have been tried at Boston and found guilty, and sentenced to be hung on the 1st of next month.

Liberality. The Constitutionalist mentions a late bail case issued from the court of common pleas of Augusta, (Geo.) with the following return: "Defendant arrested, and brought to plaintiff, who forgives the debt, pays the costs, and lends the defendant money to pay his expenses home to Kentucky."

A gallant retort. As a nobleman was leading a very lovely young lady from the theatre, after the representation of the tragedy of Zaire, at which she had been greatly affected, they met Voltaire, to whom the nobleman said, "You have much to answer for—the crime of drawing floods of tears from those beautiful eyes." Voltaire replied, "Ah, my lord, those eyes knew but too well how to revenge themselves."

Wholesome. By a law in Ohio, if a man treats a voter to obtain his vote for office, he forfeits the office if he is elected. The newly elected sheriff of Stark county has lately been ousted under this law, and a new election ordered.

THE CHEROKEES.

Running Waters, May 17, 1831.

Mr. Boudinott: Sir—In your paper of the 14th inst. the following statement has come under my notice: "The Cherokee delegation waited on the president soon after the decision of the supreme court, and wished to know if he was angry with them. The president replied, no—he was sorry for them—that they had been deluded by their friends. The delegation then asked the president if the Cherokees should be disposed to treat, on what terms would the president meet them. The president informed them that he was willing to treat on the same terms as with the Choctaws, and no other."

You have quoted this from the "Savannah Georgian," who obtained it from the editor of the "Rural Cabinet" and he from "a gentleman recently from Washington." This scrap, unsupported as it is by a responsible name, deserves not my notice, and should go uncontradicted for Georgia news, for what it was worth in that state: But as my fellow citizens, who are deservedly jealous of their rights, may attach some consequence to it, I beg permission to say to them, that the statement in regard to the conversation about a treaty and the basis of it, is destitute of foundation. Aware of the duty we owed to the dignity of the Cherokee nation, and our own individual reputation, the language used by us in the conversation we had with the president at our parting interview, was not of a character from which the president could deduce inferences of desponding humiliation in the minds of the delegation—we felt none, and therefore could not exhibit any—sooner than ask the president if he was angry with me, I WOULD CUT MY TONGUE OUT OF MY MOUTH; I COULD NOT, UNLESS THE INDEPENDENCE OF MY MIND HAD BEEN METAMORPHOSED TO THE MINDS OF HIS PALACE SLAVES.

The president did talk earnestly, with an uplifted hand, of his friendship to the Cherokees and his disposition to do them good—and also mentioned that he had just read in the Richmond Enquirer, that the Choctaw and Chickasaw exploring parties had returned and were well satisfied with the new country—he had recommended the Chickasaws to look at it for themselves, because he knew it was a good country. I asked him to what extent the United States traders were allowed to traffic among the Choctaws and Chickasaws in that country, and whether their number was to be limited at the discretion of the United States, or the will of those tribes? He observed that their number would be reduced at their option. "I am glad to see you," said the president, "particularly at this time. I knew or I thought I knew, that your claims before the supreme court could not be supported The court has sustained my views in regard to your nation." This conversation was on the next morning after the decision of the court, and, as we had the only copy, kindly furnished us by Mr. Peters, from the original, extant, we were somewhat surprised to hear him say that he had been sustained by the court, and as the opinion, as we understood it, acknowledged our rights, and were in opposition to his policies. However, he went on, "I blame you for suffering your lawyers to fleece you; they want your money, and will make you promises even after this, perhaps, that they can make you sale. I have been a lawyer myself long enough to know how lawyers will talk to obtain the client's money." The delegation here observed in reply, "as a statesman and a warrior, we do not believe you would blame the Cherokees for the efforts they have made to maintain their rights for liberty before the proper tribunals, and if they have expended money in support of their national rights, it was agreeable to their own inclination." "Oh no" he answered, "don't mistake me, I do not blame you, but I blame you for suffering the lawyers to fleece you. I am a friend of the Cherokees, they fought with me in the war and freely shed their blood with the blood of my soldiers in defending the United States, and how could I be otherwise than their friend." Something was now here said, on the part of the delegation, of their abstract rights of justice, and that the constitution of the United States and the states were made without the agreement of the Cherokees, with design to say something on the denial of the court to grant an injunction, but the president here commenced to talk of the British treaty of 1783, and then continued to contrast the condition of the Catawbas to what they were, when he was a young man—then they were warlike and fought the Cherokees—"At one time they took some of the Cherokee warriors prisoners, threw them in the fire, &c. and when their intestines were barbicued, ate them—now they were poor and miserable, and reduced in numbers, and such will be the condition of the Cherokees, if they remain surrounded by the white people." Mr. Wilde, M. C. from Georgia, was announced, and admitted, and the delegation not desiring to be present in the drawing room of the president with a Georgian, now rose to depart, and told him they had merely come in to pay the president their parting respects and then took him by the hand—Mr. Taylor was the last who shook hands with him. Mr. Wilde then being in the room, gen. Jackson held his hand sometime and shook it, and told him to tell the Cherokees at his return what he said—that he was their friend—"You can live on your lands in Georgia if you choose, but I cannot interfere with the laws of that state to protect you." I am, dear cousin, yours respectfully,

JOHN RIDGE.

DISCOVERY OF THE COURSE OF THE NIGER.

From the Diario of Rio de Janeiro, April 7.

The English ship Carnarvon which arrived here, (Rio de Janeiro), some days ago, from Fernando Po, (an island in the gulf of Guinea, at the mouth of the river Camerones), brought us very interesting geographical information respecting that part of Africa. Our readers may remember that in 1825, the English government sent out an expedition under the command of captain Clapperton, who was charged with the exploration of the interior of that part of Africa which lies to the north of the bay of Benin. Scarcely had the expedition left Badagory, when every individual connected with it died, excepting captain Clapperton, who had the fortune to reach Soccatou, where being attacked by fever accompanied with a violent dysentary and inflammation in the bowels, he met the fate of his companions. Richard Landers, his servant, after having buried him near Soccatou, on the 13th of August, 1827, and having possessed himself of the journal of captain Clapperton, besides many other articles, was so fortunate after a fatiguing journey of nine months to arrive on the coast of Guinea. From thence, by the first opportunity, he returned to England, where he published an account of his travels as an appendix to those of captain Clapperton. While in England, having gained the confidence of the English government he obtained permission to return to Africa; and with his younger brother was entrusted with the prosecution of the discoveries of his late master, and especially, to explore the course of the Niger, which, according to the opinion of captain Clapperton does not discharge itself into lake Barnou, and the deserts of the interior, as was supposed, but which probably discharges its waters by various branches into the Atlantic ocean.

The intrepid young men, after having passed seventeen months in their expedition, happily arrived at Fernando Po, from whence they embarked in the above mentioned vessel for this port, (Rio de Janeiro), in order to obtain a passage to England—which they procured from the admiral of H. B. M. in the transport William Harris, which sailed from this harbor a few days ago for Portsmouth. According to the information received from these young men, they, with several guides and some slaves, could not penetrate into the interior on the side of the bay of Brafæ, which is three days journey beyond the city of Boussa, situated on an island in the great river, (Quorra Niger), whose geographical position, according to the former observations of captain Clapperton, is 10° 14′ north latitude 3° 50′ east of Paris.

In passing up the river, they had the good fortune to find various articles, in the possession of some African chiefs, that formerly belonged to the celebrated English traveller Mungo Park, namely, books, letters and a double barrel gun, which things the chief had preserved as belonging to magic. The two brothers, by means of considerable presents, obtained some of those articles, which they brought with them. From information which these travellers obtained in the country, it appears that Mungo Park, and his companion Martin, attempted to sail up the Niger, in a canoe, but soon after their embarkation were unfortunately wrecked near Boussa. The negro inhabitants of the bank of this river, who are savage and independent, attacked the unfortunate travellers with arrows and clubs, in order to rob them of their effects and make them prisoners. They defended themselves with great intrepidity during the whole day, but their ammunition failing, and seeing the number of savages increase in proportion as they were killed, Park and his companion having embraced each other, plunged into the Niger, and immediately disappeared. The Saltan Bello, in Soccato, affirmed to captain Clapperton, and afterwards to the two Landers, that the inhabitants of Boussa were punished for having attacked Mungo Park because that heaven had sent amongst them a violent and desolating plague, which destroyed a great population; and also, that from that time forward the whites were better treated by the tribes on the borders of the Quorra.

Richard and John Landers, being obliged to abandon their design of proceeding to Timbuctoo, from which they were scarcely fifteen days journey, for want of presents to bestow, without which there is neither found protection nor assistance from the authorities of the country, they in consequence re-embarked at the place where Mungo Park lost his life, and followed the current of the river, which runs at the rate of 4 miles an hour, they ascertained that the Niger, before it divides itself into various branches, is ten miles wide.

They then resolved to proceed by one of the most considerable of the branches which flowed rapidly to the west. As they approached the coast they were taken prisoners by the negroes who inhabit the banks of the river, and were again obliged to embark to be conducted to the presence of their king, who lived at a great distance. They were plundered and treated as slaves and were threatened to be sold and sent into the interior. They succeeded, however, after great difficulty, in persuading the chief by promises of a great reward, as well for their persons as for their property they still possessed, to send them to the coast of Guinea. Thus, having again embarked, they at length arrived at the bay of Benin; where the Europeans gave them every assistance they required, and in this manner were redeemed some of the reliefs of Mungo Park, together with his interesting journal.

These travellers assured us that the river Nonn, which discharges itself into the bay of Benin, is the most considerable branch of the Niger; and that the others, like the Calabar, also flows to the ocean. They also stated, that their guides told them that the city of Timbuctoo is not situated on the Niger, but distant from it 11 leagues to the north. They admired the beauty and fertility of the country through which they passed, the extent of which is calculated to be 1,800 square miles. The inhabitants of the interior are Mahometans, and are much more tractable and civilized than the negroes who inhabit the coast.

We admire the courage and fortitude of these two young men, and regret that they had not the advantage of a more liberal education. Richard Landers passed his early years at the Cape of Good Hope, and had travelled amongst the Cafres and tribes of the north before he entered into the service of captain Clapperton, who engaged him on account of his knowledge of some of the African languages. John Landers his brother, was a compositor in a provincial printing office in England.

We may reasonably conclude, that the British government will send out another expedition to explore and ascertain the truth of those facts which are not sufficiently confirmed, and then new light shall be thrown on the geographical knowledge of that part of the globe. Till the present, it has been supposed that the waters of the Niger are discharged into large lakes in the interior of Africa, but, by the present narrative, it appears that they flow into the Atlantic, at least, the streams of its most considerable branches.

M. BONPLAND.

The following letter from this distinguished naturalist, will interest the friends of science in all parts of the world. A New York paper says—Bonpland, it may be remembered, was the companion of Humboldt in his scientific expedition to America in 1799, where he discovered above 6,000 new species of plants It is mentioned in the Encyclopædia Americana that, on his return, he was made in 1804, superintendent of the garden at Malmaison. He was also co-editor of the "Travels and Voyages in the equinoctial regions of the new continent." In 1818 he went, as professor of natural history, to Buenos Ayres, and in 1820 undertook a journey along the Parana, to explore the interior of Paraguay. At Santa Anna, on the eastern bank of the Parana, he laid out plantations of the Paraguay tea, and had founded a colony of Indians, when he was seized, though on the territory of the Argentine republic, by a military force of Francia, who sent him, as physician, to the garrison of a fort, and employed him in laying out a commercial road. He lived at Santa Maria. Various attempts have been made to procure his enlargement from Francia. Humboldt wrote to the despot for this purpose, but unsuccessfully, though supported in his request by Mr. Canning and the British consul at Buenos Ayres. A mission from France went out also with the same object. His exile in a country interesting to naturalists, has no doubt added something to his scientific knowledge, that will be made public should he reach his destination in safety. San Borga, whence he dates his letter, is in the northwestern part of the province of Moxos, distant about 400 miles N. N. E. from the port of Arica.

San Borga, February 22, 1831.

In order to put an end to the melancholy suppositions which you and all my friends must naturally have made relative to my existence during the nine years of my detention in Paraguay, I must tell you, that I have passed as happy a life as could be expected by one deprived of all communication with his country, his family and his friends.

The practice of medicine has always afforded me the means of subsistence; but as this did not entirely occupy my time, I employed myself from disposition and necessity in agriculture, which has given me infinite enjoyments. At the same time I had established a manufactory of brandy and liquors, and likewise a carpenter's and a blacksmith's shop, which not only defrayed the expenses of my agricultural establishment, but yielded some profits from the work performed for private individuals. In this manner I had acquired the means of living with the greatest comfort.

On the 12th May, 1829, without any preliminary, the authorities of Santiago communicated to me the order of the supreme director to leave the country. This intimation was a mixture of justice and wrong, which I cannot yet account for in a positive manner. In short, driven about from 12th May, 1829, to 2d February, 1831, that is during twenty months and twenty days, I at length passed the Parana with all the honors of war.

This second epoch of my life in Paraguay, has been real punishment to me. I had never given any one cause of complaint; I had endeavored to gain the esteem of all. Even the supreme director, from my arrival in the republic, until 12th May, 1829, had allowed me the greatest liberty, and the heads of the department in which I was domiciliated treated me with kindness. At last as every thing has an end, the director definitely decreed my departure from Paraguay and has done it in the most generous manner. I am at liberty and soon hope to embrace you.

Please to give a thousand remembrances, to all my friends who recollect me, as I have no time to write to them. During my detention, I had not forgot any one, and without geographical maps I have still travelled a great deal.

During nine successive years, I have not once spoken French; I therefore hope you will excuse the defects and faults in this letter.

Adieu my dear M. Roguine; I am impatient to see you, and I am going to conclude as fast as possible, the trifling affairs which detain me here. Your fellow countryman and sincere friend, AMIE BONPLAND.

To M. Dominique Roguine, Buenos Ayres.

TIME AND TRUTH—AN APOLOGUE.

J. K. Paulding.

Among the daughters of Time, the youngest and best beloved, was a beautiful maiden, called Truth. It was fore-doomed at her birth that she should be incapable of fraud or deception; that wherever she came she should remedy the evils of falsehood and calumny, put to flight forever the errors of mankind, and banish doubt, darkness, and uncertainty from the face of the earth. In short, she was to be omnipotent and eternal.

Time, who was forever in motion, and never staid a moment in one place, could not endure to be without the society of his favorite child, and as soon as she grew up, insisted on her accompanying him every where. Being about to make the circuit of the universe, he accordingly took her by the hand, and they journeyed together.

Time had wings, but Truth had none; and it was soon found she could not keep up with the old man, who, though his head was almost bald and his beard white as the driven snow, could travel day and night, over hill and dale, sea and land, through air and fire, without ever resting or being fatigued. Impatient of delay, and incapable of restraining the impetuosity of his motions, he soon grew tired of the slow and feeble steps of his daughter, who was timid as a young fawn, and looked about, before, behind, on every side ere she ventured forward; and telling her he could not wait for her tardy motions, bade her join him without fail at the end of the world.

Time soon finished his tour round the globe, but truth was far behind; and as he had sworn never to wait for any one, the old man turned round to make another tour, and met his daughter about half way on her journey. As long parted friends love to tell each other all that has passed in their absence, they related their adventures.

'One day,' said Time, 'I met a wife whose rash husband had turned her from his door and divided her from her children, on account of some unfounded jealousy.--I would have staid to make up the quarrel and convince him of his error, but I knew you would soon come and set all right. I hope thou didst make my words good. Didst thou interfere in behalf of one of thy sex?'

'Alas! father, the poor abandoned wife was dead before I came. Grief and shame had driven her to despair, and she perished by her own hands.'

'What a pity! but let us go on. Next I met a young man who had been crossed in love in consequence of calumnies that had poisoned the mind of his mistress. A little onward and I encountered the young woman myself, who was pining away almost broken-hearted at the supposed infamy of her lover. I could not stay to remedy their sorrows, but told them that my daughter Truth was just behind, and would soon bring about a good understanding.'

'Alas! alas!' cried the maiden, with tears in her eyes, 'I came too late. The youth had become a sot and a gamester, and the poor girl had died of a broken heart.'

'Thou art destined, it seems, to be always too late. I wish thou wouldst go forward instead of looking all around, and feeling thy way like a blind man.'

'Ah! father,' replied she, 'how should I be assured of being always right if I did not first see which way I was going?'

'Next,' continued old Time, 'I came into a city where a man had been condemned to death for a crime of which he was innocent. I would have staid to do him justice, but my moments were too precious, and I knew you were close at hand.—Didst thou save him from the gallows?'

'No—I did not arrive in season. I saw his body hanging in chains; but I did justice to his memory. Better late than never, father.'

'Humph!' said the old man. 'After this I arrived in a country where the people were preparing to murder their governor and all his family on account of a false report of his having attempted to betray them to their enemies. I looked behind, and thought I saw thee advancing, and being, as usual in a great hurry, left it to thee to dissipate the delusion.'

'I grieve to tell thee, O father! that I was a little too late. The virtuous governor, with all his family, had just perished, and the wicked calumniator was in his place. I told them the true state of the case. But the lie had done its work, and the consequences were irremediable.'

'I wish to the immortal Jove,' cried time, 'I wish my youngest daughter Truth, would keep pace with my eldest daughter Falsehood.'

'How should I, my father, when she never stops to see whither she is going, and I am always seeking the true path?'

'Proceeding onward,' resumed old Time, 'I came to where the people were fighting, and cutting throats, and burning each other on account of a dispute about a word, which each party interpreted differently. I thought it a great pity they could not find out which was the right meaning. But, said I, my daughter is just behind and will clear up the matter, I have not a moment to lose. I hope thou didst not come too late here as elsewhere.'

'Not altogether too late, father,' replied the virgin, 'but ere I came, one party had exterminated the other, and when I offered to tell the conquerors the true meaning of the word, they said they knew it already as well as I did. I asked them how they came by it; they answered by the virtue of the right of the strongest, and then left me shouting 'Truth is great and will prevail!'

'Poor, ignorant creatures!' exclaimed Time, and shrugged his brawny shoulders. 'As I travelled onward from thence, I came to a nation which sacrificed human beings to a great snake, and left particular directions with the priests to stop you when you came, and become convinced of their deplorable errors.'

'I stopped; but I grieve to say it was only to lament over their misfortunes.—The day before I arrived they had all been exterminated by a people who came to convert them.'

'Sluggard!' exclaimed the old man, for he began to wax wroth. But he again resumed his narrative.

'A little while after I came among a people who worshipped graven images, and was exceedingly angry at their foolish idolatry. But I could not stay to argue the matter with them, and proclaimed aloud, as I passed, that my daughter was coming to set them right. Didst thou visit these ignorant people?'

'I did—but alas! father, the very day but one before I came they had all been swallowed up by an inundation!'

'Out upon thee!' cried Time, no longer able to restrain his impatience at the dilatory pace of his daughter. 'Out upon thee! Of what use is it that thou art gifted with the power to correct error and remedy the mischiefs of calumny—of what consequence is it thou shalt ever prevail where thou comest if thou art thus always lagging behind the events which I bring about? --Better not come at all than too late.'

'Father,' replied the weeping daughter, 'it is not that I am too slow, but that thou art too swift. Remember that heaven hath given thee wings, and vigor to pursue an eternal flight, while the feet of thy poor girl are tender and her limbs slow of pace. If thou wouldst only slacken thy speed a little, I might always keep up with thee, and ——'

'Pshaw!' exclaimed the old man, testily, 'I have not a moment to waste in hearing you talk.'

So saying, he spread his wings, shook his hour-glass at her in anger, and vaulted forth on another journey round the world. His daughter ran after him as fast as she could, and entreated he would stop; but though she has ever since been trying, she has never been able to overtake the flight of Time. Those who know best, however, affirm that she will undoubtedly catch him at last, for 'Truth is great and must prevail.'

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

☞ With a view to the "record," we had selected a mess of highly-spiced political articles to amuse or instruct our readers in the "signs of the times," and several others are laid aside for preservation; but though we expected, as intimated in our last, soon to be called on, as "faithful chroniclers," to insert certain expositions of a distressing nature, we yet hardly thought of presenting any thing so indecorous and insulting to public feeling, as the correspondence of the late secretary of war and the late secretary of the treasury; and still the matter published, we are sorry to say, gives only a faint idea of proceedings said to have been had in relation to the subject at large—with which we shall not meddle, except in registering facts as vouched for on the authority of responsible persons. It is manifest, that we have only arrived at the beginning of these things. But we shall not anticipate—"sufficient for the day is the evil thereof."

Mr. Eaton retired from the war department on Saturday last, and has been succeeded, ad interim, by Dr. Randolph, who married Mrs. Eaton's sister a little more than two years ago—major Lewis, the second auditor, is also Mr. Eaton's brother-in-law, having married Mr. E's sister. We are thus particular because of the mention that is made of the names of these gentlemen. Mr. Ingham arrived in Baltimore on Tuesday last, accompanied by two of his personal friends—and in the afternoon took an excursion on the rail road. On Wednesday he proceeded to his residence in Pennsylvania. His letter to the president, with the remarks of the "Globe" and the replies of the gentlemen charged by Mr. Ingham, with something like a conspiracy to "assassinate" him, are all inserted, without comment. See pages 302 and 303. We shall give place to subsequent articles as issuing from all other parties—but not interfere further with them. It is our business and duty to make the record—that of the people to reason and act upon the facts presented. The barriers are now passed, and we shall have a flood of strange things.

POLITICAL MOVEMENTS, &c. The "National Intelligencer" says—"We understand that the office of the attorney general of the United States was lately offered by the executive to Mr. G. M. Dallas, of Philadelphia, and by him declined. It is further stated, that the office has since been tendered to Mr. R. B. Taney, of Baltimore, whether with better success rumor does not say."

Major Eaton ceased to act as secretary of war, on Saturday last, and doctor Randolph, the chief clerk in the war office, is appointed acting secretary in the interim.

Mr. Ingham, having completed certain things in which he felt much interest, retired from the treasury department on Monday last. It is said that Mr. Asbury Dickens, chief clerk, will be acting secretary of the treasury until the arrival of Mr. McLane.

It is positively stated in several papers, that Mr. Ingham was offered the Russian mission, and refused to accept it. We have not latterly heard any thing of Mr. Randolph, but it seems that he is to return home very speedily. He must have been yet in London.

The following paragraph from one of the late letters of ex-secretary Branch, is loudly called up to the public notice—

"The American people have a right to know the WHOLE truth; from whence the alleged discord originated; by whom and for what purpose, it has been fostered; and in what respect and wherefore it has been connected with the public administration of the affairs of the nation.—The president is bound to make these explanations to the people."

[As connected with the preceding quotation from Mr. Branch—what does Mr. Ingham mean when he speaks of "the farce now acting before the American people?"—see page 301.]

The Ontario, (N. Y.) Repository says that Mr. Van Buren will be accompanied by Mr. Charles Butler, of Geneva, N. Y. as secretary of legation at London. A doubt is entertained by some whether Mr. McLane will accept the place of secretary of the treasury, though it is said that he wishes to retire from his mission.

Mr. Lumpkin, who is regarded as the friend of Mr. Calhoun, has consented to run as governor of Georgia, in opposition to the present incumbent, Mr. Gilmer.

MONEY. We made a transient remark in our paper of the 4th inst. that 8 or 9 per cent. of the apparent amount of the duties levied upon British ad valorem goods imported, was really deducted, because that we rated the dollar at 4*s.* 6*d.* sterling, though worth only 4*s.* 1½*d.*

We see it stated, and it is doubtless very near true, that 30*l.* sterling will go as far in the general purchase of commodities in France as 100*l.* in England.

How could an equal tariff be established on the products of France and England, admitting that both nations were willing to make exchanges of articles on reciprocal terms, other things being equal—such as soil and climate, and application and skill? One Frenchman would keep three Englishmen busy, IF A FREE TRADE EXISTED BETWEEN THEM. If then, England should freely admit the bread stuffs of France, (having less than one-third of the money-value of bread stuffs of English production)—it is manifest that the agricultural interests of England would be completely ruined—that the rents and tythes and taxes on land in the latter country could not be paid.

All the mighty capital of England—all her skill, industry and scientific power, could not maintain an open trade with France for two years—because of the different values of money in the two countries, as measured by the cost of commodities. A sovereign, or 20*s.* piece of gold, is a pound sterling in France as well as in England—but if in the first it will purchase six bushels of wheat and in the second only two, three men in France are really subsisted at the cost of one man in England; hence one man in France would stand equal to three men in England, free exchanges of the products of labor being allowed between them. Great gain to France, and excessive privation to England, must succeed. This shews the folly of pretending that there can be such a thing as "free trade." It is impossible that it should exist in mutual fairness, unless between the people of different countries conditioned exactly alike—and then they would have no need of it. HENCE THE ADOPTION OF RESTRICTIVE LAWS BY ALL CIVILIZED NATIONS.

A rightful adjustment of ad valorem duties is always a delicate and difficult business. The British method of levying such duties on the selling price, in England, of imported goods subject to them, is, perhaps, the best, though liable to some objections; but our present plan is always uncertain and often unjust—as the following example will shew:

In 1813 an ounce of silver was worth 7*s.* 6*d.* current money at London—but the latest quotation before us shews that the same quantity of silver was worth only 4*s.* 11*d.* in that city.

In 1811, 1812, 1813 the pound sterling in England, (always rated by our laws at 444 cents), was worth only 360 cents at Baltimore—but its present worth is about 486 cents.

Now—the duty on British goods being supposed the same in 1813 and 1830—the addition to or reduction of that duty, as payable at Baltimore, will thus appear, saying it is 30 per cent. ad valorem.

360 dollars, exported in 1813, would purchase an invoice of 100*l.* in London—duty at Baltimore, 30 per cent. or pounds (rated at 444 cents) 133 20—or at the rate of 37 per cent. on the investment.

But it now requires 486 dollars in Baltimore to pay £100 in London—and the duty on 100*l.* worth of goods imported being 133 dollars as before,* at 30 per cent. on the London price—or only at the real rate of 27 per cent. on the investment; or a reduction in the amount of the duties apparently payable of 8 or 9 per cent.—yet the current price of bills on England, say 9 per cent. advance, is about at par—because the English measure of value is by gold, and the American by silver.

It is then, as we have said, a delicate and difficult business to make a rightful adjustment of ad valorem duties, because of the different measures of values in different countries, as well as on account of the changes in such values themselves.

Such is the uncertainty about the thing which we call money; sometimes gold, sometimes silver, sometimes promises to pay—or rags.

Again—We see published in the papers a statement of the value of the exports and imports of Buenos Ayres for every month of 1830. The aggregates are, imports $41,433,270—exports $28,696,358. Now this statement is worthless, unless we know what is a dollar at Buenos Ayres. To suppose that goods to the value 41½ millions of our dollars were received at that port in one year, is ridiculous in the extreme. The dollars of Buenos Ayres are rags! And the mighty difference apparent in the value of the imports and exports, is partly made up of the real dollars or other specie yet obtainable, and carried off without entry, though purchased at an enormous price. The view of the state of the imports and exports, however, shews us why the country is impoverished.

Our cotton manufactures seeming, at last, to have obtained a command over the home market, are doing excellently well just now—while, as it must be universally admitted, that the domestic competition has kept down the cost to consumers so low that millions on millions of yards of our goods are exporting to meet and contend with those of Great Britain, France, &c. in the Asiatic and South American markets—an incontestible proof that they are, at least, as good and as cheap as the European. And in this we laugh at the ridiculous and false proclamations of the enemies of free labor, as to the "monopoly" and "oppression" which they pretend to suffer because of the "abominable tariff." This rank nonsense, or bold assertion, will yet be "punished" with the ballot, by an intelligent people.

The printing of calico, which now is pretty nearly equal to the home demand—(in the finer qualities excepted, which will soon be attacked and driven back)—has caused a great diversion in favor of the cotton manufacture, generally—and if persons will grumble, because they get as good American calico for 12½ cents, as that of British make for which they paid 25 cents per yard, two or three years ago, (when the British had command of our market), we care not! Let them grumble on, and John Bull will call them "patriots," even for cutting off their own noses—if he can advantageously trade in the parts detached—as he trades in human bones, for manure.† And so it is, that very considerable quantities of American calico are already exported, tho' our duties on the dye stuffs used is much greater than the British, and unnecessarily interferes with this new and interesting application of labor and capital. All such things are yet in their infancy with us—but, like Hercules in his cradle, we have grappled the serpent that would have destroyed us, and will yet sear the heads of the Hydra, itself, as if with hot-iron!

The time is close at hand when the finer articles for men's wear, as well as women's, will be produced by our own looms—when not less than 300,000 bales of our own cotton will be manufactured at home. Because of the freedom of our people from taxation, and for other reasons, we have no difficulty in believing that, if the American System is preserved, we shall soon manufacture a greater amount of cotton goods than England exports to all foreign countries, and so profitably employ hundreds of thousands of our people.

The following letter is very interesting—but we think that the high rates at which the stocks in old establishments are quoted, cannot be generally realized—for some, no doubt, it may, because of yet spare water-power or other peculiar advantages; and it should also be recollected, that capitalists are now content to receive a much reduced interest on their money. A six per cent. stock of the United States, irredeemable for 25 years, would readily sell for 30 per cent. advance.

Extract of a letter from a gentleman in Salem, Massachusetts, to a gentleman in this town, dated 9th ult.

Our manufacturing interest has received a new impulse this year by the unprecedented demand for goods. Our vessels engaged in the trade to India find our cotton goods a better article than specie to carry thence to purchase spices, indigo and dye-stuffs. No less than 12 new cotton factories, to carry 50 to 60,000 spindles, are now about to be erected by the capital of Boston and Salem. The stock in the best old establishments cannot be had for less than from 15 to 30 per cent. advance. I consider this branch of manufacture as hardly yet begun in our country. With the raw material raised upon our own soil, our boundless water power, our skill and habits of industry, we may yet live to see millions of inhabitants of Asia clothed with the produce of our looms. When I see our ships taking our domestic cottons to the market of Calcutta, whence, about 25 years since, I myself was engaged in bringing cotton goods to supply our own wants, I am no less astonished than delighted. And all this is the fruit of a policy, the chief author of which is compelled, at this day, to utter his fears are yet unsettled!"

The revenue secured in New York in 1830 amounted to $15,012,553. It is expected to be much greater in the present year, as well as at all the other chief ports, because that the protection of domestic industry enables the people to purchase foreign articles more abundantly. The revenue at Philadelphia seems, so far, to have advanced one third on the receipts of the last year. In Baltimore the revenue will be much larger.

Constitutional question. During the administration of Mr. Jefferson, some costly philosophical apparatus was imported on account of the United States, it not then being thought unconstitutional for the general government to patronize and assist the progress of science, even to the building of "light-houses in the skies," as Mr. Ritchie mistated a saying of Mr. Adams. But we are getting wiser and wiser, and the splendid instruments obtained are hastening to decay as rapidly as the nature of their materials will admit of—because they cannot be constitutionally used! The Philadelphia Sentinel of the 16th inst. tells a pleasant tale on this subject. A professor in the university of Virginia wished to borrow the great telescope, which remains as lumber in the department of state, to take an accurate observation of the eclipse in February last, and applied for a loan of it, through a personal friend, one of the Pennsylvania delegation in congress; but a member of congress from Virginia (the right side of Mason and Dixon's famous line), started a question as to the constitutional power of the president to lend it, and the objection was so formidable as to forbid the loan—and so the telescope remains to rust yet awhile, then be sold as old brass and converted into chafing-dishes, convenient in the preparation of canvass back ducks. Obsta principiis! Hodie, hodie, delenda est Telescopium!

[We have made this Latin for the use of our friend of the "Richmond Enquirer," and if it is not "good," we hope that he will, of courtesy excuse it, in obedience to the old saw, "don't look a gift horse in the mouth"—for a "momentous crisis" is at hand: a professor in the uni-

† The presumption of the British in urging the people of other nations to give "freedom to trade," while themselves restricting every branch of commerce that can interfere with the profits of their own industry, should never fail to excite a just indignation against them.

RAIL ROADS. Many persons smiled when, about two years ago, we contemplated the arrival of fat oxen from the south branch of the Potomac, &c. by way of our rail road—fresh as in their own pastures, and fit for immediate use; but we see it stated in the Liverpool papers, that, on a certain day, forty-nine Irish pigs quitted Liverpool in one carriage, and arrived safely at Manchester, after a most noisy journey. The respectable quadrupeds evidently did not like the new mode of travelling, and in passing through the tunnel made an outcry which "echoed through the hollow dark abyss," and startled all within hearing. Since that time upwards of three hundred of the tusky herd have made the same journey, being probably the first set of pigs that have travelled in a loco-motive since the creation of the world. The fare for a pig is eighteen pence, being not quite half the fare of a pig driver. The company will begin to carry cattle very shortly, several commodious carriages having been constructed for their accommodation.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAIL ROAD. The second division of this road, extending twelve miles beyond Ellicott's was, for the first time opened for public use on Sunday last. As only one track of rails is yet fully laid, passengers can only just now be accommodated when the working cars do not occupy the track—but the second line of rails will soon be completed. This great work goes on, generally, in the very best manner, and it is no longer allowed to doubt the triumphant success of the undertaking. Its progress, however, is about to be impeded by the controversy with the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company as to the right of way, at the "Point of Rocks;" at which it is now desired to employ many laboring men.

The work on this division is executed in the most masterly manner. Its course is on the bank of the Patapsco to the forks of that river, passing through a granite district, rugged and rough, but the cost of it has not been large. The present termination of the road—26 miles from the depot in Baltimore, is nearly three hundred feet above tide. This rapid climbing of the mountains is not perceived—indeed passengers, unacquainted with the facts, always suppose they are descending though when actually rising as much as 20 feet in a mile.

The country is hilly, or rather mountainous, and the scenery beautiful—in some parts magnificent.

An accident (says the Baltimore Gazette of Saturday last) occurred on the Baltimore and Ohio rail-road this morning, which we mention to prevent the circulation of alarming reports. The editor was one of seven persons in a car propelled by two horses travelling on a wagon with a moving floor—constructed by Mr. Stimpson, which conveyed, besides the two vehicles, ten persons at the rate of from fifteen to twenty miles per hour.

On the return home between the Carrollton viaduct and the depot, a cow crossed the rail way so near the car which was in front, that it was impracticable to stop it in time to prevent it from running against her—the car was of course overset, and the passengers were all thrown out, but none, as we believe, seriously injured. The editor received two or three bruises, which he feels happy to say are but slight—two others were more severely hurt, but, as already stated, we believe not seriously.

The accident is not imputable to any want of care on the part of Mr. Stimpson, or to any defect in the car—it is such an accident as might have happened to any other moving power and could not have been foreseen or guarded against. The unfortunate cow was killed.

The experiment was entirely unconnected with any of the operations of the company.

Speaking of Mr. Stimpson's car, the editor of the Gazette further says—

The experiment made on Saturday, with the car moved by horses travelling in it on a moving floor, was entirely satisfactory as to the mode of applying horse power, so as to cause a great increase of velocity without increased exertion to the horses.

The ingenious inventor has so constructed his car that the horses moving it, by walking at the rate of 2½ miles per hour, propel the car at the rate of fifteen miles per hour, evidently with as little fatigue as horses experience in ploughing, or travelling with a wagon conveying a moderate load. This rate of speed appears to us the medium, which may be used without injury to the horses. It may be increased on a level, or descending rail-way free from short curves—and should be reduced in ascending or very crooked roads. If the use of horse power should be continued on our rail roads, such a mode of applying it would be important; indeed indispensible for travelling at a greater medium of speed than ten miles an hour.

As the day approaches more near for the trial of the locomotive steam engines on the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, our citizens are anxiously looking for the arrival of such as it is known were constructing for the purpose. We have already two in the city which will be ready for the amicable contest—they will probably both be on the road during the present week.

It will be recollected by our friends at a distance, who desire to witness the trial, that it will commence on Monday next, and continue for three days before any decision can be made. We are daily expecting another engine from Philadelphia, which we saw partly constructed about a month ago, and which we hope will arrive in time, as well as the others of which we have heard. [Gaz.

STEAM BOATS. The Hudson, which plyed between New York and New Haven, run on a rock in the night of the 16th, during a fog, about thirty miles from the former city, and almost immediately sunk. The passengers and crew were all saved, and have arrived in New York.

The Cincinnati Daily Advertiser says—we learn that the Daniel Boon struck on a snag at the Canadian Reach, about one hundred and fifty miles below the mouth of Ohio. She was on her way up from New Orleans. Boat and cargo, (so much as is perishable), will be lost. Crew and passengers saved.

STEAM WAGON! The locomotive engine, plying on the Charleston rail road, exploded on the 17th inst. by which the engineer was severely scalded, one negro badly wounded and two slightly, one of whom was the fireman, who caused the accident, by pressing on the safety valve to prevent the escape of the steam, when the carriage was stopped at the revolving platform!

EFFECT OF STEAM COACHES. Under this head, a late English periodical observes:—"The man who started the first steam carriage was the greatest benefactor to the cause of humanity the world ever had. Nothing could so successfully produce such complete mitigation, or rather abolition of animal suffering, as the substitution of locomotive machinery for the inhuman, merciless treatment of horses in stage coaches." In a political point of view, too, the writer regards the subject as one of vast importance. We have, says he, a superabundant population, with a limited territory; while each horse requires a greater quantity of land than would be sufficient to support a man! How extensive, then, will be the beneficial effects of withdrawing two-thirds of the horses, and appropiating the land required for them, to the raising of cattle, and to agricultural purposes. The Liverpool and Manchester steam coaches have driven fourteen horse coaches off the road already. Each of these coaches employed twelve horses, there being three stages, and a change of four horses each stage:—the total number of horses employed was therefore 168. Each horse, it is calculated, consumes on an average in pasturage, hay, corn, &c. annually, the produce of one acre and a half. The whole number would thus consume the produce of 252 acres. Now, suppose "every man had his acre" upon which to rear his family, (which some politicians have deemed sufficient) the maintainance of 252 families is gained to the country by these steam coaches! Taking the average number in a family at six, it will be seen, that the subsistence of 1512 individuals is thus obtained.

Steam carriage on common roads. It appears by the following article which we copy from the London Times, that steam carriages on common roads are in successful operation in England. There can be no doubt, over a well constructed turnpike, that steam instead of horse power would be of infinite advantage to the people of this country, and we feel confident that some one of our very enterprizing stage proprietors will make arrangements for its early introduction into the U. States. The pioneer in such an undertaking would certainly make a fortune, as it would be impossible for any other individual to compete with him on a well travelled route, with the usual means of conveyance by horse power. The immense reduction in the fare would of itself set all competition at defiance, and the increase of travel produced as a necessary consequence, would more than make up for the great difference in the price between old and new rates.

From the London Times.

"Some of the advantages to the public from the use of steam on the turnpike roads already begin to show themselves. Previous to the starting of the steam coach between Gloucester and Cheltenham, the fare was 4s. each person—now the public are taken by all the coaches at 1s per head. On Tuesday morning the steam coach took 33 passengers from Cheltenham to Gloucester in 50 minutes.

If the proprietors of the common coaches can now afford to run for one shilling instead of four, the former rates, it is a pretty commentary upon their consciences, when the public were in their power. But it is probable they are now running without profit, and must in a short time retire and yield to the superiority of steam. Gloucester is ten miles from Cheltenham, and as the steam cars travel it in fifty minutes, they go at the rate of twelve miles an hour, which we should think ought to be fast enough over a common road, to satisfy the most anxious.

☞ We insert the preceding articles to renew the claim of our old friend Oliver Evans, as the man who first started the idea and first propelled a land carriage by steam.

Hydrophobia. A little girl at New York, only two and a half years old, when at play, had her nose bitten by a dog, on the 20th April last. She recovered of the wound and appeared well, until the 14th inst. when she became fretful and soon shewed all the horrible symptoms of that most horrible disease, the hydrophobia. When water or any other liquid was presented, she was thrown into terrible convulsions—and, after 48 hours of suffering, which it is too painful to describe, she died shrieking with agony, 57 days after being bitten by a useless dog. This melancholy event has caused a high excitement in New York, and we hope will end in an enforcement of the laws every where, intended to protect persons from a fate so miserable. We do not know whether persons who are so fond of dogs—(ninety-nine times in a hundred actual nuisances in a city), as to allow such things to happen, ought not to be arraigned and punished for murder in the first degree. A man may not please his fancy, or indulge his propensities, at the risk of human life. It is enough that some persons have so little of decency in them, as to break their neighbors' rest by the barkings and howlings of fellow-puppies, or full-grown fellow-dogs, in densely populated neighborhoods.

A Chillicothe paper gives a long account of the terrible illness and death of Richard Foster, esq. who was bitten by his own dog on the 24th April, and died of the hydrophobia on the 7th of June. Except when convulsed, he attended to the settlement of his worldly affairs, perfectly sane, calm and collected.

A war of extermination has been carried on against the dogs in New York. An ordinance has passed inflicting a penalty of 25 dollars on the owner of any dog found running at large, and one dollar is given as a reward for every such dog that is killed. Five hundred dollars were appropriated for this latter purpose, and the premium had been paid for nearly 300 dogs killed. Dogs are "kind creatures" and we love them—but in their proper places.

Dr. Hamilton, after a laborious research, fixes the 10th day after the infliction of the wound, as the earliest period at which hydrophobia disease has appeared, and 19 months as the latest. Between these periods the times of the attack are very various. Of 131 cases, 17 were seized before the 30th day; 63 between the 30th and 59th; 23 from 60 to 90 days; 9 from 90 to 120; and 14 from 5 to 19 months. The doctor afterwards mentions the case of a boy bitten in the toe by a cat, on the 14th July, 1797, in which the poison lay dormant until the 19th November, 1800, a period of three years and four months! Dr. Thatcher's works on hydrophobia contains a minute description of several cases, almost too horrible to read or think of.

More "monopoly." Many hundred young women and girls in Massachusetts earn from one to two dollars a day, by platting straw, for the young women and girls of the nullificatory nation, who "dont do nothing at all;" and we see by the "Boston Courier" that John Varnum, esq. late member of congress from North Essex district, has made preparations for raising silk worms at his farm in Dracut, upon a very extensive scale. He calculates to have a million of mulberry trees, within three years.

Wool. The Poughkeepsie (N. Y.) Journal mentions that the competition among wool-buyers continues with unabated spirit in that country. The greater part is already engaged, and the rest daily passing into the hands of the manufacturer or speculator. Before the end of the month it is thought that none will remain in first hands, and it is estimated that upwards of 100,000 lbs. of different qualities have already been taken in by the different purchasers in Poughkeepsie, besides large quantities bought by persons residing in different parts of the country, and by manufacturers and speculators from abroad. One house in Poughkeepsie had taken in about 40,000 lbs. and would probably swell this amount to 100,000 lbs. "The following" says the Journal, "may be quoted as the present prices of wool in our market, viz:—50 to 58 cents for native wool—62 to 75 cents for merino—80 to 90 cents, for mixed and full blood Saxony. We saw one beautiful lot last week, the shearing of a gentleman of this town, consisting of about 2,000 lbs. of which one-third was merino, and the residue mixed and full blood Saxony, which has since been sold for 90 cents all round, cash. These prices are high, compared with those of the two past years, but it is generally believed by those who are best informed on the subject, that they will be fully maintained, unless there should be unexpectedly large importations of foreign wools."

☞ Those who had wool to sell did not more regret the low price of it the last two years than we did, but we have no pleasure in the present high rate at which it sells, believing that a sudden and severe reduction must soon take place, and a lasting injury result to the business generally, because of such extraordinary fluctuations. In the present state of the manufacture, these high prices cannot long be paid, and, with reduced operations at the mills, much harm will be rendered to growers of grain and other agricultural products, as well as growers and workers in wool.

Appointments—by the president. Hore Browse Trist, of Louisiana, to be surveyor for public lands in the state of Louisiana, in place of Joshua Barker, resigned.

Wm. N. Jeffers, of New Jersey, to be charge d'affairs to Central America.

Splendid works. Robert Gilmore, esq. president of the Baltimore Library company, has presented to that institution Audubon's magnificent ornithological work, now publishing in London. Mr. A. is a native of Louisiana—his drawings are as large as life, the sheets even taking-in the wild turkey and bald eagle of our country—every feather was measured, and the coloring is true to nature. No other so splendid work of its kind was ever presented to the public admiration.

Col. Jose Maria Tornel, late minister from Mexico to the United States, has presented to the university of Maryland, a copy of the great French Encyclopedia, in three hundred and fifty folio volumes, for which he has received the thanks of the board of trustees.

ENCYCLOPEDIA AMERICANA. The 6th vol. of this truly valuable work is just published. It gathers just fame as it proceeds and every day new supporters, which it so well deserves.

"ECONOMY." The Washington "Globe," says—"The fine frigate, the Potomac, which has been long fitting out for sea, descended yesterday on her way to Norfolk. On the day before she was visited by the secretary of the navy and the board of commissioners. She is in fine order for a long voyage, and destined, we believe, for the Pacific. If she touches on her way at any port of Europe with a foreign minister (of which we are not certain), it will be because her long destined voyage furnishes an opportunity to save the expense of sending a vessel for that object alone. It is great virtue in the head of a free government, to attend to economy in every thing submitted to his control."

Mr. Van Buren is, no doubt, the foreign minister alluded to.

The practice of sending out ministers in public vessels of war, is generally proper and sometimes highly expedient—the idea, however, of attaching "economy" to the voyage of a frigate to the South Seas, by way of England, is hardly less ridiculous than was the sending out of the frames of vessels from England, at the commencement of the late war, "peculiarly constructed" to sail up the cataract of Niagara! Messrs. McLane and Rives were sent, (together), to England and France in the Constellation frigate, in August, 1829—that vessel being destined for the Mediterranean. We have always understood, however, that the outfit of $9,000 was provided that ministers might pay the charges of their own transportations abroad. The carriage of Mr. Randolph to St. Petersburg cost us somewhere about 40,000 dollars—and that of Mr. Van Buren to England will probably be a greater expense to us.

MASSACHUSETTS. The house of representatives have, by a vote of 291 to 108, determined in favor of an amendment to the constitution reducing the number of representatives.

At a national republican meeting of the members of the legislature, the following delegates were appointed to attend the national convention at Baltimore, viz:

Suffolk—James T. Austin. Norfolk—Warren Lovering. Essex North—John Merrill. Essex South—Benj. W. Crowninshield. Worcester South—Ira Barton. Worcester North—John Locke. Middlesex—Kirk Boott. Plymouth—Gershom B. Weston. Barnstable—Parker Burnell. Franklin—John Nevers. Hampden—James Fowler. Berkshire—S. M. McKay. Bristol—Russell Freeman. At large, Alexander H. Everett and Henry Shaw.

THE BOSTON CITY GUARDS, a very superior corps, lately visited Philadelphia, and were entertained with all possible hospitality and kindness by all classes of the people of that city. It is stated that nothing since the reception of Lafayette called out so many inhabitants of Philadelphia, as the coming of the Boston city guards; and an abundance of civil and military honors were paid to them. The correct deportment of every member of the corps, under all circumstances, has elicited high praise.

The guards on their way to Philadelphia, were sumptuously entertained by Joseph Bonaparte, at his seat near Bordentown. An "incomparable band" of music accompanied the guards.

NEW YORK. We have extraordinary accounts of certain proceedings on the part of what is called the "regency at Albany" to obtain possession of the stock of the banks lately authorised—to accomplish which, several millions have been subscribed when only 100,000 dollars of real capital was allowed. A true history of these proceedings would probably be among the most curious things of the day. It is intimated that some grand political movement is the ultimate object of these extravagant doings. Certificates of deposit seem to have been issued in blank, to enable agents to subscribe for overwhelming amounts of the new stocks!

FIRE AT FAYETTEVILLE. About 10,000 dollars have been collected at Philadelphia—4,350 have been remitted from Charleston, S. C. Large sums have been received at Boston and New York. Baltimore will give pretty near 6,000 dollars—and the Friendship Fire Company, of this city, has presented 150 dollars. Subscriptions were making at Washington, Pittsburg, and in many other towns. There is hardly a village or hamlet that might not give something in this case of extreme destruction of property.

The Fayetteville Journal (extra) of the 10th, says:—Each day brings with it new evidence of the active exertions of our benevolent countrymen to relieve the distresses of our community. Meetings have been holden in most of our sister towns where our tale of sorrow has been told, and prompt and efficient aid has been afforded us. We have already received much kindness as a community; we have had frequent evidence of disinterested friendship ourselves; in returning our thanks we do but half express the emotions of our hearts—a more particular notice will hereafter be taken of those communities to whose goodness we are so largely indebted.

"Wooden nutmegs!" In the house of representatives of Massachusetts on Friday, 17th inst. on motion of Mr. Emmons, of Hinsdale, an order passed, requesting that every member of the house give the amount of one day's pay to their suffering brethren of Fayetteville, (N. C.)

"Pumpkin pies!" Boston, alone, will send about ten thousand dollars for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire at Fayetteville—a larger amount, perhaps, than the whole of the states south of "Mason and Dixon's line" have contributed, because of calamities suffered by fire, tempest or flood, northwardly, since the existence of the American republic! And the "Boston Courier" says—

"It appears to us that the proposal in some of the papers for procuring a fire engine with the contributions of the fire department, might be carried into effect without a very severe tax upon the individual members; and we highly approve the proposal of the Transcript to call it "the Yankee." There are a variety of reasons which would render it a valuable present to the citizens of Fayetteville; it might bless those who give, as well as those who receive. The people of the Carolinas have but little knowledge of the Yankees, and would be willing to give us credit for almost any thing but generosity or liberality."

"Dreadful literary calamity." The whole bundle of Mrs. Royall's southern tour, (says the Camden, S. C. Journal), intended for her subscribers in this town, was burnt in the Lafayette hotel, in the late distressing fire at Fayetteville. We have heard of nothing like it since the destruction of the Alexandrian library."

[We do not know whether it is quite lawful to raise a smile at any event happening in a calamity so severe as that which befel Fayetteville—but a smile excited may open the pockets of some more liberally, and will not retard the work of sober benevolence.]

MICHIGAN. From the Detroit Courier of May 28. The sales of public lands last week, up to 5 o'clock yesterday, amounted to twenty thousand seven hundred dollars! On two several days they exceeded 5,000 dollars; one day 5,600. The total amount, in this district alone, since the first of March, is forty-eight thousand seven hundred and twenty-seven dollars.

Products of Michigan—The cotton plant, the grape vine, the sweet potato of Carolina, tomata and the egg-plant, were all successfully cultivated in this city last year. The prune tree will be planted this season. The mulberry is becoming extensively cultivated.

PRESIDENT'S VISIT TO THE SOUTH. From the Raleigh Star. It will be seen by the following reply to an invitation from the citizens of Wilmington, that the president has declined making his contemplated tour to the south this summer:

Washington city, May 23, 1831.

Gentlemen: I have received your letter of the 18th inst. inviting me to partake of the hospitality of the citizens of Wilmington, in the event of my taking a southern tour this season. This tour I had contemplated with pleasure, last winter, as promising a useful relaxation from the cares of my office; but I find that a proper regard for the public interests compels me to forego it. I can, therefore, only tender you my thanks on this occasion, for the personal kindness of the citizens of Wilmington, and for the favorable view of my public services which accompanies it.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest respect, your obedient and humble servant.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Messrs. E. B. Dudley, O. Holmes, J. Hill.

MR. VAN BUREN. From the New York Standard. The subjoined correspondence is creditable to the hospitality and feelings of the gentlemen signing the invitation, since the courtesy there displayed reflects equal honor upon both parties. Our only regret is, that any circumstances should have proved adverse to a desire very generally expressed, that we might all be permitted to join in offering some tribute to the talents and worth of this distinguished son of New York; and of bearing testimony to the patriotic services he has rendered his country in his late short but brilliant career, as well as the magnanimous sacrifices made by him to a nice sense of honor, too rare in political men, to be properly appreciated. But the consolations afforded by an upright mind, and the cordial approbation of those of his fellow-citizens who can properly value both these duties and sacrifices, cannot but be grateful to him at all times.

New York, June 13, 1831.

Hon. Martin Van Buren, New York.

Sir—Although we regret that circumstances should have occurred to induce you to withdraw from the elevated station which you lately filled with so much honor to yourself, and so much usefulness to your country, we most sincerely congratulate you upon your safe return, in good health, to your native state.

We avail ourselves of the earliest opportunity to convey to you our warmest approbation of your public conduct—to assure you that we duly appreciate the patriotism and ability with which you have labored to promote the great interests of the republic—and that we have seen with equal pride and pleasure our foreign relations conducted by you, under the auspices of our illustrious chief magistrate, in a spirit of enlightened reciprocity, which has commanded the respect and ensured the good will of all nations.

Influenced by these considerations, and as a testimonial of our esteem for you, we invite you to partake with us, and other republican friends, of a dinner, to be given at such time as may suit your convenience. We have the honor to be, very respectfully, your friends and fellow citizens,

New York, June 15th, 1831.

GENTLEMEN—I am compelled to leave this city tomorrow, and as it is quite uncertain when that attention to my private affairs which has become absolutely necessary, will permit me to return, allow me to throw myself upon your indulgence to excuse me for declining the very flattering compliment you have been pleased to offer by your letter of the 15th inst. which was handed to me last evening.

To receive on my return to my native state, after the very difficult duties which I was called upon by the partiality of our chief magistrate to perform, this assurance of your undiminished confidence expressed in so flattering a manner, is one of the most grateful events of my life; and to secure the continuance of your good opinion, will be the object of my highest ambition. Allow me to thank you most kindly, fellow-citizens, for the very favorable estimate you have made of the manner in which I have discharged my official duties, and to assure you, that, proceeding from a source so intelligent and patriotic, it affords an ample, and most acceptable reward, for any public services it may have been my good fortune to render; and to add, that in recurring to the advantages secured to our country, in the particular branch of the public service to which you have referred, too much consideration cannot be given to the salutary influence of the firm, sincere, and direct course pursued by the president of the United States. In his intercourse with other governments, in proportion as the principles and objects of his policy have been developed, has been the favorable effect upon our foreign affairs; and confident as we may be, that a course so wisely commenced, will be continued with that inflexibility which belongs to his character; the happiest results may be anticipated from his future efforts, aided by the distinguished gentlemen who will constitute his cabinet.

I reciprocate gentlemen, the expressions of regard so kindly made by you, and have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant.

M. VAN BUREN.

To Walter Bowne, esq. &c. &c. &c.

☞ We have given our readers a pretty large "Mess of Politics"—but not of our own cooking. Things which we suppose ought to be preserved, are presented,—and with impartiality, so far as our means of making selections extended. We have used our small type which gets in about two pages of common matter—so that those not now interested in the reading of such articles, may find the more room appropriated to others. The times are "big with events." The charges, defences and speculations of the day, with the facts about to be stated, are unparalleled for interest in the political history of our country.

MR. MCLANE. The following extract from a letter from an American lady in London is going the rounds of the papers—

"We have been asked by many English persons if we have heard of the compliment which our minister paid to the king, in speaking of him a short time since. It seems that Mr. McLane said, 'he had never supposed it possible he could be brought to envy a king, but he would almost rather have had the feelings of William the fourth, on the day he dissolved parliament, than those of any other man that has ever lived.' The English appear much gratified at this opinion of their sovereign, expressed by an American citizen."

☞ Than those of WASHINGTON, when he resigned his command, the revolution being over, and the liberty of his country established? "Almost rather?" A "non committal" however, and we are glad of that!

THE TWENTY-FIFTH SECTION. A friend in Kentucky not having access to the journals of congress, has intimated a wish that we would state in our paper, for the satisfaction of many who desire information on the subject, what number of propositions have been made in congress, for the repeal of the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary act. We have accordingly examined the journals, and find that in three instances only has the repeal of the section been moved—1st by Mr. STEVENSON, of Virginia, April 26, 1822; 2dly by Mr. WICKLIFFE, of Kentucky, on the 24 of January, 1824; and 3dly by Mr. DAVIS, of South Carolina, at the last session. Neither of these propositions was debated; but the subject has been, incidentally, on other questions, introduced into debate. [Nat. Int.

FORGERY seems growing into a common offence in some parts of the United States; and especially by young men who had maintained an honorable reputation. Intemperance, women and gambling, are the joint parents of this offence against society, which the law rightfully punishes with great severity.

CREEK INDIANS. Several papers of Georgia have recently referred to the sufferings of the Creek Indians for the want of food, but we have seen nothing which so distinctly indicates their absolute wretchedness, as the following from the Columbus (Geo.) Enquirer, of the 4th inst. We unite with the editor of that paper, in the wish that the general government will promptly extend relief to the sufferers. The Enquirer says:—

"The distressed situation of the Creek Indians in Alabama, calls loudly for relief. Never have we witnessed greater suffering and misery, than is daily exhibited in our streets, in the persons of these wretched people. They are seen at every dwelling begging for food to sustain for the moment their famishing bodies, and from every part of their nation we learn, they are subsisting on unripe berries, and on roots and the bark of trees. On the western border of the Creek nation, we are informed, their suffering is more intense, and embraces a larger number than in this vicinity, and in consequence of it, they are flocking to Montgomery in crowds, and in a state of actual starvation. Immediate succour must be extended to them, or many of them will inevitably perish. No measures adequate to a full supply of their wants can be adopted, except through the agency of the general government. The entire failure of the Indians to raise any corn the past season, with its scarcity and consequent high price in the white settlements near them, forbid the possibility of any effectual aid being rendered them, except the United States' government extend a helping hand.

"We hope the president will relieve that portion of the Indian population which may be in a state of actual want. A memorial is now circulating for signatures in this town, addressed to the president, requesting him to establish an agency for the enrolment of emigrants, or to furnish with supplies the suffering Indians. Something must be done, and that speedily, for their aid, to save large numbers of them from destruction, and it can come from no other source than the United States' government."

☞There is no necessity for hurrying the remnants of the tribes to the west of the Mississippi—a free communication with the whites, and "freedom in trade," whiskey for corn or skins, will exterminate them as rapidly as those most covetous of their lands ought to desire. Our protection to them, like that of the British to the East Indians, is extermination.

MORAL CHARACTER OF THE FRIENDS. It is said judge Mellen, in his charge to the grand jury at the opening of the present term of the court, stated, that in a practice of forty-five years, in which he had been intimately acquainted with the proceedings of the judicial courts in this part of the country, he had never known but one instance in which a member of the society of Friends was arraigned at the bar as a criminal. LONDON, PARIS AND CONSTANTINOPLE. We abstract the following from Mr. F. Lowrie's new chart: London, on the river Thames, is ten miles long, from east to west, and six and a quarter broad, from north to south, and fifty miles in circumference. Its population is 1,500,000. It contains 70 squares, 8,000 streets, 177,000 houses, 146 parishes, as many churches, 82 chapels of ease, 15 Roman Catholic chapels, 6 synagogues, 7 Quaker meetings, 163 Dissenters' chapels, 13 theatres, 6 medical colleges, 33 hospitals, 72 banks, besides numerous other public institutions.

Paris is four and a half miles long, about three and a half broad, and seventeen in circumference. It contains 750,000 inhabitants, 12 mayoralties, 12 palaces, 17 bridges, 27 hospitals, 67 banks, 142 churches and chapels, 80 fountains, 22 markets, 4 museums, 9 prisons, and 14 theatres, besides numerous other public buildings.

Constantinople is built on seven hills. On the land side it has a strong wall and triple fortifications, eighteen feet apart, five gates and as many bridges. The fortifications on the side of the river are weak and decaying; on this side are 16 gates. Its circumference is from 12 to 14 miles. Its population 550,000—houses from 40 to 45,000. It has 300 mosques, 25 Greek churches, 130 baths, and 200 palaces and seraglios. The sultan's palace, said to be the most splendid in Europe, is three miles in circumference.

CANADA. Extract from a letter dated Montreal, June 13—

"Our port, (which is not half large enough for the shipping already here) presents a scene of bustle and activity far surpassing any thing ever before witnessed in this place. No less than 1,800 souls (settlers from the old country) arrived in this port within the last 24 hours in three steam boats; who, with all their large chests, boxes, puncheons and barrels of oat meal, molasses, &c. &c. exhibit, as the boats approach the city, a most ludicrous appearance; yet on seeing many of the poor creatures land under a scorching sun, men, women and children, the latter very numerous, from infants of the tenderest age upwards, and not a place to put their heads under covering, and some without the means of paying for a night's lodging even could it be obtained for money, the heart sickens at such a picture of human misery. Our hospitals are filled to overflowing with the sick among the emigrants, and tents are now erecting near one of the hospitals, that others may have the benefit of moderate assistance. Hundreds are seen stretched along the beach above the port, sleeping on the ground at night until they can get off to Upper Canada, or some other place of rendezvous, or procure employment. Last year at this time about 230 vessels and 8,000 emigrants had arrived at Quebec. This year very nearly or quite 400 vessels and 25,000 emigrants have arrived."

ITALY. Italy contains a population of 21,000,000 inhabitants, spread upon a surface of 90,652 square miles, which is rather more than 231 inhabitants to one square mile. Her stated revenue is about 323,370,000 francs; her active army 116,941 men.

EGYPT. The population of Egypt is near three millions. In this calculation are not included the tribes of Bedowens, who are encamped in the neighboring deserts, and who have now been brought to acknowledge the authority of the viceroy, and furnish him with troops, especially irregular cavalry, to act as partisans and scouts. The Arab settled population consists of two classes, the Fellahs or laborers, and the descendants of Bedowen tribes, who have settled in the villages of the valley of the Nile, and who consider themselves of purer blood than the former. The other states subject to Mehomed Ali, are—1. Dongola, Sennaar, and Kordofan; in short, the whole country beyond the Cataracts to the frontiers of Dar-foor and Abyssinia. 2. The Hedjah, including the holy cities, the sheriff of Mekka having no political power, and the pacha of Djedda being subordinate to the viceroyalty of Egypt; and, 3, the island of Candia. [Foreign Quarterly Review.

The pacha of Egypt, when visiting one of his military schools, exhorting the young officers to zeal and perseverance, the first difficulties being already overcome, said, "If I had any influence in heaven, I should work miracles in your behalf; but I am nothing more than a man, and can only give you salaries."

EAST INDIES. Ravages of the cholera.—The cholera has been making dreadful ravages in the lower part of Bengal within the last fortnight. One cannot pass up from Calcutta to Serampore without seeing ten or twelve funeral piles alighted at every hour of the day. The number of deaths in this little town, in the short space of a fortnight, has been two hundred and fifty. At Chandernago the mortality has, we learn, been much greater. Several instances have come under our notice of husband and wife, being carried off within a day or two of each other; in some cases whole families have been swept away. This disease is more rapid in its progress this year than on any other former occasion; in two hours the patient is beyond hope. It attacks all alike; children of the age of three, four, five and six years have been carried away by it, as well as the vigorous youth and decrepid old man. Scarcely a family is to be found in the neighborhood of this town which has not lost some relative.

FOREIGN NEWS.

An arrival at New York brings London advices to the evening of the 16th of May, those previously received being only to the morning of that day.

POLAND

The London Courier, of the 16th (an evening paper) gives full credit to the capitulation of the Polish army under general Dwernicki, to the Austrians, first published in the Times of that morning. It is thought that this event will not influence the operations of the main armies, and it is even supposed that an important object may have been achieved by rousing the people in the rear of the Russians, to arms. The corps under Dwernicki were humanely treated by the Austrians after their surrender.

IRELAND.

Upwards of one hundred and thirty persons have been arrested on suspicion of being concerned in the murder of a sergeant Robinson, of the 5th, and in the attack on the military and police at Ballinacally. All except nine had been discharged.

An attorney had absconded from Dublin, carrying with him not less than £6,000, procured by the sale of stock, fraudulently transferred to him.

Lord Castlereagh was, at the last advices, 140 ahead of his opponent, Mr. Crawford, in the county of Down.

A king's ship was expected in the Shannon, to prevent any intercourse by water, between the insurgents of Clare and the peasantry in the county of Limerick. A party of the Terrys had crossed from Clare to the county of Limerick on the Sunday previous to the 16th of May, and while the people were at mass, charged from house to house, plundering them of pistols, swords, &c. and re-embarked.

BRUSSELS.

A second attempt says a letter dated at Brussels, May 13th, had been made by the republican or French party to throw the city into confusion. It had been, however, completely frustrated by the precautionary measures adopted by government, supported by the prompt exertions of the civic guard and regular troops.

The intelligence from England of the probability that prince Leopold will accept the throne, had raised the drooping spirits of the friends of independence and repose, and is supposed to have driven the anarchists to the desperate attempt above mentioned.

FRANCE.

In consequence of the receipt of the news from Portugal, that Don Miguel had consented to make the reparations demanded of him by the French government, the levy of sailors by the minister of marine had been suspended.

The king accompanied by the dukes of Orleans and Nemours, marshals Soult and Gerard, and their respectives suites, were on a tour of reconnoisance, and the king had caused a note to be inserted in the papers, expressing a wish that no pomp be shewn to him, or extraordinary expense incurred by the towns in which he may stop—he wishes to hold communications with his people, but to avoid pageantry and show.

MOROCCO.

From advices received at Gibraltar, it appears that an insurrection has broken out at Mequinez, the capital of Morocco, where the emperor resides. The troops 12,000 in number, under the emperor's nephew, had revolted. They had been sent to occupy the province of Tremazen, in the Algerine territory, during the French invasion, but having disgusted the Tremazenians by their exactions, had been recalled to the capital, where gratifications had been given to the army generally, a difference however of a dollar a head being made in favor of the household troops, those under the nephew rebelled. The life of the emperor as well as that of his minister had been endangered. The former had been shut up three days in his palace, and the latter is said to have made his escape.

COLOMBIA.

Another revolution seems complete at Carthagena—for the time being. All the partizans of Bolivar are to be sent out of the country, and the ex-president, Mosquera, who has been sometime in the United States, is invited back to resume the administration.

A Bogota paper of the 18th May, gives a detailed account of the entrance of the army of the centre into that capital. "No people on earth," says the editor, "ever saw so brilliant a day as that which shone upon this city on the 15th of May. No champion more illustrious ever had the glory of entering a capital, than the philanthropic general Hilario Lopez."

We have also a handbill, dated Tunja, 2d May, entitled "Bulletin of the glorious battle of Cerinza." This battle was fought on the 26th of April. The liberating army, as it was called, under gen. Lopez, proved victorious. "As the fruits of this glorious triumph," says the bulletin, "we have in our camp as prisoners of war, col. Joan Jose Patria, col. Joaquin Barrera, captains Ramon Molano and Luis Granados, all the subalterns of the Tunja battalion and Sogamoso militia, 355 privates, 8 trumpeters, all the band of music of the battalions, 500 guns, 30 carbines, the park, a multitude of cattle and horses, and the immense resources of the Boyaca department." The loss of the victors was 2 captains and 6 soldiers killed.

AFFAIRS OF THE CHEROKEES.

From the Cherokee Phœnix of May 28, 1831.

POST OFFICE REFORM.

Who would have thought?—but so it is—The searching operation of the government has penetrated into the wilderness! New Echota has fallen under the proscription of major Barry, the post master general. On last Monday our worthy post master, rev. S. A. Worcester, who has given general satisfaction for the faithful and able manner in which he has discharged the duties of his office, was turned out, to make way for Wm. J. Tarvin, a trader who came into the nation under a license from the United States' agent, according to the law of 1802, regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, but who has since taken the oath of allegiance to Georgia, and is now selling spirituous liquor to the Indians, against the express injunction of the law referred to above. The present administration must be lynx-eyed if they can see from Washington "public interest" suffering in these woods, and if they can "promote" it in this manner. If the post master general had inquired of those who are interested in the management of the post office in this place, he would have learnt that they had a perfect confidence in the gentleman whom he has turned out, and that the present incumbent would not have been recommended by them to that station. But no, it is the "public interest" he is promoting, and he is doing it in a fine way.

"In local appointments, it will be readily admitted, that public opinion in the particular town or district of country chiefly and directly concerned, ought to be consulted. As in the case of post masters for instance."

This is a doctrine which the Nashville Republican, a leading supporter in Tennessee, of the present administration, admits to be correct; and it is unquestionably correct. But has it been observed? So far as one appointment has come under our immediate notice, it has been most palpably violated. In the case of the post office at this place the opinion of those chiefly and directly concerned has been most shamefully disregarded. We can think of no individual within twenty miles round who would have desired the change which has taken place, much less asked for it. We are even told that the place has not been solicited by Mr. Tarvin. If it is so, we presume we are indebted to our friends in Georgia, who live a hundred miles off, for this striking evidence of the tender regard which the present reforming administration entertains towards us.

It is surmised by some that the object in removing Mr. Worcester from the post office is to make way for his arrest. This we think is not at all improbable. We shall, however, soon know the true state of the case. [Ibid.

New Echota, June 4.

PROGRESS OF OPPRESSION.

We little thought when we were remarking last week on the post office reform in this place, that we should be able so soon to publish additional facts in regard to the means employed to effect the great object of the state of Georgia and the present administration of the general government. The surmises of some, that the removal of Mr. Worcester from the post office was but to pave a way for his arrest, have turned out to be well founded, as will be seen from the following order of col. Sanford, addressed to each of the missionaries under the care of the American board, and the letters of governor Gilmer to Messrs. Thompson and Worcester, which we have been permitted to publish.

Scudders', May 28th, 1831.

Sir—After the receipt of the enclosed letter, ten days will be allowed you, to remove out of the unsettled limits of the state. It found residing within it, after the expiration of that time, you will be subject to arrest and to such punishment as the law shall direct in case of illegal residence, &c. Your obedient servant,

J. W. A. SANFORD,
Commander Geo. guard.

Executive department, Milledgeville, 16th May, 1831.

Sir—Sufficient evidence has been obtained from the government of the United States to convince the courts of this state that the missionaries employed among the Cherokees by the American board of foreign missions are not its agents, and therefore not exempted from the operation of the law, forbidding white persons to reside among the Cherokees without license. In continuing so to reside you must have known that you were acting in violation of the laws of the state. The mistaken decision of the superior court upon this subject in the late case determined in Gwinnett county has enabled you for a time to persist in your opposition to the humane policy, which the general government has adopted for the civilization of the Indians, and in your efforts to prevent their submission to the laws of Georgia. However criminal your conduct in this respect may have been, I am still desirous that you should have an opportunity of avoiding the punishment which will certainly follow the continuance of your present residence. You are therefore advised to quit it, with as little delay as possible. Colonel Sanford, the commander of the guard, will be directed to cause to be delivered to you this letter, and to enforce the laws, if you should persist in your disobedience. Very respectfully, yours, &c. GEORGE R. GILMER.

Rev. John Thompson.

Executive department, Milledgeville, 16th May, 1831.

Sir—It is a part of my official duty to cause all white persons residing within the territory of the state occupied by the Cherokees to be removed therefrom, who refuse to take the oath to support the constitution and laws of the state. Information has been received of your continued residence within that territory, without complying with the requisites of the law, and of your claim to be exempted from its operation, on account of your holding the office of postmaster at New Echota.

You have no doubt been informed of your dismissal from that office. That you may be under no mistake as to this matter, you are also informed that the government of the United States does not recognize as its agents the missionaries acting under the direction of the American board of foreign missions. Whatever may have been your conduct in opposing the humane policy of the general government, or exciting the Indians to oppose the jurisdiction of the state, I am still desirous of giving you, and all others similarly situated, an opportunity of avoiding the punishment which will certainly follow your further residence within the state, contrary to its laws. You are therefore advised to remove from the territory of Georgia, occupied by the Cherokees. Col. Sanford, the commander of the guard, will be requested to have this letter delivered to you, and to delay your arrest until you shall have had an opportunity of leaving the state. Very respectfully, yours, &c. GEORGE R. GILMER.

Rev. Samuel Worcester.

The reader will perceive from the letters of governor Gilmer, that the general government is leagued with Georgia in carrying this unheard of prosecution against the missionaries. They are determined to remove them for the purpose of preventing their opposition to the humane policy of the general government for civilizing the Indians. May we be delivered from such civilization—we want none of it. If the missionaries must be punished, would it not be as well to punish them, at least, for some plausible reason. Instead of barely making gratuitous assertions against them, let them be taken and tried upon the charge of "opposing the policy of the general government, and exciting the Indians to oppose the jurisdiction of the state." Such a course would be a little more becoming.

Whether the missionaries will think it best to remove is more than we can say. We think it probable, however, that some of them will. Dr. Butler is already under an arrest. And as to Mr. Worcester, against whom there seems to be the greatest animosity, there has not been a single moment, since the passage of the Georgia law that he could have removed. And now it is impossible for him to remove if he is disposed to do so. Mrs. W. on account of ill health has been unable to leave the house for the last eight months, and at this time she is utterly unable to leave her bed. She cannot be removed without exposing her life to immediate danger. It will be seen that Mr. W. has but ten days notice.

The post office at Spring Place is yet occupied by Mr. Byhan, but we understand that arrangements are in progress to have him displaced, and we presume it will be done shortly. In order to effect this, the post master general will have to do one of three things. Either to bring in a white man from the states, or to alter the mail routes, or to discontinue the office and the mail route from the head of Coosa to Spring Place. To do the last would be to close the only channel through which we can carry on our correspondence and forward our paper to our subscribers. We may be mistaken, but we cannot suppress our fears that this course will be pursued. Many acts of reform, equally as astonishing as this would be, have been done. We are prepared to hear almost any thing.

We could wish that this were the end of our account of the progress of oppression, but it is not. The following note will speak for itself:

Ougillogy, Cher. Nation, June 1, 1831.

Mr. Boudinott:

Dear sir: The Georgia guard, under the command of col. Nelson, are now here with four prisoners, Messrs. Elliott and Dennis, white men, citizens of this nation by marriage, and the rev. Mr. Trott, also a white man, who are charged with a violation of the Georgia law, in living in this nation by its allowance and laws. The other is, Mr. John West, a young gentleman, and a Cherokee, who is charged with the high crime of using insolent language to the guard. These four I saw last night under guard, chained together in pairs and fastened with locks. Mr. David Vann, a member of the Cherokee senate, and Thomas Woodward are also arrested, but not chained, who are not allowed to know the reason of their arrest, until they arrive at head quarters, 70 or 80 miles from their respective residences. The guard is still in pursuit of other men. They have a wagon along, in which they have a drum, on which they beat, and a fife to make martial music. Your friend,

JOHN RIDGE.

"Hail Columbia happy land!"

We have a few additional facts to state, Mr. Trott is a Methodist itinerant missionary, under the direction of the Tennessee conference. We understand he is not allowed to ride, and that he is indeed chained every night. The rev. Mr. Clauder, Moravian missionary, was also arrested Tuesday morning and kept under guard about two hours and then discharged on his claiming the privilege of having ten days notice. The guard arrived in this place Tuesday evening, and put up at their usual quarters. On Wednesday morning a file of men, seven or eight in number, went to Mr. McCoy's and arrested him while he was at breakfast—they also went to Mr. Hick's, but did not find him, (he being not at home) after making a particular search in the house. When Mr. McCoy was taken to the commander, it turned out that he was arrested for presiding as president over a meeting of individuals in this place, a week or two since. Mr. Woodward was also imprisoned for a similar act. They were both discharged. As matters now go, it will soon become dangerous for any one to open his mouth and utter his opinions.

We will not enlarge upon this subject. He who reads will understand. To our Cherokee readers we say, have patience and forbearance. Cultivate good feelings even to our enemies. Let the public see that we are for peace, and that we use none but peaceable measures to assert our rights. We do not yet suffer as others have suffered. Many have suffered death for opinion's sake—we have not yet come to that.

N. B. Since writing the above, we are informed the guard passed by Spring Place and arrested Mr. Joseph Vann. Mr. V. is a native, and we presume is as ignorant of the cause of his arrest as the others were. There is nothing wanting but a court of inquisition to complete the tragedy.

Appeal of the Cherokees to the people of the U. S.

Whereas, it is incumbent upon us as citizens of the Cherokee nation, individually and collectively, to express to the people of the United States our views in relation to the proceedings of the executive of the general government towards our people, and the arbitrary course of the state of Georgia in its assumption of jurisdiction over the Cherokees, having for its primary object, the extinction of the Cherokee nation as a distinct political community, it is therefore resolved by this meeting—

1. That in recurrence to numerous treaties into which the United States have entered with the Cherokees, the United States, by treating with them in their national capacity, have recognized the right of the Cherokee nation to "govern itself," "to manage its own affairs," and to exercise powers as a sovereign state—consequently, Georgia, being a component part of the United States, exercising jurisdiction over the Cherokees for the purpose of governing them with its laws, is a flagrant violation of, and in direct opposition to the promises for our protection stipulated in said treaties.

2. That the Cherokees possess a twofold right to this territory, natural and conventional—the former by immemorial occupancy—the latter by treaty guarantees of the United States; and that the establishment of a military station by the state of Georgia, within our acknowledged boundaries, for the purpose of arresting our civil officers, confining them in jails, and for the purpose of forcibly taking possession of our gold mines, is an invasion upon our territory, which the treaty of the 27th February, 1819, had secured and reserved to the Cherokees.

3. That the survey of our territory, authorised by the late law of Georgia, into sectional districts and now on the eve of completion, is a violation of the law of the United States, enacted in 1802, forbidding citizens of the United States, under severe penalties, from entering into the Indian territories for the purpose of surveying or marking trees; that this law, being incorporated into the treaty of 1819, in order to afford to the Cherokees permanent protection as intended by the parties to said treaty, has been unconstitutionally, and to the injury of the people of this nation, suspended by the present chief magistrate.

4. That although the supreme court of the United States has refused to grant a bill of injunction as prayed for by the Cherokee nation, and although it cannot redress the past or future wrongs of the Cherokee nation, yet it is the opinion of this meeting that so much of the opinion of said court as has touched upon the great point of controversy between the state of Georgia and the Cherokee nation, is in favor of the latter; that if the Cherokees are a "state, a distinct political society, separated from others, capable of managing its own affairs and governing itself," it follows that they are not subject to the laws of Georgia, and that the assumption of jurisdiction by that state over the Cherokee territory is an exercise of arbitrary power, in open violation of the supreme law of the land, interpreted and pronounced by the highest judicial tribunal of the union.

5. That the above decision of the supreme court, namely, "that the Cherokees are a state," &c. is binding on the president, who is to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed," and on the people of the United States; therefore, we claim, as a state, the protection of this great republic, and call upon the good citizens thereof to use every lawful and constitutional effort, through their representatives and chief magistrate, to give effect to the points decided by the supreme court, to revive the force of treaties, to protect the liberties of the Cherokee people, and to save them from intolerable oppression.

6. That we cordially approve of the resolution, adopted at a large meeting of Cherokee citizens at Running Waters, of which Thomas Woodward was president, and Andrew Adair and S. Watie, secretaries.

Resolved, That the foregoing resolutions he presented to the editor of the Cherokee Phœnix for publication, and that editors friendly to the cause of the Cherokees be respectfully requested to copy them into their papers.

Resolved, that the proceedings of this meeting be signed by the president and vice presidents, and attested by the secretaries.

A MESS OF POLITICS.

Selected from various OPPOSING "ORGANS," for the edification and amusement of persons of all parties,—and published and preserved without remark, except in simple explanation of a fact.

FROM THE GLOBE OF JUNE 16.

[In reply to the article from the "Telegraph," a part of which was published in the last "Register," page 263.]

The president is assailed by the editor of the Telegraph, as having "put his own fame, the interests of the country and the republican party, upon a desperate attempt to control the private intercourse of society." He says: "shall a new cabinet be organized expressly for the purpose of controling society in this particular?" And he answers his own interrogatories by declaring, that if he were "to remain silent, it would confirm the influence which it is our [his] duty to combat. An influence which seeks to undermine our free institutions, and by using the power and patronage of the government, corrupt our public as well as our private morals."

We have here given, in his own language, the ground assumed by the editor of the Telegraph in his attack on the president. But upon what fact does he base the charge, that the president has organized a new cabinet for the purpose of controlling society in a "particular," which is to "corrupt our public as well as our private morals?" Is it to be found in the circumstances of the dissolution of the late cabinet? Did the secretary of war, in resigning his situation, evince a wish to exert cabinet influence to sustain him in society? We think not. By the declarations of a member of the late cabinet, it is now apparent that there was a deep rooted personal hostility existing among some of its members. Was not the knowledge of the existence of this difference, and that it was irreconcileable, sufficient to render its re-organization necessary. The people had seen the public service suffer during the administration of Mr. Monroe by the rivalry and dissention of Messrs. Adams, Crawford and Calhoun. They had seen jealousy and difference of opinion operating upon the secretary of state and secretary of war, under Mr. Madison, paralyzing the power of the government during war, and surrendering the seat of government itself to the enemy, almost without a struggle; the cabinet concurring in nothing, even when the enemy was at the door. If, as Mr. Branch has asserted, and has been so often repeated by the Telegraph, the "influences" were "malign," which operated upon the cabinet, is not that admission a sufficient justification of the president for the course adopted by him? Had Mr. Branch, or any other member of the cabinet, a right to call on the president to enter into the dissention, and by parting with one division of his cabinet and retaining the other, thus to put a mark of reprobation on those who left it?

Notwithstanding the difficulty of his course, the conduct of the president has been from the first, to the last, towards every member of his cabinet, kind and conciliatory. He exerted no other influence than that of a mutual and affectionate friend to sooth the feelings of the members of his cabinet and reconcile them to each other. Being unable to accomplish his benevolent wishes, he felt himself called on by his duty to the country, to bring together a new cabinet, which consulting in perfect harmony would be enabled to direct all its energies to the public service and to command his own and the public confidence. We believe there is no impartial man who does not approve the course which he adopted.

But the editor of the Telegraph imputes the wise course which the president has adopted, and which we believe the whole republican party approves, to a design to "corrupt our public as well as our private morals," and insists that the "new cabinet" is "organized" by the president for that purpose!! It is but a few days since this man pronounced the highest eulogium on the purity of Hugh L. White, whom the president has invited to fill the place of maj. Eaton. Will he say that the president has sought the co operation of this pure and upright man to corrupt society? What is there in the life and character of the venerable and enlightened Livingston to lead to such a conclusion as to him? Has the name of Louis McLane ever been coupled with dishonor? What, we demand, has Mr. Woodbury ever done to fit him for such a conspiracy against the private and public morals of the nation? Our sensitive, our scrupulous, our overweaningly fastidious Duff Green, is alarmed lest some "malign influence" will overcome all these honorable men, and induce them to make a common effort to compel society "to associate with a particular individual"—an individual too, in the retreats of private life, and going into a remote state—far from the scene of malign influence! Is it not astonishing that this "jealousy, the green-eyed monster," did not seize upon our editor, while in the midst of the terrible "circumstances of 1829?" Where was his scrupulosity then and since: How could he have sanctioned the intercourse his own wife and daughters have held with this "particular individual?" How could he have invited the whole city and half of congress to his house and brought it into association with this individual, to countenance whom we are now told, is sufficient "to corrupt our public as well as private morals."

FROM THE (PHILA.) AMERICAN SENTINEL OF JUNE 14.

[This paper, until very recently, was the "organ" of the Jackson party in Pennsylvania, but since the explosion of the "cabinet" at Washington, seems to have been superceded by the "Inquirer," lately edited by Mr. Norvell, (just appointed postmaster at Detroit, in place of judge Abbott, removed), and, for some time past, bitterly opposed to gov. Wolf and the administration of the state.]

Major William B. Lewis.

Yielding to the general wish of our republican friends, who insist that the intrigues of this officer, and his interference in our elections, ought of right to be spread before the people, we proceed to this ungracious task. It is one that has no attraction in itself; but connected as it is with the recollections of an endeared friend, whose memory we must revere as long as we can appreciate pure morals, and unostentatious virtue, and whose loss we must deplore with enduring regret, we would consult our personal inclinations if we permitted his wrongs to repose in his honored tomb. But the claims of justice cannot be postponed to gratify private feelings; and the fact, that the victim of injustice is no longer able to vindicate himself makes that a matter of duty, which under different circumstances, would be merely a question of expediency. Having commenced the task under these feelings, we shall not be disposed to shrink from it until justice is satisfied. If we succeed in proving that major William B. Lewis, of Tennessee, the second auditor of the treasury of the United States, did, through the subordinate officers of the general government, interfere in the congressional election in the third district; if through him, and in his name, the opinions of general Jackson, in relation to Mr. Miller, were falsified, to the irreparable injury of the latter, we shall, in the name and in the behalf of the outraged democracy of Pennsylvania, demand and expect justice against him, and never cease making the requisition, until it is complied with to the last scruple. We will not, we dare not compromise the rights of the dead.

It is not to be expected, that any thing but strong circumstances can be adduced in establishing such a charge against such an offender. The trail of the red warrior of the forest is not more difficult to follow than are the devious windings of the trained politician. But if "imputation which leads directly to the door of truth will satisfy," then the most incredulous will find enough, in this instance, to fasten our charge on the second auditor of the treasury. But to the facts.

It will be remembered, that after casting much about for an opposing candidate to Mr. Miller, his enemies (for those who started the opposition to him were literally so) finally settled on the present representative, col. John G. Watmough. This gentleman, it was well known, had been among the most ardent and decided opponents of general Jackson's election, and occupied in the opposition the prominent ground on which education, public services, and unexceptionable character naturally placed him. He had never publicly abandoned his political predilections, nor did he do so during the struggle that followed his nomination; his position being, up to this time, one of unpledged political independence. Mr. Miller, on the contrary, was an early friend of general Jackson, whose election he zealously supported in 1824, and to whom he gave his cordial suffrage in his capacity of a representative of the people in the memorable congressional election of 1825. He placed himself before the people of his district, distinctly and unequivocally as a supporter of the national administration; and the contest waged by his friends against col. Watmough was almost exclusively on the ground of that gentleman's frankly avowed sentiments as to the civic qualifications of gen. Jackson. Under such circumstances, it may be well supposed, that they were surprised, to say the least, to find that one of the most relentless of Mr. Miller's opponents was a subordinate officer of the customs; a person with whom he never had the slightest personal misunderstanding; who did not reside in his district; and who consequently had no voice in the question of his election. The gentleman alluded to is Mr. George Guier, one of the United States guagers, an active political partizan of the second congressional district. From the time that the contest grew warm, until its close, this personage appeared to have abandoned every other put suit, and to devote his exclusive energies to the defeat of Mr. Miller. The notorious fact, that in this crusade, his associations were chiefly with the most decided opponents of general Jackson, served further to increase the astonishment at a course apparently so much at variance with what was to be anticipated from one, who, under ordinary circumstances, would naturally be disinclined to break the organization of the Jackson party. The honest boldness of Mr. Guier, however, soon solved the mystery. The votes of Mr. Miller against the removal of the southern Indians, and in opposition to the veto message, were the favorite themes of Mr. Guier's electioneering against Mr. Miller; and in order to prove that he spoke advisedly, he gave major William B. Lewis as his authority for saying, "that the president had no confidence in Mr. Miller; that if he had no better friends than Mr. Miller, he would have but poor support, and that the president placed Mr. Miller on the level with Mr. Stansberry of Ohio." We adopt literally the proved words of Mr. Guier to prevent mistake or equivocation.

Such a declaration, coming from a person in the pay of the government, with whom major Lewis was known to be in habits of intimacy; repeated far and wide, vouched on the authority of major Lewis, who was known not only to be high in office, at Washington, but as the brother in-law of the secretary at war, the daily associate of the president, and a resident in his family, was fatal among a population possessing the high Jackson tone that then characterised the third district. At first, the friends of Mr. Miller would not credit, that major Lewis could have so far forgotten himself; but the confident tone of his organ left in our mind no doubt, but that Mr. Guier, in giving major Lewis as the author of the supposed opinions of the president respecting Mr. Miller, asserted nothing but the simple and unqualified truth: and in this opinion we were fully confirmed by subsequent events. After the result of the election had proved that the poisoned arrow had been well directed against Mr. Miller, some of his friends still doubting, whether the name of major Lewis was truly used, determined that the fact should be tested by an official investigation, and Mr. Guier's interference in the election in the third district was consequently made the subject of complaint to the treasury department. The district attorney, under the direction of the secretary of the treasury, examined a series of witnesses on oath, who proved every fact which we have remarked upon, in the fullest and clearest manner. His report is on file in the treasury department, and major Lewis, if he feels himself aggrieved by our summary, can give it at length to the world, in his own vindication. The manner in which his name was used by Mr. Guier, reached major Lewis before and after this official investigation, and what followed? Did major Lewis privately to Mr. Miller, or publicly to the world, disclaim Mr. Guier's use of his name? Did censure, in any form, ever reach the latter? Did private intercourse between the auditor and the guager cease? No! No! No! On the contrary, in the pastoral visit which major Lewis has recently paid us, Mr. Guier was his constant associate; and if we may judge from the freedom with which Mr. Guier uses his name as the authority for coming events, he is his chief confidant; and this too, after the recorded evidence of Mr. Guier's declaration respecting his interference had been sent to Washington, and was distinctly within his knowledge. What would have been the natural course of events if Mr. Guier had not truly spoken of major Lewis? The latter would have indignantly cast off the odious imputation, and the circulator of the calumny would have received the reprehension which such an abuse of his name richly deserved. But Mr. Guier had the strong shield of truth to protect him, and censure or rebuke could not reach him. Under such circumstances, no man, whose mind is open to the force of human evidence, and whose interest or prejudices do not render him inaccessible to the voice of truth, can doubt, that the United States guager was fully authorised to make his deadly onslaught on Mr. Miller. If the judgment of the reader is thus far convinced, then the charge of an interference of the most offensive character is made out against major Lewis. Such interference in the abstract, and under any circumstances, is utterly unjustifiable in an executive officer of the United States not resident among us. If tolerated, it is calculated to prostrate the state governments, and to destroy freedom of action and opinion among our representatives. It is degrading to the state in which it is attempted to be exercised; it is in violation of the sovereignty of the people of Pennsylvania, of whom, in common with the people of the union, the government of the United States is an emanation; and the press, which from craven fear would shrink from denouncing it in the valleys and on the mountain tops, would forfeit every claim to the character of free, and be ready at all times to traffic away the rights of a confiding people. But in the particular instance under review, and applied to such a man as Daniel H. Miller, it is without the shadow of excuse or extenuation, and appears, as such an act always should appear, in naked and hideous deformity.

We will not dwell on the private qualities which fastened his friends to him with links of steel, although the subject is as attractive as it is rich. We only speak of him as a public man, connected with the Jackson party. From the period when Pennsylvania nominated general Jackson in 1824 down to the day of his lamented death, Mr. Miller was ever found among the firmest supporters of the president. It is true, that when any particular measure of the government appeared inconsistent with his conscientious convictions of right, at variance with the interests of his constituents, or in opposition to the settled policy of his native Pennsylvania, like an honest man and a faithful representative, his voice was raised against it; but it was done with a total absence with every factious feeling, and in a manner that evinced it to be the honest dictate of a convinced judgment. How far he was the sincere, and even the enthusiastic friend of Andrew Jackson, we can appeal to his colleagues in congress during the last year of Mr. Monroe's administration, and during the stormy period that Mr. Adams exercised the executive functions. For the truth of this we can appeal to the ancient, faithful and valued friends of the president, nay to the president himself, whose legislative associate he was: and if this appeal should ever reach the eye of Andrew Jackson, we feel confident, that in the native frankness of his heart, and with the manly, sincere and generous candor, which extorts admiration for him, as a man, from friends and foes, he will yield to it a hearty and an unqualified assent. He will vindicate the memory of the honored dead from the foul calumny which blurs as pure an escutcheon as pertains to any Pennsylvania republican. The president, we know, never authorised the abuse of his name, of which we complain. But does that lessen the wrong of which we complain, in those of whom we complain? Words would be wasted, and time idly spent, in maintaining the negative of such a proposition before an intelligent people. To them we leave the subject, only asking for it a calm, a candid, and a deliberate judgment.

☞Mr. Miller, the member of the last congress from Pennsylvania, was an old acquaintance—perhaps, I might call him a personal friend; and, though not much in the habit of talking politics when we latterly met, we often conversed with much freedom on other subjects. On the morning of a certain day when an important vote, (perhaps the final one), was expected to be taken on the "Indian bill," we were discoursing with one another in the small room that serves as a passage from the hall of the house of representatives to the great rotundo, when a gentleman came up, and, as I thought, quite rudely interrupted us, with a warm party-appeal to Mr. Miller, invoking him, in strong terms, to support the bill—saying that the administration would be "thoroughly d—d if it failed." I had heard much of efforts made to obtain a majority for that bill, and supposed that its friends had proceeded to extraordinary lengths to carry it,—but was yet much astonished at such a display of feeling and force of expression, in the presence of a stranger—as, not knowing the gentleman, I supposed that he did not know me. Mr. Miller said that he could not vote for the bill, &c. and the gentleman used some rather bitter words: On which Mr. Miller declared, with great energy and firmness,—"Well—if either the Indians or the administration must be tomahawked—I shall be for tomahawking the administration!" The gentleman then left us in anger,—and when Mr. Miller had commenced to speak of certain means resorted to to carry that bill, and I think that he used the words "by bullying,"—he was called to his seat, and I had not an opportunity to ask who the gentleman was—though I knew that he was a member of the house, having often seen him in the hall.

On this simple statement of a fact—I shall offer no comment.

ED. REGISTER.

[The custom-house officer Guier spoken of in the "Sentinel," in the preceding article, seems to be a chief manager at Philadelphia. On the 7th of June a meeting of "the democratic citizens" was held, George M. Dallas, esq. in the chair, to make preparations for a celebration of the great anniversary. This Mr. Guier proposed that it should be a "Democratic-Jackson festival." An angry discussion followed, and at last the chair decided that a majority had agreed to Mr. Guier's proposal. This was warmly denied, and a regular division being had, there appeared 87 for and 83 against the proposition of the custom house officer. All present were acknowledged "Jacksonians." At this meeting an honorable mention of gov. Wolf's name, was hissed, by a part of the majority. The "Sentinel," however says that only one person was guilty of such indecency.

The "Inquirer" pronounces the Sentinel "no longer a Jackson print."]

[☞We thought that we had a copy of the reply of the "Globe," (on behalf of major Lewis), to the preceding—but it is mislaid. We shall insert it, however, if obtained.]

The "Telegraph," on publishing the charges preferred by the "Sentinel" against second auditor Lewis, says—"Well may the Sentinel express a doubt whether it will ever reach the eye of the president. Among the artifices resorted to by those who have surrounded him, [the president], and abused his name, is an organized plan of intercepting every thing, which they believe will open his eyes to their practices."

FROM THE GLOBE OF JUNE 17.

Mr. Kendall, who was detained at his father's, in New England, beyond the intended period of his absence, by the sickness and death of one of his children, returned to this city on Wednesday last.

Misrepresentations of the opposition corrected.

"Will the Globe deny that Mr. Ingham, gov. Branch, and Mr. Berrien, were dismissed because they refused to compel their families to associate with that of major Eaton!

"Will the Globe deny that, in January, 1830, a member of congress waited upon these gentlemen, and informed them, that it was the president's determination to remove them from office unless they conformed to his wishes in this respect." [Telegraph.

The editor of the Globe cannot venture to say what communications members of congress may have undertaken to make to Messrs. Ingham, Branch, and Berrien, but he denies emphatically that any member of congress was ever authorised by the president to inform these gentlemen that it was his "determination to remove them from office" if they "refused to compel their families to associate with that of major Eaton." If any member of congress has asserted that he had such authority, he is bound to inform the public under what pretext he assumed it.

We publish from the Richmond Enquirer and the Nashville Republican, articles which show that the course of the Telegraph is now pretty well understood by the friends of the president, in every section of the country. It is the duty of the republican prints to take pains to inform the people of the real attitude which the Telegraph now holds towards the administration. The plan of this paper has been, to profess an inclination for the re-election of the president, and still to wear the badges of the party, that it might keep up its circulation among the Jacksonians, and thus have the opportunity of persuading them of the "vanity and self love" of the president—and that he was seeking to "corrupt our public as well as our private morals." The motives which induces this individual to press his services upon the republican family, can no longer be mistaken. His hostility to its head is at last, after "pattering in a double sense," for six months, most distinctly avowed. The man who would command his kind services longer to the president under existing circumstances, might, on the same principles, advise him to take a cook who would poison his food. The character of the president is dearer to him than his life. He who would rob him of the unblemished honor, which has been ascribed to him by the voice of his country, strikes deeper than his vitals. The reputation of the president could only be reached by one who wore the disguise of a friend. It has been an invidious duty to expose such an assailant. We shall hereafter have as little to say of the Telegraph as of any other opposition paper.

To the preceding, the "Telegraph" replies—The Globe affects to deny that the member of congress who waited upon Messrs. Ingham, Branch and Berrien, was authorised by the president to do so. If the member of congress in question should now retract what he then said, which we do not believe he will, there are circumstances which will leave no room to doubt that he did act on the occasion, in question, at the instance of the executive. It is proper that we should say, that the knowledge of this fact and of the circumstances, have very lately come into our possession; and the manner of the denial of the Globe, seems to indicate the propriety of leaving to the parties themselves further developments. Perhaps the president may communicate the fact of the dissolution of his cabinet to congress. Perhaps an enquiry may be instituted on the nomination of the new ministers, or that of Mr. Van Buren as minister to England. In such case, all that we have said, and more, will be confirmed by the most undoubted testimony.

FROM THE UNITED STATES TELEGRAPH.

We are fully sensible of the difficulties of reaching the public mind in a state of high party excitement. We are aware of the attempts which have been made to forestall public sentiment by enlisting public jealousies against this press in advance. And knowing these things, we have forborne to speak to the public until we have no other alternative—until silence would be mean submission. Shall we sit with our arms folded, whilst the deserters from the ranks of the enemy bind our strong men, and deliver us all as captives? There is treason in the camp; and shall we permit the traitors to inscribe their own characters on our foreheads, without raising a finger or uttering a word? No; we will do our duty. We will sound the alarm, and arouse a feeling in every virtuous bosom which shall scout the treason, and expel the traitors. We will show who it is that has endangered the re-election of gen. Jackson. Who it is, that, under false pretensions, have won his confidence, and are now endeavoring to break up the republican party. And first—Amos Kendall.

Extract from Amos Kendoll's testimony given before the senate of Kentucky in 1827.

"Witness replied, that he came to Kentucky early in the year 1814, while Mr. Clay was in Europe; that it so happened that Mrs. Clay employed him to live in her family one year and teach her children; that he remained there about a year, and then settled in Georgetown; that shortly afterwards, he went to Lexington on business, and was taken sick in a boarding house; that Mrs. Clay hearing of it, sent her carriage for him, and as soon as he could be removed, had him carried to her house, where she nursed him with the utmost kindness, until he was able to return to Georgetown; that Mr. Clay had not yet come home, and witness had never seen him; that this kindness of Mrs. Clay's laid him under a weight of obligation to her which he always felt and acknowledged; that when Mr. Clay came home, he received a very cordial letter from him, thanking him for his service in his family, &c. that an acquaintance was formed shortly after, which was kept up with the most friendly feelings until since the late presidential election; that he had been stimulated in his exertions to promote Mr. Clay's views by his obligations to Mrs. Clay."

After this Mr. Clay offered Mr. Kendall a clerkship with a salary of one thousand dollars; Mr. Kendall asked one with a salary of fifteen hundred. Mr. Clay refused to give it, and Mr. Kendall turned for gen. Jackson. The following is a part of a letter afterwards addressed to Mr. Clay.

Extract from Mr. Kendall's letter to Mr. Clay.

"That the world may see how perfectly Messrs. Blair, Critten den, and myself, finally concurred in our "kind wishes" and views, I annex my letter to you of 21st of January to theirs of the 9th to Mr. White. You say, I never explained to you what I mean by "promoting our interest in the west by any arrangement other than the election of gen. Jackson." True; but did you not well understand my meaning? Read the letters of Crittenden and Blair, which you doubtless saw at the time, and you will see, as you already know, that it consisted wholly in my "kind wishes" towards you, whose elevation we all considered as identified with "our interest in the west."

ANTI-MASONIC!

To the editor of the Juniata Telegraph.

Gentlemen:—Having seen the proceedings of the anti-masonic convention lately held in Harrisburg, that I have been appointed one of their committee of correspondence for Juniata county, I think it due to myself as well as that party to state, that I am and always have been a "Jackson man," and that I believe, his re election is intimately associated with the best interests of our republic. I, therefore, take this occasion to say that I cannot consent to be considered one of a party, (whatever my opinion of masonry may be), whose primary object appears to be to deprive the country of the services of that distinguished individual. I am, &c.

JAMES FROW.

Mifflintown, 6th June, 1831.

FROM THE GEORGIA JOURNAL.

We believe that the unjust and partial course which the Telegraph adopted, unbecoming the dignity of its place, and irreconcileable with all ideas of propriety and fair dealing, has lessened its influence, and affected its prospects. We believe that the editor of the Telegraph, who has ever been indebted for his fame to his talents for defamation—with whom opinions and principles are "trifles light as air," and who has heretofore indulged in mischief with impunity—will soon be consigned to the oblivion which his real merits deserve.

It is evident, from the course which the Telegraph had for some time pursued, by vilifying many of the distinguished and ardent friends of the executive, and by distinguishing the president as the tool of these friends, that its editor was illy requiting the confidence and support of, and rendering poor service to the democratic party. * * * * * *

The Telegraph was established to support the interests and principles of the republican party. It was with this view, and for this purpose that the Telegraph has been cherished "with more than maternal kindness" by the democracy of the union, and been enabled to reap for itself, an overwhelming and extensive patronage. * * * * * *

Has he answered the just expectations of his numerous friends and patrons? Has he not been "false and faithless" to those who have, at all times, rendered him their warmest and most cordial aid, and who, in all emergencies, have been his best and most efficient supporters? Is he not now anathematising the friends he has betrayed? Has he not turned traitor to the best interests of his party, and yielded himself a willing victim to the just indignation of an incensed people?

"A MOMENTOUS CRISIS" A-HEAD!

From the Richmond Enquirer.

"The time is coming, when the true theory of the constitution is to be brought to its test.—If it fails, then "clouds and darkness rest upon us." The union itself may pass under one of the deepest eclipses which has ever obscured it. The south will never submit to a continued system of exaction, for the emolument of some manufacturing sections.—Let it once be understood, that this government is to be so changed from the original purposes of its formation, as that, in spite of the spirit of the restrictions of the charter, a revenue is to be raised on the south, for the benefit of the north—that taxes are to be laid, not for the purpose of paying off the debt, and the necessary expenses of the government, but to carry on a great and splendid scheme of internal improvement—to raise from the states, and then to distribute a large surplus among them—to pay off their debts, contracted for the purposes of making their own roads and canals—and pay off millions of pension money—Then, indeed, will the rub come. The south will not submit to such a state of things. The next congress may be the period of trial. If it should be found, that they will not modify the tariff—that they are determined to maintain it in all its excesses—that even the extinction of the public debt, is not to be the signal of a reduction of the tariff to merely the necessary point of expenditure, we look forward to a great change in the tone of the whole southern people; not to speak of other sections of the union. Efficient means will in all probability be employed to produce "a pull, and a strong pull, and a pull altogether."—A special convention may be called for the purpose of co-operation and of action."

FROM THE U. S. TELEGRAPH EXTRA.

Washington, June 21.

Another attack upon the liberty of the press.

The following correspondence speaks for itself; and is further confirmation of what we have said relative to the causes which dissolved the late cabinet. We reserve for a subsequent notice, our comment upon this extraordinary attempt to silence this press, by holding others responsible for our statement of a fact which, so far as Mr. Ingham was concerned, had been stated in the Philadelphia Inquirer, several weeks ago. the truth of which cannot be denied. It is proper, however, that we should say that Mr. Ingham having completed the important reports, for which he continued in the discharge of the duties as secretary of the treasury, had made his arrangements to leave the department yesterday. In the morning he was engaged in taking leave of his friends, when major Eaton, accompanied by several others, made his appearance in the treasury building. Their conduct was such as to attract the notice of the clerks; and a report soon was circulated that he had come there for the purpose of making a personal attack upon Mr. Ingham. One of his friends immediately apprised Mr. Ingham of it; and he, having prepared himself for the occasion, passed to his office without molestation. Some short time afterwards major Eaton, with two of his brothers-in-law, doctor Randolph and major Lewis, left the building. Mr. Ingham, we are informed, will leave the city for Pennsylvania, to-morrow.

MR. EATON TO MR. INGHAM.

Friday night, 17th June, 1831.

Sir: I have studied to disregard the abusive slanders which have arisen through so debased a source as the columns of the United States Telegraph. I have been content to wait for the full development of what he had to say, and until persons of responsible character should be brought forth to endorse his vile abuse of me and my family. In that paper of this evening is contained the following remark of my wife: "It is proven that the secretaries of the treasury, and of the navy, and of the attorney general, refused to associate with her."* This publication appears in a paper which professes to be friendly to you, and is brought forth under your immediate eye. I desire to know of you, whether or not you sanction or will disavow it. The relation we have sustained towards each other authorises me to demand an immediate answer. Very respectfully,

J. H. EATON.

REPLY.

Washington, 18th June, 1831.

Sir: I have not been able to ascertain, from your note of last evening, whether it is the publication referred to by you, or the fact stated in the Telegraph, which you desire to know whether I have sanctioned or will disavow. If it be the first you demand, it is too absurd to merit an answer. If it be the last, you may find authority for the same fact in a Philadelphia paper, about the first of April last, which is deemed to be quite as friendly to you as the Telegraph may be to me. When you have settled such accounts with your particular friends, it will be time enough to make demands of others. In the mean time, I take the occasion to say, that you must be not a litte deranged, to imagine that any blustering of yours could induce me to disavow what all the inhabitants of this city know, and perhaps half the people of the United States believe to be true. I am, sir, respectfully yours, &c. S. D. INGHAM.

John H. Eaton, esq.

MR. EATON TO MR. INGHAM.

18th June, 1831.

Sir: I have received your letter of to-day, and regret to find that to a frank and candid enquiry brought before you, an answer impudent and insolent is returned. To injury unprovoked, you are pleased to add insult. What is the remedy? It is to indulge the expectation that, though a man may be mean enough to slander, or base enough to encourage it, he yet may have bravery sufficient to repair the wrong. In that spirit I demand of you satisfaction for the wrong and injury you done me.

Your answer must determine whether you are so far entitled to the name and character of a gentleman as to be able to act like one. Very respectfully, J. H. EATON.

Samuel D. Ingham, esq.

REPLY.

Washington, 20th June, 1831.

Sir: Your note of Saturday, purporting to be a demand of satisfaction for injury done to you, was received on that day; company prevented me from sending an immediate answer. Yesterday morning your brother in-law, Dr. Randolph intruded himself into my room, with a threat of personal violence. I perfectly understand the part you are made to play in the farce now acting before the American people. I am not to be intimidated by threats, or provoked by abuse, to any act inconsistent with the pity and contempt which your condition and conduct inspire. Yours sir, respectfully, S. D. INGHAM.

John H. Eaton, esq.

MR. EATON TO MR. INGHAM.

20th June, 1831.

Sir: Your note of this morning is received. It proves to me that you are quite brave enough to do a mean action, but too great a coward to repair it. Your contempt I heed not; your pity I despise. It is such contemptible fellows as yourself that have set forth rumors of their own creation, and taken them as a ground of imputation against me. If that be good cause, then should you have pity of yourself, for your wife has not escaped them, and you must know it.—But no more; here our correspondence closes. Nothing more will be received short of acceptance of my demand of Saturday, and nothing more be said to me until face to face we meet. It is not my nature to brook your insults, nor will they be submitted to. J. H. EATON.

S. D. Ingham, esq.

*This is not fairly quoted. We said:

"It is proved that the families of the secretary of the treasury, and of the navy, and of the attorney general, refused to associate with her." Ed. Tel.

From the Globe of June 22.

A correspondence of a private nature, between Messrs. Eaton and Ingham appears in the Telegraph of last evening. It is to be regretted that circumstances sometimes occur in the private relations of life, which make such appeals necessary. The merits of this controversy, like all others of a private nature, we shall leave to the decision of the public, without any comment from us.

We are, however, requested to state, that the account given in the Telegraph of a collection of persons in the treasury department, with the view of making a personal attack on Mr. Ingham, is utterly destitute of foundation.

We are further requested to state, that major Eaton did, without any attendant whatever, seek a meeting with Mr. Ingham, having first sent him word of his intention, in which he failed, simply because the object could not be effected without violating the sanctity of a private dwelling.

Letter from the ex-secretary of the treasury to the president of the United States.

FROM THE U. S. TELEGRAPH, JUNE 22.

Washington, 21st June, 1831.

The president of the United States:

SIR: Before I leave the city, it seems to be due to the government that I should perform a painful duty, imposed upon me by the events of the last forty-eight hours. It is not necessary for me now to detail the circumstances which have convinced me of the existence of vindictive personal hostility to me among some of the officers of the government near your person, and supposed to be in your special confidence, which has been particularly developed within the last two weeks, and has finally displayed itself in an attempt to way-lay me on my way to the office yesterday, as I have reason to believe, for the purpose of assassination. If you have not already been apprised of these movements, you may perhaps be surprised to learn, that the persons concerned in them are the late secretary of war and the acting secretary of war; and that the second auditor of the treasury, register of the treasury, and the treasurer of the United States, were in their company; and that the treasurer's and register's rooms, in the lower part of the building of the treasury department; and also a groeery store between my lodgings and the office, were alternately occupied as their rendezvous while lying in wait; the former affording the best opportunity for observing my approach. Apprised of these movements on my return from taking leave of some of my friends, I found myself obliged to arm, and accompanied by my son and some other friends, I repaired to the office, to finish the business of the day, after which I returned to my lodgings in the same company. It is proper to state, that the principal persons who had been thus employed for several hours retired from the department soon after I entered my room, and that I received no molestation from them either at my ingress or egress. But, having recruited an additional force in the evening, they paraded until a late hour on the streets near my lodgings, heavily armed, threatening an assault on the dwelling I reside in.

I do not present these facts to your notice for the purpose of invoking your protection. So far as an individual may rely on his own personal efforts, I am willing to meet this peril; and against an assault by numbers I have found an ample assurance of protection in the generous tender of personal service from the citizens of Washington. But they are communicated to you as the chief magistrate of the United States, and most especially of the District of Columbia, whose duties in maintaining good order among its inhabitants, and protecting the officers of the government in the discharge of their duties, cannot be unknown to you.

I have only to add that, so far as I am informed, all the persons engaged in giving countenance to this business are officers of the government, except the late secretary of war. I have the honor to be, respectfully, your obedient servant, S. D. INGHAM.

FROM THE GLOBE OF JUNE 23.

The gentlemen implicated in Mr. Ingham's letter, which we insert, have furnished us with the call made upon them by the president, and the several responses made by each of them. It is strange that Mr. Ingham would charge men who have borne pure and unsullied characters through life with "lying in wait to assassinate him," that he would, by a direct communication, call upon the president to interpose his authority upon the occasion, and then leave the city himself before the information he gave could reach the chief magistrate to whom he appealed to redress the imputed wrongs. Mr. Ingham was himself the only accuser and witness to whom the president could refer, to make good the charges against the public officers; and it was very extraordinary that he should make an investigation necessary, and abandon the city before the individuals charged could have an opportunity of convincing him, by proving the real state of facts, how much he had wronged them in his suspicions.

But was it respectful to the president to make allegations which, if true, involved the dismission of several of the prominent officers in the departments without enabling him to ascertain the facts on which it was necessary to predicate his conduct? Mr. Ingham knew from the course held by the president towards the officers engaged in the affair of honor in Pennsylvania, that he would not tolerate violence on the part of those connected with the government over which he presided, and that he would feel himself bound to proseeute an investigation into the charge made by him. Mr. Ingham was apprised that major Eaton had ceased to act as a public officer, on the day that he demanded personal satisfaction for the insults with which he pursued him. The motive of the attempt made by Mr. Ingham to implicate several prominent officers of the government, as conspiring to assassinate him, is certainly rendered questionable by the peculiar circumstances, and by the manner in which it is done. If Mr. Ingham had reason to believe that he could substantiate an offence of so aggravated a character on those criminated by him, was it not his duty to have remained and to have confronted the accused? If he had no ground to make such accusation, what apology will he offer to the public for directing, like the flying Parthian, a poisoned arrow at the individuals who had never injured, or intended to injure him, and whom it is evident he feared to encounter face to face, and wait the result of an investigation.

Note—Mr. Ingham left the city at 4 o'clock, A. M. The letter was received by the president, through the post office, at 8 o'clock, A. M.

Messrs. col. Campbell, treasurer; major Smith, register; Dr. Randolph, acting secretary of war; and major Lewis, 2nd auditor:

GENTLEMEN: I have this moment reeeived the enelosed letter from Mr. Ingham, dated the 21st instant, and having immediately, on its reeeipt, sent to ask an interview with him, I find that he left the city before it reached me. I wish you to state to me, if you, or either of you, have had any ageney or partieipation, and if any, to what extent, in the alleged miseonduet imputed in his letter herewith enelosed.

I surely have been deceived in your eharaeters if you are capable of so far forgetting the responsiblities of your stations as to participate in the reprehensible conduct charged. To the serious charges contained in Mr. Ingham's letter, which gave me the first information that I have had upon the subjeet of his difficulties, I wish you to give a prompt and explieit answer. Respeetfully,

ANDREW JACKSON.

SIR: I have had the honor to reeeive your communication of this day, enclosing a copy of a letter to you from the late secretary of the treasury of the 21st instant, complaining of an attempt to way-lay him on the part of certain officers of the government, for the purpose of assassination, and charging me with being in their, company and my room in the treasury with being alternately occupied with other officers as a rendezvous for them while lying in wait.—It might perhaps be sufficient for the purpose which you have referred this communication to me, for me to apply to the charges against me, a simple and unqualified denial. They are entirely destitute of the least foundation in truth: but to show you more clearly how far I was from aiding or participating in any thing connected with this matter complained of, I will beg your permission to add the following circumstances. The late secretary of war, major Eaton, never consulted me upon the subject of his controversy with Mr. Ingham, nor did I even see him on the day in question, except in an accidental meeting of a few minutes. I never saw the correspondence between them until it appeared in the Telegraph; and although I had heard that a correspondence was going on which might result in a personal conflict, I did not believe it was likely to take place on that day, or even that Washington was to be the scene of it.

Trusting that these facts and explanations will be entirely satisfactory to you, I cannot withold the expression of my astonishment, that charges so wholly uncalled for and groundless, should have been made against me by a gentleman with whom I never had the least cause of quarrel, and with whom my official intercourse, since my entrance into the treasury, had uniformly been of the most friendly character.—I certainly had no idea of arming against him, or of interfering in any way in his dispute with major Eaton. I have the honor to remain your most obedient servant, JOHN CAMPBELL.

The president of the U. States.

Mr. Lewis to the president.

Washington, 22nd June, 1831.

SIR: Your letter of this morning has this moment been received, and in reply I have to say that the charge made against me by Mr. Ingham of having been engaged in a conspiracy against him, is devoid of truth. If there were any such conspiracy against him, as alleged in his letter to you of yesterday, it was entirely unknown to me.

I arrived at my office on Monday morning, 20th inst. about half past eight o'clock, and never left the building until about half after two, when I walked down to the U. States bank, to attend to some bank business. After seeing the teller of the bank, and informing him what I wanted done, I went to a barber's shop a little below Mr. Strother's hotel. On my return I called at the register's office, a few minutes before three o'clock, where I saw, unexpectedly, Mr. Eaton—it being the first time I had seen him since last Saturday evening. I remained in the registers office about five minutes, and then walked up to my own office in company with no other person than Mr. Eaton. Dr. Randolph was not there, nor did I see him any where, on that day, out of the war office, until late in the evening. I neither saw nor heard of Mr. Ingham while I was at the treasury department. I had no arms of any description about me. I am, very respectfully, your most obedient servant, W. B. LEWIS.

Mr. Smith to the president.

Washington, June 22nd, 1831.

SIR: In reply to your note of to-day, enclosing a copy of a letter from Mr. Ingham to you, bearing date the 21st inst. I beg leave to state, that the charges contained in Mr. Ingham's letter, as far as they relate to me, are wholly untrue. I have had no participation or agency, whatever, in the controversy between major Eaton and Mr. Ingham. I have given neither aid nor succor to major Eaton, nor any one for him. I have not walked with him, nor near him. I have not sought Mr. Ingham, nor been in his neighborhood. I have been unarmed constantly, and in all respects I have been unconnected with any thing that threatened his safety. As to the charge that my office was used for any such purposes as are named by Mr. Ingham, it is not less untrue than the rest of the statement. Major Eaton was in my office twice, once between ten and eleven o'clock, and once about fifteen minutes before three; each time he came alone, and did not remain more than ten minutes.

I regret, sir, that Mr. Ingham, in making charges of such grave import, had not thought proper to refer to the authority upon which he based his allegations, and awaited the issue before he left the city. With the highest respect, your obd't. serv't. T. L. SMITH.

To the president.

Mr. Randolph to the president.

Washington, 22nd June, 1831.

SIR: In answer to your letter of this date, asking the extent of my participation in the controversy lately passed between Mr. Ingham and major Eaton, and how far I am amenable to the charges made by Mr. Ingham against me, in his letter of yesterday, I have to reply, that I had no further agency in the matter than is shown in the correspondence between those gentlemen, as published in the Telegraph on Tuesday last. I was not with major Eaton more than ten minutes at any one time between 9 and 3 o'clock on Monday, on which day the charge of a combination for the purpose of assassinating Mr. Ingham is made by him against me and others. I did not participate in, nor did I know of any design to attack Mr. Ingham's residence as is charged by him, nor was I armed at any time during the hours mentioned, having no apprehension of danger from Mr. Ingham, or those "friends" whom he says surrounded him. Major Eaton was alone when he sought an interview with Mr. Ingham, as will be shewn by the certificates of two respectable individuals. Respectfully yours, P. G. RANDOLPH.

FROM THE TELEGRAPH OF JUNE 23.

The Globe of this morning republishes Mr. Ingham's letter to the president, calling it a Parthian arrow, and gives a correspondence between the president and the persons implicated, who deny all knowledge or participation in the attack contemplated by major Eaton. Before the events in question had transpired, Mr. Ingham had made an arrangement with his friends and neighbors which precluded his longer stay in this city. He remained longer than he had before intended. His letter, now called a Parthian arrow, followed in the order of events; besides, he has not gone so far that he cannot be found; we venture to say that he is not done with this matter. The Globe, containing the denial of the statements contained in his published letter, will reach him in the course of the mail, and when his reply shall reach us, we will have some further particulars in confirmation of what he has said.

FROM THE GLOBE OF JUNE 24.

June 23, 1831.

MR. BLAIR: I owe it to myself and to the cause of truth to solicit the favor of offering a few explanations through the Globe.

A strange letter of Mr. Ingham is published in your paper this morning. It charges me with a design to assassinate him; and in having organized a conspiracy to accomplish it. Why did I not organize this band from the war, rather than the treasury department—for most of the gentlemen charged are of the latter? The public will not, I presume, give credit to such an accusation, coming from such a source. Wantonly insulted by Mr. Ingham, with a view, as I believed, to provoke an adjustment of our difference in an honorable way, I adopted the course which evidently seemed to be invited by my adversary; and which appeared to be the only alternative that was left to me.

I plead not guilty to this charge of conspiracy and meditated assassination. From the moment I perceived that Mr. Ingham was incapable of acting as became a man, I resolved to pursue that course, which was suited to the character of one who had sought difficulties, and shunned all honorable accountability. I harbored no design upon the heart of one who had, shown himself so heartless. Having ascertained that his sensibilities were to be found only upon the surface, I meant to make the proper application.

On the 19th I notified him, that unless the call I had made upon him, was promptly and properly answered, he might expect such treatment as I thought his conduct deserved. My note of the 20th also advised him of my intention. Accordingly it appeared matter of duty for me, to dissolve all connexion with the administration of the government. How then can Mr. Ingham suppose, that I would involve those gentlemen in a disgraceful conspiracy against him—one in which, as public officers, they could not engage even if inclination had sanctioned? Their own characters are a sufficient answer to the accusation, unaided by their positive denial of its truth. I did endeavor to meet Mr. Ingham, and to settle our difference. Unattended by any one, I sought after, and awaited his appearance, during the accustomed hours for business, openly and at places where he daily passed to his office. He was not to be found! I passed by, but at no time stopped at, or attempted to enter his house, nor to besiege it by day or by night. I offer no statement here that is not susceptible of the clearest proof.

My note of the 20th was written with indignant feelings, and under strong excitement; hence the reason why any reference was made to a female. I regret it; although the letter was a mere private notice to Mr. Ingham, and was so intended. By me, it never was designed to meet, nor ever would have met the public eye.

Respectfully, &c. J. H. EATON.

Mr. Berrien. At length the formal resignation of the attorney general has appeared. The following is the correspondence with the president in relation thereto:—

From the United States Telegraph.

Washington, 15th June, 1831.

SIR: I herewith tender to you my resignation of the office of attorney general of the United States. Two considerations restrained me from taking this step at the moment when your communication to the secretary of the treasury, announcing your determination to reorganize your cabinet, first met my eye. There was nothing in the retirement of the secretaries of state and of war, or in the distinct and personal considerations which they had assigned for this measure, which made it obligatory upon, or even proper for me to adopt a similar course. Such a step with any reference to that occurrence, could only become so, on my part, as an act of conformity to your will. You had felt this, and had announced your wishes to the secretaries of the treasury and of the navy, respectively. I had a right to expect a similar communication of them, and conformed to the wishes and opinions of my fellow citizens of Georgia when I determined to await it. An additional consideration was presented by the fact that I had been charged, at the moment of my departure from this place with the performance of certain public duties which were yet unfinished, and my report concerning which you did not expect to receive until my return. I was gratified to learn from yourself that you had taken the same view of this subject, having postponed the communication of your wishes to me until my arrival at this place, without expecting in the mean time any communication from me. It is due to myself further to state, that, from the moment when I saw the communication referred to, I have considered my official relation to you as terminated, or as subsisting only until my return to the city should enable me to conform to your wishes by the formal surrender of my office, which it is the purpose of this note to make.

I retire, then, sir, with cheerfulness from the station to which your confidence had called me, because I have the consciousness of having endeavored to discharge its duties with fidelity to yourself and to the country. Uninfluenced by those considerations which have been avowed by that portion of my colleagues who have voluntarily separated themselves from you—totally ignorant of any want of harmony in your cabinet, which either has, or ought to have impeded the operations of your administration, I perform this act simply in obedience to your will. I have not the slightest disposition to discuss the question of its propriety. It is true that in a government like ours, power is but a trust to be used for the benefit of those who have delegated it; and that circumstances might exist in which the necessity of self-vindication would justify such an inquiry. The first consideration belongs to those to whom we are both and equally accountable. From the influence of the second you have relieved me, by your own explicit declaration that no complaint affecting either my official or individual conduct has at any time reached you. You have assured me that the confidence which induced you originally to confer the appointment upon me remains unshaken and undiminished, and have been pleased to express the regret which you feel at the separation, which circumstances have, in your view of the subject, rendered unavoidable. You have kindly added the assurance of your continued good wishes for my welfare. You will not, therefore, refuse to me the gratification of expressing my earnest hope, that, under the influence of better counsels, your own and the interests of our common country may receive all the benefits which you have anticipated from the change of your confidential advisers. A very few days will suffice to enable me to put my office in a condition for the reception of my successor, and I will advise you of the fact as soon as its arrangement is complete. I am, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

JN. MACPHERSON BERRIEN.

To the president of the United States.

Washington, June 15, 1831.

SIR: I have received your letter resigning the office of attorney general.

In the conversation which I held with you, the day before yesterday, upon this subject, it was my desire to present to you the considerations upon which I acted in accepting the resignation of the other members of the cabinet, and to assure you, in regard to yourself, as well as to them, that they imply no dissatisfaction with the manner in which the duties of the respective departments have been performed. It affords me great pleasure to find that you have not misconceived the character of those considerations, and that you do justice to the personal feelings with which they are unconnected.

I will only add, that the determination to change my cabinet was dictated by an imperious sense of public duty, and a thorough, though painful conviction, that the stewardship of power, with which I am clothed, called for it as a measure of justice to those who had been alike invited to maintain near me the relation of confidential advisers. Perceiving that the harmony in feeling, so necessary to an efficient administration had failed, in a considerable degree, to mark the course of this; and having assented, on this account to the voluntary retirement of the secretaries of state and war, no alternative was left me but to give this assent a latitude co-extensive with the embarrassments which it recognized, and the duty which I owed to each member of the cabinet.

In accepting your resignation as attorney general, I take pleasure in expressing my approbation of the zeal and efficiency with which its duties have been performed, and in assuring you that you carry with you my best wishes for your prosperity and happiness. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON.

John M. Berrien, esq.

P. S. You will please to continue to discharge the duties of the office of attorney general until you make all those arrangements which you may deem necessary, which, when completed, and I am notified thereof by you, a successor will be appointed. A. J.

Washington, June 22, 1831.

SIR: In conformity to the suggestion contained in my note of the 15th inst. I have to inform you that the arrangements necessary to put the office of the attorney general in a condition for the reception of my successor are now complete.

The misrepresentations which are circulated in the newspapers on the subject of my retirement from office, make it proper that this correspondence should be submitted to the public, as an act of justice both to you and to myself. I am, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant, JN. MACPHERSON BERRIEN.

To the president of the United States.

Washington, June 22, 1831.

Sir: Your note of this day is received, advising me, "in conformity to the suggestions contained in my (your) note of the 15th inst. I (you) have to inform you (me) that the arrangements necessary to put the office of the attorney general in a condition for the reception of my successor are now complete."

For reasons assigned in your note, you further observe, "make it proper that this correspondence should be submitted to the public, as an act of justice both to you and myself." I am sure I can have no objection to your submitting them as you propose, as you believe this to be necessary. I am, respectfully, your obedient servant, ANDREW JACKSON.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 18—VOL. IV. BALTIMORE, JULY 2, 1831. [VOL. XL. WHOLE No. 1,03

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

☞ Under the head of "late events at Washington" we have noticed several articles emanating from various sources, which we thought should be held in remembrance, that these proceedings may be the better understood. We shall, however, go into the record with much caution, unless in giving articles vouched for by the names of parties to the matter contained in them; and these must be fully and impartially inserted—to "look upon" hereafter. There are strong indications of extensive developements.

☞ We give among our political selections, a pair of articles from the United States Telegraph—not in sympathy for the editor of that paper, but to record the facts stated—which are powerfully teaching him the merits of that system of "rewards and punishments" of which he was, yet a little while ago, the "official organ." But Mr. Green pretty plainly tells us that he will avenge himself—and, if he shall open his files of letters in regard to such persons and things, as a just retaliation may excuse him in doing, we shall have a curious exhibition of "circumstances."

☞ Mr. John Punchard is the general agent for the WEEKLY REGISTER, at Boston—and Mr. William A. Coleman, Park Place, in New York.

☞ The "Richmond Whig" says—"Mr. Niles and our contemporary, [Mr. Ritchie] are to have a bout on the tariff, the moment the Enquirer is sufficiently enlarged to embrace the voluminous controversy. Niles has challenged in form, and the Enquirer has accepted, after a pause of prudential calculation. We anticipate some instruction and more fun. We hope the champions will disdain the little arts and meannesses so often resorted to in such controversies—of garbling, suppressing and misquoting each other. Let each state the argument of the other, if possible, in that other's words, before he replies. We shall watch the progress of the combat, and give notice of foul play, if we discover it in either party."

It was for the express purpose of having fair play that I invited Mr. Ritchie to the discussion; and I hope that Mr. Pleasants will carefully note either of us who shall be guilty of "foul play" in this matter—or be illiberal or uncandid. A first principle is—that each shall re-publish the essays of the other, without replication, until the end of a week—the publication of the "Register" being only weekly; and the editor of the "Enquirer," who has so much to say about "free trade," (though he cannot tell us where it is), will be held to this rule—for it is a practical one, and honest.

☞ The New York Evening Post gives a foolish and dirty anonymous letter, which was mailed at Baltimore, and cost the editor 18¾ cents postage. We have been oftentimes "intruded" on by writing-puppies; and, at present, have two of their productions on hand, in the hope of catching and pulling them by the ear, and exposing their names, by way of amusement. But the practice at our post-office always has been, as every where it certainly should be, to refund the postage charged and paid on such poor yelpings.

POLITICAL MOVEMENTS, NOTICES, &c. The president of the United States started on an excursion to Old Point Comfort on the 24th ult.

Roger B. Taney, esq. of Maryland, has accepted the office of attorney general in the place of Mr. Berrien, resigned. As Mr. T. is one of our own citizens we take the liberty to remark, that his gentlemanly deportment, honorable private character, and acknowledged talents, eminently fit him for the place to which he has been appointed. He has always been an ardent and decided politician—and stood at the head of the "federal" party in Maryland, so long as our political divisions were formed on old party grounds. The Richmond Enquirer, says of Mr. T. "He is a lawyer of fine talents, and of high standing at the bar of the supreme court—and as a politician, he is a warm friend of the constitution of the United States in its true reading. He will carry into the cabinet vigorous talents, sound constitutional principles, and the most unblemished reputation. We shall hail his accession to the cabinet as a solid benefit to the country." "We shall see!"

The Albany Argus says that Mr. Charles Butler has not been appointed by Mr. Van Buren, secretary of legation at London!

A report has been current in Richmond for some days, that Mr. Randolph is seriously sick at his lodgings, Warwick lane, Cockspur street, London, and that his friends in the Charlotte district have received instructions to withdraw him from the canvass for congress.*

A late number of the Richmond Enquirer states, upon the authority of a gentleman entitled to credit, that Mr. Randolph, before his acceptance of the Russian mission, successively declined that to France and to England; because he thought that a brief residence at St. Petersburg would be more conducive to his health.

ANTI-TARIFF CONVENTION. A number of gentlemen, from different states, favorable to the principles of free trade, having assembled at Philadelphia, on the 4th of June, and taken into consideration an address published in the New York Evening Post, recommending an anti-tariff convention, unanimously

Resolved, That a convention, for the purpose of securing the efficient co-operation of the friends of free trade, throughout the United States, in procuring the repeal of the restrictive system, be held at the Mansion House hotel, in the city of Philadelphia, at 10 o'clock on the morning of Friday the 30th day of September next; and that there be invited to attend the same, such citizens, from all the states of the union, without distinction of party, who are favorable to the object of the meeting, as may find it convenient to attend.

It was also

Resolved, That notice of the said meeting be published, and that editors throughout the United States, friendly to the cause of free trade, be requested to give it circulation.

☞ We cheerfully copy the preceding from the "Philadelphia Gazette, and earnestly hope that, if a convention be held as suggested, we shall not only learn what "FREE TRADE" IS, but obtain information WHERE IT MAY BE FOUND—if existing among civilized nations. And to induce some member of that convention, or any other person learned in such things (even Mr. Cambreleng or Mr. McDuffie), to render this important information to the public, we offer certain luscious rewards—as follows:

Whereas some of the friends of the "American System" affirm that there is no such thing as FREE TRADE existing among civilized nations—and even presume to say that such trade CANNOT EXIST and be mutually advantageous to the people of different nations, as at present conditioned—because of the variety of soil and climate, governments and laws, and habits and employments of individuals—the undersigned offers a reward of TEN BUSHELS OF THE BEST YORK RIVER OYSTERS (to be obtained at the Baltimore market in their season), to any person, whether a member of congress, president or professor in a college, physician, clergyman, lawyer, merchant, ship-owner or shop-keeper, or Yorkshireman on the "New York station" for the purpose of receiving British goods feloniously imported, for proof that free trade exists between any two of the great commercial nations of the world, and with their colonies or dependencies: the undersigned admitting, to avoid a long and doubtful discussion, that laws "judiciously" enacted for the sole purpose of collecting revenue on foreign productions imported and consumed, shall not be plead against freedom in trade. And he further offers a reward of two dozen of the best Pocomoke or Nanticoke, Choptank or Piankitank TERRAPINS, in their season, for an essay shewing that free trade can exist between two nations, unless the price of labor and cost of subsistence, taxes and other public rates, habits of industry and use of scientific power, &c. are the same in both, unless in the great profit of one and extreme poverty of the other.

*The N. Y. Commercial Advertiser says, gentlemen from London uniformly report Mr. Randolph as being "in good health."

And also, he will give a reward of a dozen of Adlum's best American wine to any who shall discover a commercial nation without a "restrictive system," to protect the industry and pursuits of its own people.

Given under my hand, at Baltimore, this 27th day of June, Annoque Domini, 1831. H. NILES,

Editor of the Register.

☞The "editors friendly to the cause of free trade" are requested to insert the above!

MEETING OF THE WEST INDIA DELEGATES. The Montreal Herald, in speaking of the meeting of delegates from various parts of the B. West Indies, held at Barbadoes on the 1st of March, remarks as follows:

"The very depressed state of the West India interest, which has now continued for so many years as to reduce, almost to ruin, all the formerly opulent proprietors in that part of the British empire, has at length produced its natural effect. One universal feeling of dissatisfaction pervades every class of the resident population. How it happens, that so wealthy a part of the British dependencies as (were formerly) the West Indies, has so long failed to enlist in its cause some liberal and enlightened member of the British parliament, is a question that it would be difficult to answer. The consequence of the West Indies to Great Britain should make the joint proprietors of those islands an influential body; and, as their cause is founded in justice, we must hope that a deaf ear will no longer be turned to their representations of heavy grievances."

The New York Evening Post observes—The resolutions passed at this meeting of delegates have been published in the English papers. They complain of the duties imposed on the sugars of the British West India colonies imported into England.* These duties, they say, were imposed at a period when it was necessary to use extraordinary means to raise a revenue, and ought to have ceased with the necessity that produced them. Another cause of complaint is, the advantage given to foreign cultivators over them by the continuance of the slave trade. In the third place, they protest against the project of emancipating their slaves, unless full and complete indemnification is made to the owners at the expense of the nation in general.

MONEY. We made a remark last week, that a 6 per cent. stock of the United States, irredeemable for 25 years, would probably sell for 130 per cent. because of the surplus capital seeking safe investments. And the New York American says—We learn that proposals have been made for the Chemung canal loan, bearing 5 per cent. interest, and not redeemable until 1850, according to the advertisement of the commissioners of the canal fund, dated 4th of June, and that the offer of Prime, Ward, King, & Co. of 15.10-100 per cent. premium, being the highest for the whole loan, was accepted.

CULTIVATION OF COTTON. There is much instruction in the following little table, abstracted from Wilie's New Orleans Commercial Report of June 11.

Arrivals, exports and stocks of cotton, for the last nine years, from 1st October to date.

Years.	Arrivals. Bales.	Exports. Bales.	Stocks. Bales.
1831,	401,784	315,280	96,332
1830,	320,996	287,027	34,442
1829,	271,788	185,721	90,432
1828,	274,931	269,242	16,860
1827,	318,534	255,265	69,349
1826,	236,162	185,304	54,595
1825,	197,250	172,506	26,250
1824,	139,386	128,477	13,778
1823,	155,474	132,990	34,435

In eight years the arrival of cotton at New Orleans has increased from 155,000 bales to 401,000—and the exports from 132,000 to 315,000. The latter would have been larger, but for the want of vessels to carry the cotton away.* Has this great increase of production nothing to do with the price of the commodity?

SUGAR. The quantity of sugar and molasses exported in the present year up to the 11th June, is more than twice as large as last year's export, though less than 1829.

Exported to 11th June, 1828—37,289 hhds. sugar; 1829, 53,598; 1830, 21,067; 1831, 44,296. [Wilie.

GREAT SALE OF AMERICAN PRODUCE AND MANUFACTURES IN BOSTON. The subscribers, a committee of the New England society for the promotion of manufactures and the mechanic arts, give notice that the next semi-annual public sale of American produce and manufactures, under the direction of said society, will commence on Wednesday, 17th August, at Quincy Hall, in Boston.

Among the goods to be offered, will be a very large and valuable assortment of cotton and woollen fabrics of every description—and also of boots, shoes, leather, hats

---

* The duties on sugar form one of the many beautiful features in the British doctrine of "free trade!" By a reference to Pope's Customs—the standard work of Great Britain, we find the following rates of duties†—

	l.	s.	d.
Sugar—brown or Muscavado—from the British plantations—(West Indies) per cwt.	1	10	0
Sugar, do. from the British East Indies do.	2	0	0
do. do. from any other place do.	3	3	0

At present, the real par value of the pound sterling is 486 cents in the United States. Hence—

The duty on British WEST India sugar is six and an half cents a pound.

The duty on British EAST India sugar is eight and three fourths of a cent a pound, nearly.

The duty on FOREIGN sugar more than thirteen cents a pound.

And the discriminatory duty between British West and British East India sugar, two cents 4.3 mills, or nearly 2½ cents per lb. Whereas the whole duty on foreign sugar in the United States is only three cents per pound, though so much complained of.

And yet with this great protection—this arbitrary distinction between the West and East Indies, (more than equal to the whole cost of sugar in the latter), the British West Indies are, indeed, in a miserable state of decay—the capital vested in lands and slaves not producing, as we are informed, one per cent. per annum, over a moderate allowance for the owner's immediate subsistence and the actual support of his family.

Editor of the Register.

†This rate of duty, as to the products of the British possessions, is subject to certain reductions, contingent to the average selling price of sugar in England; and at this time, we think that the duty payable on West India sugar is only about *l.*1 4, per cwt. (or 5 1-2 cents per lb) because of a glut in the English market, and a consequently reduced price of the article. But this has no effect on the principle of the duties imposed, in nor on the profits of the planters—the latter receiving less for the sugar as less is paid on account of the duties.

*The New Orleans Argus of the 13th June, complains of the want of shipping. Although there were one hundred and sixty vessels in port, (one hundred and thirty of which were American) they were all taken up. There were about eighty thousand bales of cotton lying in the streets, for a part of which there was no proper storage either in warehouses or lots.

wool, &c. The principal conditions are the following, to wit—

1st. Goods must be forwarded and samples delivered at the hall between the 10th and 13th August.

2d. No goods shall be offered that are not on the catalogue.

3d. Every lot put up shall be sold without reserve. Any lot or parcel unsold may be withdrawn; but in such case shall not be again offered.

Scraps relating to the progress of manufactures and internal improvements. A recent Providence paper states that the freight on the single article of cotton, imported into the port of Providence in one week, amounted to twenty thousand dollars.

The Lowell Journal states, that the demand for tenements in that town has never been so active as at present. The Suffolk company has recently been incorporated with a capital of $500,000, and has commenced two mills, &c. The Tremont company is about to be incorporated with a capital of $500,000. Over $200,000 have been subscribed to the capital stock of the rail road bank. An extensive hotel is to be erected at the corner of Merrimack and Dutton streets.

A Philadelphia paper says, that a Mr. King of Waterford, Erie county, Penn. has undertaken to deliver at Cincinnati, Ohio, from the Kiskiminetas works, 40,000 barrels of salt, at one dollar a barrel.

Cotton bagging is now extensively manufactured at 18¼ cents a yard. This is "taxing" the cotton planters "with a vengeance!"

Taunton, Mass. contained 4,200 inhabitants in 1828—and now has about 6,000. The first extensive iron works in America were erected in this town in 1652. At present, it is famous for its manufactures. The nail factories make from 8 to 10 tons daily. It has 7 cotton factories—one rolling and slitting mill—one forge, one shovel factory, one copper and lead rolling mill—one paper mill—one carding and fulling mill—one calico printing establishment, which furnishes from four to six thousand pieces a week—two breweries—one large factory of Brittania ware, and many other establishments of different kinds; besides, 8 or 9 millions of brick are manufactured annually. Two newspapers are published in this town.

The following is an account of the cattle and hogs that have passed the store of N. Young, at the 7 mile stone on the Westchester road, Haverford township, Delaware county, Pennsylvania, from the 1st of April, 1830, to the 1st of April 1831.

Number of fat cattle,		26,707
do.	sheep,	49,769
do.	hogs,	19,828
	Total	96,244

At the Chickopee cotton factory, near Springfield, Massachusetts, there are about 15,000 spindles in operation, and from 10,000 to 13,500 yards of cloth manufactured daily—20,000 spindles are soon to be at work. About 800 hands are employed—700 of these are females, who earn from 12 to 21 dollars a month. They pay 8 dollars for board, washing, &c. But they all work by the piece, and some clear 18 dollars monthly. The village contains 1,400 souls—it is inhabited only by persons employed in the factories, or their families. The agent receives 3,000 dollars a year—the superintendent 2,000, and the concern is said to yield 10 per cent. on the capital invested. The people are hale, hearty and cheerful. A physician who attempted to make a living among them, was compelled to change his quarters. There is a paper mill near these factories which employs 200 persons.

At Springfield there is a large card manufactory, in part worked by dog-power. The dogs tread the wheel with apparent pleasure. They are relieved every hour. The women employed earn 175 cents a week. Eighteen machines are in operation.

In this neighborhood, the platting of straw is a great business—it is a beautiful home-employment for females. Some make two dollars a day—but generally about one dollar each.

In these things is the reason why there are so few houses in ruin in New England—no mud-built huts—no pine-stick chimneys, no pine-knot candles; none, or very few adults, who cannot "read and write and cast accounts," unless deprived of some of the usual faculties of man. But the thrift that follows such industrious habits is a subject of envy, with the lazy—and poor.

The Pittsburg Gazette says—A gentleman, recently from St. Louis, informs us that, while in that city, he saw in a warehouse twenty-two hundred weight of copper, made at the lead mines in Missouri.

Property in vessels has greatly increased in value. It appears not an uncommon thing to give 4 or 5,000 dollars advance on the contract price, of some that were on the stocks before the present demand commenced.

The business of the New York canals, since they were opened this season, appear to be about one-third larger than in the same time last year. The transport of passengers and goods, to and from the Upper Lakes, has wonderfully increased. The march westward is powerful.

The Ohio canals are also doing a great business—15,223 bbls. of flour arrived at Cleveland in about a month ending 14th of May, with 18,034 bushels of wheat, &c.

The Delaware and Hudson canal has far exceeded the hopes of its friends—114 boats have passed in one week, with many rafts: 12,300 tons of coal reached the Hudson, by the 14th May. Much merchandize is now passing into Pennsylvania by the canal.

The Chesapeake and Ohio, though finished only about 22 miles, is also much used.—83,106 barrels of flour descended between the 21st March and 14th May, with large quantities of other articles.

The Chesapeake and Delaware canal is doing a much increased business in the present year as compared with the last; and the general value of property descending the Susquehannah is much larger than heretofore.

In March and April last, about 58,000 bbls. of flour, 7,000 do. whiskey, 12,000 do. pork, 18,000 kegs lard, 750 hhds. hams and 1,800,000 lbs. of bacon, &c. passed down the Miami canal.

The Blackstone canal is proceeding to meet the expectations of its friends. Its business is 50 per cent. better than it was last year—2,327 tons of various articles passed in May last—a part of which was made up of 1,417 bales of cotton. Nearly 1,700 bales and boxes of domestic cotton and woollen goods descended.

All the other canals shew the same pleasant results. Some of those in Pennsylvania do not "work well," but others are conferring incalculable benefits on this rich and flourishing state. Several rail roads are also making, or about to be made.

The total amount of tolls collected on the New York state canals for the month of May, is two hundred and twenty thousand four hundred and ninety-one dollars. This is fifty-two thousand two hundred and sixteen dollars more than was collected in the same month last year.

A large meeting of the people has been held at Knoxville, Ten. col. John Williams, chairman, with a view to the establishment of a direct communication with the city of Charleston, as the nearest sea-port and best market, by rail roads and interior navigation. A very respectable committee was appointed to collect statistical information as to the wants and resources, consumption and trade, of East Tennessee, and also a committee of correspondence, &c. The Charleston rail road will probably do as much good to South Carolina as the ravings and acts of her politicians have rendered injury to her—and the good will also be as permanent as the union of the states.

A rail road is projected and will, no doubt, be made, from the valley of the Lackawanna to the Susquehannah, and the village of Owego, in the state of New York. In speaking of this proposed road, Mr. James Archbold, a distinguished engineer, says—

"I perfectly agree with you as to the importance of this communication, particularly for the coal trade into the western part of New York; the demand in that section of the country, will (I have not the least doubt) be equal immediately to fifty thousand tons at the affixed prices, and must eventually become a very large business."

"Our engines on the Delaware and Hudson canal company road consume daily 1¼ tons refuse coal, with which amount of fuel they are at present drawing 300 tons per day up inclined planes of 2,500 feet length, and 210 perpendicular height; and there is not the least doubt but that one ton of good coal would do the same amount of work. Anthracite coal may therefore be safely calculated upon as being among the very best kinds of fuel for generating steam, uniting great heat with durability, and therefore particularly well adapted for locomotive engines, whose rapid motion creates draft enough to consume any quantity necessary to do the work required."

It is now ascertained that the noble river Connecticut may be navigated by steam boats more than two hundred miles from its mouth. Two boats, the John Ledyard and William Hall, will be placed on the route this season, and other boats are to be built for the same navigation.

There are forty-eight arrivals and departures of stage coaches, weekly, at Zanesville, Ohio, and a large increase is expected.

The whaling business is becoming a large concern at Hudson, New York, under charge of the "Yankees," settled there. The fine ship Mansfield has sailed on her second voyage, with a crew of thirty-five young men, chiefly natives of that city or its neighborhood.

The Newbern N. C. Gazette says, that steam boat navigation is about to be carried on between Baltimore and Charleston.

A rail road is about to be made from Troy to the western line of Vermont, 30 miles. It will become a very important and profitable work. The present transportation is estimated at 20,000 tons annually. Who shall calculate the increase—the road being made, or the saving and profit that will follow?

A rail road is contemplated between the Ohio river and lake Erie—though the canal has made so great progress. A meeting is to be held at Warren, O. in September next, to consider the subject, by delegates from several counties of that state.

Locomotives. During the present week several locomotive engines have been operating on the Baltimore and Ohio rail road. The speed of twenty miles an hour seems easily obtained, though the weight moved is large—very large, in proportion to the "horse-power" of the engines. We shall have an authentic account of these proceedings—and it is not worth while now to attempt a narrative of passing events.

The rail road car Columbus will appear on the road next Monday. It surpasses all others for size and extent yet placed on the rails, and will carry one hundred and fifty passengers. It has a promenade on top surrounded by an iron railing handsomely ornamented, and is provided with a number of settees above and below. It is to all appearance the most comfortable and attractive of any that we have yet seen.

"Constructive journies." The case of John P. Pleasants, esq. of Virginia, who was sent out by Mr. Clay as bearer of despatches to Buenos Ayres, which he proposed to arrive at by way of England, where he was taken sick and from thence returned home, for which the sum of $1,940 was allowed him, made a prominent item in the famous report of the committee on retrenchment of the 15th May, 1828, of which Mr. Hamilton, the present governor of South Carolina, was chairman, and has filled a thousand columns in the newspapers—as though it had no precedent or parallel, and never could be imitated, because of its enormity.

Mr. Pleasants, who as editor of the "Richmond Whig," when noticing some speculations as to the probable course which the "constructive" minister to Russia will pursue, in relation to his salary and outfit, gives it as his opinion that Mr. Randolph, although but ten days at the Russian court, will not fail to pocket his 9,000 dollars outfit. The editor thus draws the parallel between what certain papers termed his own "constructive journey" to South America, and the constructive residence of Mr. Randolph at St. Petersburg:

"Mr. Randolph cannot decline the outfit. He is too proud to acknowledge that he abandoned his trust, and had not earned its emolument. He must imitate our philosophy, and patiently bear the gibes of his opponents. By the way—how close the resemblance between his voyage to St. Petersburgh—and ours to Buenos Ayres! There really is this difference only—he pockets $18,000—we but $1,940—and he did get to St. Petersburgh, but we did not get to Buenos Ayres. For the rest, his stay of ten days, when he was sent to reside permanently, was equally an abandonment of duty as ours in not going at all—and the less excusable, as his duties were of the last, and mine (he said) of the least consequence! In other respects the parallel runs on all fours—is as like as Wales and Macedon! Both of us were pets of secretaries of state—I of Clay, he of Van Buren: both of us got sick and had to repair to merry England to recruit: both of us have been roundly abused for the dereliction; he abused me for going to London instead of Buenos Ayres; I have abused him for quitting St. Petersburgh in ten days, and going to London. My $1,940 gave out in England, and I had to throw myself on the liberality of our excellent ambassador then there, for the means of returning; the plenipotentiary, as he had a stronger pull upon the crib, and withal is in the habit, like the Roman senators, in the provinces, of taking up his abode with friends wheresoever he goes, instead of in inns, and other expensive places, will, we hope, be more fortunate.

"Whenever in future, our brother of the Norfolk Herald, or other ill-natured person, twits us with the $1,940, and trip to Buenos Ayres, we mean just to say, John Randolph of Roanoke! In the eccentricity of his diplomatic tour, we have a shield and defence for our own unlucky expedition to Buenos Ayres! As for the hon. John himself, we mean to send him this article, to St. Petersburgh!"

☞ Now, it is well known that Mr. Benton, of the senate of the United States, and one of the greatest "reformers" of the age, made a "constructive" journey from Washington to St. Louis, and back again, in the night of the 3rd of March, 1825, while lying in bed at Washington, and charged and received for his mileage about two thousand six hundred dollars—if our memory, as to the sum, serves us correctly, and we think that we are not much mistaken in its amount—and notwithstanding his colleague, Mr. Barton, made no such journey in his sleep; and, of course, received no pay, for doing the same, "nothing at all!"

We also see it stated, that Mr. Lyon, one of the late representatives in congress from Kentucky, being about or less than 800 miles distant from Washington by the most usual road, (over which the calculation of mileage is directed to be made*), has charged and received compensation on 1,145 miles travel, which takes in the sinuosities of the rivers navigated by steam boats—thus making two "constructive" journies, at every session of congress 345 miles long, or 690 miles, at eight dollars for every 20 miles—276 dollars "constructively" obtained.

* The following is the law—"Each representative and delegate shall be entitled to receive eight dollars for every day he has attended or shall attend the house of representatives, and shall also be allowed eight dollars for every twenty miles of the estimated distance, by the most usual road, from his place of residence to the seat of congress."

"TALES OF TERROR!!!" The following is from a London newspaper called "The World."

"We are informed that in the city of New York and an immediately neighboring district, that there is at this moment, a dense population of English and Scotch emigrants, men, women and children, in a state of total want and destitution; that the labor market has been long overstocked; no work or other means, as a source of subsistence, to be procured at any rate of wages, however low: and that these poor creatures are actually sinking into death by hundreds in garrets and cellars, from starvation and consequent disease. [!!!] This vast congregation of human misery and want is represented as extending to a population in number above 130,000, and the want of such institutions as hospitals, where cleanliness is half cure, renders all efforts to check disease and death abortive."

One hundred and thirty thousand English and Scotch emigrants, men, women and children, perishing at New York, and for the want of such institutions as hospitals!

This is a remarkable instance of the splendid ignorance or magnificent impudence, of a pure John Bull.

And if 130,000 English and Scotch are thus congregated in misery—whose fault is it! Shall the cold-blooded cruelty of shipping off the poor—stowing them in bulk like negro slaves from the coast of Africa, and landing them, exhausted and pennyless, in a strange land, be imputed to us as an offence against humanity? Mister Bull bellows by the month because of the sufferings of the negroes in his own West India islands—but packs off his own white children like spoiled herring, to fatten the soil of a foreign country with their carcasses—130,000 at one place and at one time! We well know that cargoes of paupers from England—the very sweepings of her poor houses, have been cast upon the United States, to perish or be subsisted at our cost. But this imposition has become too great to be suffered, and the states will prevent it.

As to the "hospitals"—the cities of New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore pay more for the support of miserable foreigners, than is paid by all England for the subsistence of unhappy strangers: and the return is insolence and falsehood!

Another London paper, "the Atlas," says that in the week ending the 26th February, the New York city inspector returned 58 interments by infanticide—and with horror, adds, "this is put forth in the New York city papers without note or comment!" Why did't John make it 580,* so that every woman must have about one child a year to kill off? But we are thankful the "Atlas" does not say, that 58 children are killed and eaten every week in New York.

But how is it at home? Mister Bull gives his tens of thousands to Christianize the Hindoos, better people than millions of his own—more honest, more sober, more merciful, generous and just,—but we find the following in an English paper, speaking of Ireland:

"The marquis of Anglesey is represented in the Limerick Evening Post, to have said, in answer to an address presented to him by James Blake Butler, esq. and several gentlemen of the county of Clare, 'with respect to the condition of this county, I must certainly admit that it is unreasonable to suppose that the peasantry—and a finer and more vigorous peasantry than Clare possesses I have never seen—it is, I must say, impossible to expect that they will quietly lie down and die of starvation."

☞While on this subject, we take pleasure in adding the following paragraph—

An English lawyer, Mr. Joseph Parkes, has published at London, an edition of the New York statutes relating to real estate and the court of chancery. He says, in his preface, "Fas et ab hoste doceri is a maxim universally admitted; but happily in a period of profound peace, the opportunity exists of gathering the experience of friends. The United States of North America are chiefly indebted to England for their colonization, language, literature, arts and sciences, and for the spirit of liberty which now constitutes them a great and independent nation. To profit by their experience is incurring no debt, and the parent country derives reflected honor from every approach they make towards good government and national improvement."

*It would be only adding a "cypher"—for which precedents enough might be had in "East-room-like" statements, made even by members of congress—and not disavowed until the falsehood had performed its full tour of duty! A late report of the committee on commerce, in the house of representatives, contains a more gross misrepresentation than we have mentioned; and in respect to that, some of the most decided opponents of the tariff shew their great affection for home manufactures!

HYDROPHOBIA. Another case of this disease has appeared in New York. A woman, aged about 24 years, was bitten by a dog on the 14th June, and on the 17th began to exhibit decided symptoms of hydrophobia. She soon after attempted to bite every one who approached her in her paroxysms, and would also howl and bark like a dog. She resisted liquids with great violence, when offered. She had between 30 and 40 paroxysms on the 18th—and powerful doses of opium and calomel were administered, in the desperate emergency, by doctors Hall and Lawyer, and soon the paroxysms became less frequent and violent—and, in two or three days, salivation having taken place, she was considered out of danger.

Up to the 29th ult. 1,500 dollars had been paid in premiums for dogs killed at New York! The manner in which the removal of a dangerous nuisance was so far effected, seems to have been exceedingly objectionable; and the appointment of persons whose special duty it shall be to destroy dogs found running at large, has been suggested.

"THE BEAUTIFUL." A Philadelphia paper says—The obsequies of the late Benjamin Carr, professor of music, were celebrated in St. Augustine's church on Thursday morning last, on which occasion a solemn mass was sung, and several appropriate anthems performed. The singers were accompanied by other instruments besides the organ, and parts of the performance had a very striking effect.

[Mr. Carr was very eminent in his profession, and highly esteemed for his correct private deportment; but the beauty of this thing is—that St. Augustine's is a Catholic church, and Mr. Carr who was a protestant, had afforded much instruction to the choir, who desired the performance of this grateful and kind service.]

JOHN MARKLEY was hung at Frederick, Maryland, on the 24th June, pursuant to his sentence, for the murder of the Newey family—heretofore mentioned. With his latest breath, (given up to speaking), he declared his innocence of the offence for which he suffered, and denied a knowledge of the person or persons by whom the crimes were committed! Thus hope lingers while life remains. There was no positive proof against this man—but a train of circumstances, and the possession of certain things which had belonged to his uncle, Newey, which, in the language of the bar, "could not lie;" and it is well ascertained that other parts of his statement, made at the awful moment of his exit, as it were, are altogether untrue—and they are such as he could not have made any "mistake"-about. He has left a narrative of his life. It is in the hands of a worthy clergyman, who is "earnestly solicited" to publish it. Cui bono? Let it be destroyed.

A late inmate of the penitentiary, named Lishier, as he returned from witnessing the execution of Markley, (who had also left the penitentiary but a short time ago), being intoxicated, entered the enclosure of a Mr. Fowler near Frederick, and soon got up a quarrel, which resulted in his (Lishier's) death. Fowler immediately gave himself up to the proper authority.

BROKEN BANKS. The editor of the Cincinnatti Advertiser says that more than fifteen hundred banks have been set-up and stopped payment in the United States, causing a "dead loss" to the community of more than twenty-four millions of dollars.

It would have been better to have said, we think—a swindling of honest persons to the amount of 24 millions—for what they lost, the rascals gained.

THE NEW YORK CANALS. We have received, and read with much attention, a long and very able report made to the senate of New York on the 14th Feb. last by Mr. Tallmadge, of Dutchess, concerning the "canals and internal improvements by means of canals."

It is a very interesting history of what has been accomplished in New York—of the funds of the state applicable to education and science and internal improvements —the cost and present state of the canals and of their particular funds, with a general view of the revenue—of the means of the state to be used for new canals, and remarks on the propriety of making them, &c.—the whole filling 40 large pages; all which we would gladly insert in the "Register," could room be spared for the document—though dissenting from Mr. Tallmadge's views as to the power of the national government to assist in such undertakings. But his report claims and will receive a careful examination from the people of New York, because of the various important matter which he has, with so much labor, collected and spread before them.

GREAT CONFLAGRATION! On the morning of the 21st June, at 7 o'clock, the roof of the state house of North Carolina, at Raleigh, was discovered to be on fire—and, in defiance of the most prompt and spirited efforts, that large edifice, the pride of the state, was enveloped in flames, and all of it that was combustible destroyed. The public papers were saved, together with a much valued portrait of Washington—but his statue by Canova, that chef d'œuvre of the great artist, was lost, though the most active exertions were made to save it.

One account says—"The beautiful grove of which this fine building was the central ornament, stands unscathed, and it is probable that the luxuriant foliage of the trees checked the evil from spreading to the surrounding buildings. The offices of the departments, (which are in detached buildings), and the official archives, are also saved; and I have the happiness to add, that neither life, limb, nor property, of any of our citizens, is injured."

It is very remarkable that the means which had been adopted for the preservation of this building from fire, were the cause of its destruction! The shingle-roof had been chiefly removed for a covering of zinc, and there is no doubt that the fire introduce for soldering the zinc, caused this calamity—one of the persons employed being seen to carry up, early in the morning, a coal of fire, between two shingles, considerably ignited!

The flame was awfully grand, when the devouring element was in the height of its rage.

The congregation of the Presbyterian church, in Raleigh, have offered, through the governor, the temporary use of their building to the legislature of the state.

Canova's statue of Washington cost the state of North Carolina about 25,000 dollars. The state house may be rebuilt more convenient and more beautiful than before—but Canova is dead, and the "wealth of the Indies" cannot make such a man as he was. GENIUS laughs at the creations of emperors and kings, popes and primates, generals and bishops. To the SOURCE of such talents as Canova possessed, all their efforts are as the works of atoms.

"ODD FELLOWS." Nearly a thousand of this fraternity had a procession at Wilmington, Del. on Monday last—consisting of the members resident in that borough, and many visiters from Philadelphia, Baltimore, &c.

INDIAN WAR. The Sac Indians in the neighborhood of Rock Island, under the command of Black Hawk, appear to have resolved on acts of hostility. In conference with gen. Gaines, they assured him of a determination to keep possession of certain grounds, at all hazards. A letter dated "Encampment, Rock Island, June 8, says—We yesterday held a talk with the Indians, and from their determination not to leave the white settlements, and from their number, we shall have pretty serious work, that is, we shall have no play; they came into the council house yesterday with their spears, hatchets, and bows strung, and I have no doubt, from the extreme agitation of the interpreter, that there was more danger than most were aware of, as our troops were near a quarter of a mile off, and they were about 10 for one of us."

But general Gaines has collected ten companies of U. States troops, with which he is satisfied that he will be able to repel the contemplated invasion and give security to the people of Illinois.

There is a correspondence between gov. Reynolds, gen. William Clark, superintendent of Indian affairs, and maj. gen. Gaines, which we shall record, though of no great present interest.

NULLIFICATION—by broadswords and rifles! The Geo. Courier contains a long correspondence between James Wayne, esq. a representative in congress from that state, and Dr. William C. Daniel, growing out of a misunderstanding in some political matters. The Doctor having sent a challenge it was accepted, and Mr. Wayne, as the challenged party, was entitled to the privilege of selecting the weapons. He fixed upon broad swords to be used till either party should be so injured as to be unable to continue the fight—and then resort to be made to rifles. The prudent friend of Dr. D. alarmed at the idea of such an exposure of the life of his principal, without consultation with him, refused to accede to the terms; and thus ended the bloodless tragedy. Had they met however, we are puzzled to know what use they could have made of rifles, after being so injured with broad swords, "as to be unable to continthe fight."

"GEORGIA FASHIONS". We should not have ventured on the following witty and yet good humored, exhibit, had it not been the product of a Georgian:—As warm weather comes on, and the bilious and bullying season approaches, the demand increases for Lee's Pills and pocket pistols, and goggles and gunpowder, black patches and dirk knives, grow in demand. Sundry of the beau monde have mounted green spectacles, and a rise is expected in sword canes and epsoms.

The superior courts in the different circuits are also in session, and a good deal of lawing and liquoring is going on, as well as fighting and physicking. Attorneys and physicians, it is presumed, have their hands full. We like to see all trades prosper, and in a bil-ious season, those of the lawyer and doctor are not the least useful. One unravels a tangled case, the other cases up a shattered limb—one dives into the bowels of a statute, the other into the state of the bowels. This bleeds a patient in the arm for the state of his health, the other bleeds him in the pocket for the health of his estate.

Gamboge and gambling are seen in the back rooms, and gingerbread, jacks and judges in the public squares. Duns and dirk knives grow saucy during court week, and mayors and bailiffs feel ticklish. Enemas and endorsements are sought for by some, cocktails and characters sued for by others. Half-pints and hickories are flourished in these times, and teething and gouging tolerated—all for the honor of liberty, and the encouragement of business. [Macon Telegraph.

"THE WEST INDIA TRADE." American flour in Canada. The Montreal Herald gives the following custom house construction of the new act of the British parliament, regulating the import and export of American flour into or from Canada. In addition to securing the transportation of flour to the West Indies in British vessels, it now seems that the manufacture is to be performed on British account, if for export to England. Isn't this "free trade?"

"The former law, besides imposing a duty on the importation into the British American possessions of wheat, flour, &c. from abroad, also provided several forms, which on entry required to be attended to, and imposed several limitations which affected the character of those productions.

"These were, a declaration on the shipment of the property, from the owner, proprietor, or shipper, that the same was the produce of a British possession, and a certificate from the collector of the quantity shipped. By the act just passed, no more is repealed than those clauses of the former act which relates to the imposition of a duty, but leaves in full force all the provisions above alluded to. The effect of the law, therefore, is to admit American wheat and flour to enter this province duty free, but on exportation to England liable to all the restrictions which hitherto have been imposed by former acts relating to the colonial trade, on such articles. At the same time, it is understood, that American wheat, manufactured in the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, may be shipped as colonial flour, on the principle that the manufacture alters the character of the produce. This arrangement will preserve to Canada the colonial privileges which it at present enjoys over the produce of the states, and also the employment to the mills of the country.

FRANCE AND HAYTI. The affairs between France and Hayti have reached a crisis of much interest to us, because of the location and people of the latter. The following letter is sufficient to shew their relations one with the other.—

Port au Prince, June 12, 1831.

There has lately been a rupture between the French consul and the government, the latter refusing to ratify the treaty agreed to by the French government, which would reduce the Haytiens if not to a state of slavery, at least to that of colonists. The French consul has declared his intention of quitting the country on the 25th instant, and has made known to his countrymen that after that period they need not look to him for protection. Business is consequently at a stand, and all sales of merchandise suspended, because persons having property will not sell on a credit. In consequence of the anxiety of the French to get away their funds, the price of coffee has risen to $13, and doubloons to $32.50.

THE "CHURCH" IN FRANCE. The Abbe Gregoire, who attained so much celebrity by the philanthropic spirit which pervaded his writings, and by the mildness and benevolence of his character, died on the 5th May, at Paris. His death bed is said to have been the scene of polemical discussion, The Abbe Gregoire, firm in his heterodox opinions to the last, would not "give the sign" as he expired. In consequence of which the archbishop of Paris, who has already had his houses twice sacked by the mob, refused to allow him to be buried in the parish church. M. Casimir Perrier declares that he shall be buried there, and that the funeral service shall be read by a clergyman, and that if the archbishop ventures to interfere, he will hand him over to the police.

[We believe that his remains were interred in the parish church yard, as directed by the civil magistrate.]

ANCIENT PENNSYLVANIA. The grant of Charles the second to William Penn, is dated March 4th, 1681, and in that year, we are informed by R. Proud's History of Pennsylvania, two ships sailed from London, and one from Bristol, with passengers, bound to the river Delaware; they being the first setlers in Pennsylvania from England. It is a remarkable fact that one of the stipulations in the deed of payment, between William Penn and his adventurers was, that in clearing the land, care should be taken to have one acre of trees left standing for every five acres cut down; and especially to preserve the mulberry and the oak for silk and shipping; having an eye at that early period of time, to ship building and silk manufactures; both of which it is now ascertained, are admirably adapted to the climate of Pennsylvania, and the genius of her people.

RIDEAU CANAL. This magnificent work will, we are credibly informed, be finished early in the month of August next. Three of the locks at the Kingston mills are finished, and the fourth and last is all but completed. We saw the gates hung upon one of them, they open with great ease as the weight towards the centre rests upon a small wheel. The contract for building the "John By" steamer has been given to Mr. Robert Drummond, the enterprising contractor at the Kingston mills, who is to launch the vessel by the first of next November. The engine is to be made by Messrs Bennett & Henderson of Montreal, and to be ready this autumn, so that we may expect to have a fine steamboat ready to commence running upon the canal on the opening of the navigation next spring. Kingston, U. C. Chron.

THE BOW OF WILLIAM TELL. Among other places pointed out to strangers as worthy of notice, (at Zurich,) I visited the arsenal, where one may receive a lesson of humility, in attempting to wield the sword, and to carry the armor, borne by the warriors of other days. I, of course handled the bow, said to be the bow of William Tell; and the identical arrow that pierced the apple is also shewn. I cannot conceive of what materials the sinews of that distinguished patriot were made; for the degenerate men of our time are obliged to use a machine with the power of the lever, to draw the cord even half way to the point at which the arrow is discharged. There is a vast collection of ancient armor preserved, and modern equipments for more than all the able-bodied men in the canton,—[Switzerland, France, and the Pyrenees; by Derwent Conway.]

IRISH LAW. The following extract from an affidavit read in the court of common pleas in Dublin, is alike illustrative of the manner in which legal process is executed in Ireland, and of the precision with which legal instruments are drawn:—"And this deponent further saith, that on arriving at the house of the said defendant, situate in the county of Galway aforesaid for the purpose of personally serving him with the said writ, he, said deponent, knocked three several times at the outer, commonly called the hall door, but could not obtain admission: whereupon this deponent was proceeding to knock a fourth time, when a man, to this deponent unknown, holding in his hands a musket or blunderbuss at this deponent, loaded with balls or slugs, as this deponent has since heard and verily believes, appeared at one of the upper windows of the said house, and presenting said musket or blunderbuss at this deponent, said that if said deponent did not instantly retire, he would send his (the deponent's) soul to hell: which this deponent verily believes he would have done, had not this deponent precipitately escaped."—Journal of Law.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From London papers to the 25th May, inclusive.

ENGLAND.

The result of the elections as far as ascertained have been decidedly favorable to the cause of reform; 347 of the returned members being in favor of reform and 221 against it. The reform party have gained 182 members and lost 42, making the net gain 140 as will be shewn by the annexed table.

Sixteen members were yet to be returned for England and 41 for Ireland, on the 18th May—the arrival from Belfast, however furnishes accounts of the elections of three counties and one city in Ireland.

Sir Robert Bateson and captain Jones, anti-reform candidates, had been elected for the county of Derry.

Lord Bozle and hon. Robert King, in favor of reform, for Cork.

Sir E. Hayes and colonel Conolly, anti-reform for Donegal.

The lord mayor (Hardy) and Mr. Perrin, in favor of reform, for Dublin.

20,000 firelocks have been shipped from England for Holland and Austria, which, by permission of the customs, have been entered as wrought iron, the barrels being packed in one case, and the locks in another.

There had been an unfounded rumor of the health of the king, and of an extensive insurrection in Ireland, which agitated the stock market a good deal. The Age thinks the latter report not very wide of the truth.

IRELAND.

The Mahons and O'Connells and their respective friends, had, in consequence of their personal and political differences, thrown the people of Ennis into a state of great excitement. On the 20th May no less than six gentlemen left that place for Galway to settle their disputes, and accounts state that Mr. O'Gorman Mahon, late member of parliament, had been killed in a duel with col. Macnamara.

FRANCE.

The king of the French was pursuing his visit through his dominions, and had been received every where, as far as he had proceeded, with loyal enthusiasm by the people. He visits in all directions the various establishments of industry and instruction, and is gratified at their success and love of order, and the dissemination of instruction, as a powerful means of civilization.

BELGIUM.

The armistice at Antwerp has been broken, and hostilities have been commenced between the Dutch and the Belgians. Great preparations were being made on both sides for war. Munitions of war of all descriptions were arriving at Antwerp for the Belgians. Gen. Chasse having learned that fortifications were erecting at the back of some houses near the citadel, made a sortie for the purpose of destroying the houses by fire. This led to some skirmishing, and the Dutch in consequence had taken possession of, and were fortifying fort St. Lawrence, a fort declared neutral by the armistice. The Dutch, in attempting to destroy a dyke, were attacked by the Belgians, who made between 200 and 300 prisoners.

General Belliard and Mr. White had arrived from Brussels and held an interview with gen. Chasse; but the result was not known.

The national congress convened on the 17th May, and after being organised, the president alluded to the crisis in which Belgium was placed. The minister for foreign affairs stated that the report of the result of the negotiations with the prince of Coburg had not been received, but was expected to reach Brussels on the 20th, in charge of lord Ponsonby, whose arrival was then expected; he had not, however, arrived on the 21st.

The assent of France to the protocol of 30th January, which adjudged to Holland the grand dutchy of Luxemburg and part of Limburg, had been received at Brussels.

The Belgic commissioners had not been officially received at London, and the confidential conversations had with them by the British ministers were to be communicated, if at all, to a secret committee of the assembly.

One of the protocols agreed upon, lays down the principle that every country may regulate its interior administration as it pleases, but that the limits of its territory is a European matter, to be regulated by a treaty. Surmises as to the conditions of the second protocol are made in the London papers.

The difficulties at Antwerp between the Belgians and Dutch, had been amicably adjusted.

Austria is said to be opposed to the separation of Belgium from Holland, on the ground that it would ultimately lead to its junction with France.

POLAND.

Some more particulars of the surrender of the Polish corps under general Dwernicki to the Austrians, are given. Their arms and munitions of war were first received by the Austrians and by them delivered to the Russians. The Poles have made a new levy of 40,000 men, and the Russians were advancing upon them in great force. There were 14,000 sick and wounded in the hospitals of Warsaw. The cholera morbus had made great ravages among the Russian prisoners.

Letters it was said had been received in Paris, by express, from Augsburg of the 15th May, which state that general Skrzynecki, the Polish commander-in-chief, had obtained an important victory over general Deibitsch, and that the latter was in full retreat—and that he would be superceded by general Paskewitch. This account was not believed.

Letters from St. Peterburgh state that the emperor has rejected all accommodation as to Poland, for which France and England had warmly interested themselves, and that colossal measures had been taken throughout Russia, to speedily stifle the revolution.

The Luthuanians are still in a state of revolt, and in two affairs are said to have maintained their own.

The official accounts of the Polish commanders received by this arrival, of the late affairs between the contending armies, confirm the former accounts. Gen. Skzynecki states that on the retreat of the enemy, "our soldiers were struck with horror to witness the traces of Russian barbarity—places of worship were pillaged and the abodes of clergymen burnt. Sometimes, however, the leaders of the army show feeling and humanity."

Field marshal Deibitsch's official reports, published at St. Petersburgh, are in no wise discouraging to the Russians.

A Hamburg paper of May 20, states that the Austrian government has refused to allow general Dwernicki to return to Warsaw, and has made arrangements for his reception at Laybach, for the distribution of his officers in Moravia, and for sending his soldiers to Transylvania. Gen. Dwernicki had protested against this harsh procedure, and sent copies of his protest to the English and French ambassadors.

Letters had been received in London from Berlin, which state that the Poles confess they have but faint hopes of success against the Russians.

PRUSSIA.

The Prussian government had formed an army, (including those in garrisons), of 330,000 men; a part to form a cordon on the frontiers.

TURKEY.

An insurrection had broken out in the interior of Turkey, and was daily becoming more menacing. The pasha of Albania had blockaded the grand vizier at Monaster, in Romelia. Several other pashas had also revolted, and the porte had become so seriously alarmed as to give a very extensive territory to the viceroy of Egypt, on condition of his furnishing a body of men to act against the pasha of Bagdad, one of the revolting pashas.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The extraordinary proposition of the president of the United States relative to the creation of a government bank, (than which we would rather take the chance of our liberties under Louis Philip, of France, or William, of Great Britain), has powerfully strengthened the claims of the bank of the United States, to the favor of the people—and thousands that were indifferent, if not actually opposed to a renewal of the charter of that institution, even with certain alterations which some supposed the public safety would require—have become its warm friends, as well because of the uncalled-for attack made upon it by the president, as in opposition to the monied monster proposed to be substituted for it; and tens of thousands who have "gone the whole" with the administration on other points, have made a sudden halt here. Take the following as a case in point—from the "Pennsylvania Inquirer," the semi-"official organ of the government" for that state:

From the Pennsylvania Inquirer.

In common with, we believe, a great majority of the real friends of the president, we see with regret the frequent attacks which some of our contemporaries, favorable to the present administration, are making on the bank of the United States. The only effect of this course is to alienate from the administration a large body of its supporters, who think that the destruction of the bank would throw into confusion the currency and commercial exchanges of the country. We think too that the manner of these attacks is as injudicious as the cause itself is unfortunate. They tend wholly to mislead the community. For instance; the Globe republishes a speech of Mr. Madison, when a member of congress in 1801, against the first bank. Yet, after 24 years experience, this same Mr. Madison, acting in his character of president of the United States, actually recommended to congress this bank, and signed the charter. "Waving," says he, in his message of January 30th, 1815, "Waving the question of the constitutional authority of the legislature to establish an incorporated bank, as being precluded, in my judgment, by repeated recognitions, under various circumstances, of the validity of such an institution in acts of the legislature executive and judicial branches of the government, accompanied by indications in different modes, of a concurrence of a general will of the nation," &c.

On another occasion, the Globe reprints at full length, a private letter of Mr. Jefferson, dated December 13th, 1803; containing opinions adverse to the bank, and especially stating that he perceived an intention to establish a branch of the bank at New Orleans. Yet, in three months afterwards this very Mr. Jefferson approves an act of congress, passed for the express purpose of establishing this very branch bank at New Orleans. The act is as follows:—

"Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America, in congress assembled, that the president and directors of the bank of the United States shall be and are hereby authorised to establish offices of discount and deposite in any part of the territory or of the United States, in the manner and on the terms prescribed by the act to which this is a supplement.

NATHANIEL MACON,
speaker of the house of representatives.
JESSE FRANKLIN,
president of the senate, pro tempore.
Approved—THOMAS JEFFERSON.
March 19, 1804.

This shows one of two things. Either Mr. Jefferson's opinions had undergone a change, or he had too much good sense, too much respect for the legislative bodies, and was too good a republican, to set up his own individual opinion against that of the representatives of the people, in a question so particularly within their province as the disposition of the moneys raised by taxes on their constituents.*

☞The New Hampshire Patriot (in which an impudent charge of bribery against the legislature of Pennsylvania, en masse, was made), with the Albany Argus, and several other furious papers, have loudly complained that certain persons interested in the bank have forwarded to some parts of the United States, (themselves paying the postage), large numbers of essays or tracts to shew the usefulness of the bank, and the difficulties or dangers that would follow a refusal to renew its charter. They call this proceeding by many bad names, and seem to regard it as a gross attempt to corrupt the people!

Now—in the session of 1827–8, many members of congress labored as much as four or five hours in a day to frank electioneering addresses, pamphlets and papers, which, instead of increasing the revenue of the post-office, were calculated to have cost an additional expense of not less than thirty thousand dollars to the people of the United States; and I have heard one of them boast how many times he could make his frank in an hour, when he franked by the ream; which, if memory serves me correctly, was two hundred times! It appeared as if the name of every person in certain districts was listed, and forwarded to Washington—for at some of the little post-offices in Maryland, from 100 to 300 electioneering articles were received by a single mail, franked by members of congress from Kentucky and other "foreign" states. And this practice was kept up as if by a committee appointed for the special purpose, (which, indeed, it is believed really existed), until the end of sixty days after the close of the session—the latest moment at which such franking could be performed. We do believe that franks, by the ream, were sent to a certain printing office, and there used at the discretion of the printer, persons being employed and paid, pro rata, to make up packages by the thousand!

Admitting all that is said about these proceedings on the part of the friends of the bank of the United States—is it not strange that such sharp-sighted editors prefer it as a charge of "electioneering" against the bank, because essays in its favor are spread before the people, the postage being honestly paid, and have not yet discovered it wrong in members of congress,—not only to frank packages as above stated, but really cause a great loss of revenue to the post-office on account of extra expense incurred in the transportation and delivery of these packages—public paper being also used for envelopes?

Again—are they afraid that the people—the dear, sweet, intelligent and always-wise judging people, should read any article, unless prepared for the public information by their own precious and infallible selves?

And further, did not Mr. Benton force an opportunity in the senate of the United States to make a few remarks about the bank, and enlarge them into a very lengthy speech, of which great numbers were published, franked, &c. And has not an United States' officer at Boston, (whose name is not recollected), also "made a book" against the bank, which was multitudinously sent to Albany at the late sitting of the legislature?

We object not to appeals to the reason of the people, if fairly made, and especially if they increase, instead of diminish, the public revenue—though as to the bank, we think the proceeding premature—and altogether uncalled for: but the "poor beetle" has a natural right to turn, if trodden upon.

OFFICE OF THE U. S. BANK AT LOUISVILLE.

The "Globe" lately had a long article on the interference of the managers of the bank of the United States at Louisville, in the Kentucky election of 1825—when the old court and new court parties were at furious issue. It says that on the Sunday preceding the first Monday in August when the election was held, certain of the old court party, (their funds being pretty well exhausted), resolved to apply to the bank for aid. They got some of the directors together, and had 250 dollars given to them; and then the manner in which this money was disposed at Shippingport, in opening grog-shops, hiring hacks, and obtaining illegal votes, is described at full length, and with much preciseness, indeed.

In reply to this statement, the "Louisville Advertiser" says—

"We owe it to justice to contradict the foregoing statement. Precise as it is, we are entirely convinced it is utterly unfounded. The bank did not advance a cent, in 1825, to either of the contending parties—old court or new court. Our knowledge of the operations of the old court party, at the time referred to, would have authorised us to make this statement—but we have deemed it proper to go farther—to satisfy ourselves of the fallacy of the charge, by inquiries of bank directors friendly to general Jackson, and by ascertaining how, when, and where the sum of money referred to was obtained.

"The branch bank at this place has taken no part in the political struggles of the state. On the contrary, its directory has uniformly been governed by the principles of impartiality—and we KNOW that the present directors disapprove every effort that has been made to draw the institution into the political vortex."

We have also the following—

An editorial article having appeared in a newspaper published in Washington city, on the 1st inst. called the "Globe," charging, that on the Sunday previous to the August election of 1825, some of the directors of the office of the bank of the United States at Louisville got together, and appropriated and paid two hundred and fifty dollars towards the assistance of one of the political parties then contending against each other in Kentucky—The undersigned, who were directors of said office at the time alluded to, feel it due, not only to the bank, but to themselves, to meet so grave a charge, coming as it does from a source of such apparent respectability, with a most positive and unequivocal public denial. The undersigned constituted, at that time, the whole board with the exception of James A. Pearce, since deceased, and Nicholas Berthoud, now residing in the city of New York. No meeting of the directors for the purposes stated, was ever asked, or took place, at that or any other time; nor was ever one cent of the money of the bank, directly or indirectly, appropriated to influence any election, assist any party, or effect any political purpose whatever, so far as we know or believe.

*The "Inquirer" perhaps, was not aware of the severe hit herein made at the vetoes of president Jackson—directly denying to both houses of congress "the disposition of the moneys raised by taxes on their constituents."

To those who know us, our characters are, we trust, abundant guarantees of the impossibility of our ever having in any way participated in any such transaction. To those who do not, we can only say, that we challenge investigation, and fearlessly aver, that no respectable testimony can be found, which will justly cast upon us even a suspicion of the truth of the charge so recklessly made.

FRANCE AND HAYTI.

From the New York American of June 29.

We are indebted to a friend for the Port au Prince Telegraph of 12th June, containing the correspondence of the French consul with the president of Hayti and the proclamation of the latter.

M. Mollien, the French consul, under date of 2d June, writes to the president to ask a categorical answer, as to whether or not he would ratify the treaties, saying that M. Pichon, jr. would embark immediately in the Juno frigate with his reply. On the 4th, M. Inginac, the secretary of state, replies to M. Mollien, that the president would not ratify the treaties, and proposed to make known in a despatch to the French government to be confided to M. Pichon, his motives for refusing. To this civil note, the French consul makes this cavalier reply.

Consulate of France, Port au Prince, 4th June.

"M. Secretary, I hasten to reply to your letter of today. As the motives which the Haytien government propose to assign for refusing to ratify the definitive treaties of 2d April, cannot, whatever they may be, be listened to by the French government, nor change its determination, M. Pichon will not take charge of the despatches. You will therefore be pleased to select some other channel for their conveyance."

The consul, after rejoinding that, though to his great regret the friendly relations between the two countries are to cease, the right is on the side of France, concludes his letter with asking the protection of the government for those Frenchmen whose affairs may, notwithstanding the consul's pressing advice to the contrary, induce them still to remain in Hayti. Under these circumstances, the president issued the proclamation, of which a translation is annexed.

Proclamation of John Peter Boyer, president of Hayti.

Haytiens—Hayti had enjoyed for twenty years the independence she had conquered, when Charles X., who then reigned in France, made a formal acknowledgement of our emancipation. The act containing this acknowledgement was at first rejected by us; because, besides the ambiguity with which it was drawn, there were in it some such strange stipulations, that we could not conceal our repugnance to them. Still, under these circumstances, a council of senators and of the principal functionaries then present in the capital, was convened, and upon their decision, accompanied by the reasons for it, the acceptance of the act was resolved on, in the hope that the treaties which were expected to be based on it, would, among other modifications, lead to the annulling of all in it, contrary to reason. This hope was the more natural, inasmuch as the French envoy, who was the bearer of the act, assured me that the Haytien government could not fail of receiving from that of France the most satisfactory explations. From that moment I resolved upon writing to the king of France, and on sending a commission of three Haytiens to negotiate and conclude treaties in the name of the republic. The result of this mission, as the world knows, was not such as we anticipated.

The convention brought back here by the commissioners was not, and could not be, ratified without compromitting the interests of Hayti. I have then only done what the honor of my country required, in not assenting to that convention; and that is the consideration which will always govern my acts. Meanwhile, the loyalty of the republic is manifested in incredible efforts to fulfil her engagements to the extent of her means; she has made the greatest sacrifices, while nevertheless negotiation could accomplish nothing favorable to our country, of which the condition has been becoming worse and worse from 1825. These are incontestible facts.

The French government in 1828, made, through the consul general, M. Mollien, new overtures, baron Pichon came here to bring them to a close; but the clause favorable to the republic was still an obstacle; an interpretation contrary to that agreed upon with the said consul prevented a conclusion in the proper forms, of the arrangement in question. Finally, in order to come to definite results, I determined again to send an envoy to France, specially charged to stipulate for advantageous terms for the introduction of the produce forwarded for the payment of our debt. This envoy was required only to remain one month in Paris. He had not yet been permitted to discuss the proposition he was charged with, when the revolution broke out, which drove the house of Bourbon from the throne. If, in consequence of this event, new powers were necessary for the agent, in order to be entitled to prosecute his mission, there were formed here, nevertheless, the highest hopes of advantage from the liberal systems which, it was naturally expected, regenerated France would adopt towards us. Could one think otherwise, in fact, on seeing placed at the head of the government of that kingdom, the distinguished men who so often in the tribune, and in their writings, have proclaimed principles favorable to Hayti; and regarding in a lofty point of view the relations between Hayti and France, loudly condemned the exorbitant demands of the fallen government?

Contrary to all expectation, the Haytien envoy took upon himself to go beyond his mission. He has returned after a year's absence, bringing two treaties containing conditions he was not authorised to agree to, and which consequently I could not ratify.

Haytiens—the consul general ad interim of France, has declared, because of this refusal of ratification on my part, that the relations of friendship between France and Hayti have ceased. What reflections are suggested by this strange declaration! The fate of Hayti might then be made to depend upon a convention, signed in France by a Haytien envoy, whatever wrong the act itself might be tainted with. The two treaties in question, are then treaties imposed upon us! Haytiens, in order to be at peace, we must always be prepared to defend that which is most dear to us, liberty and national independence. In holding yourselves prepared for any events that hatred and injustice can alone bring about, command, at all times, the respect of those who seek to depreciate you. Let foreigners, whom confidence has brought to our shores, find the security which the laws and our loyalty guarantee to them.

Civil and military functionaries! you will doubtless in all contingencies, fulfil your duties. The commandants of arrondissements especially, will bear in mind always, the honorable but fearful responsibility which rests upon them. Let my instructions of May 1823, and January 1824, remind them constantly of their obligations to their country.

Haytiens—you will be faithful to your solemn oaths, renewed each year, and by this fidelity will be worthy of the protection of Divine Providence. Your patriotism and your courageous determination, whatever be your future destiny, will command the esteem of the world, and the admiration of posterity.

THE POST.

From Watson's Annals.

"He comes the herald of a noisy world;
News from all nations, lumb'ring at his back!"

There is nothing in which the days of "Auld Lang Syne" more differ from the present, than in the astonishing facilities now afforded for rapid conveyances from place to place, and, of course, in the quick delivery of communications by the mail. Before the year 1755, five or six weeks were consumed in writing to and receiving an answer from Boston. All the letters were conveyed on horseback, at a snail-pace gait—slow but sure. The first stage between Boston and New York, commenced on the 24th of June, 1772, to run once a fortnight, as "a useful, new, and expensive undertaking, to start on the 13th, and to arrive either to or from either of those places on the 25th—thus making thirteen days of travel!" Now, it travels the same distance in 36 hours! The first stage between N. York and Philadelphia began in 1756, occupied three days, and now accomplishes it in ten hours!

Nor are those former prolonged movements peculiar to us. It was even so with our British ancestors, not very long before us! We have a specimen of their sluggish doings in this matter, as late as the year 1712. "The New Castle Courant," of that year, contains a state advertisement, saying that "all who desire to pass from Edinboro' to London, or from London to Edinboro', let them repair to Mr. John Bailles, &c. every other Saturday and Monday, at both of which places they may be received in a stage coach, which performs the whole journey in 13 days, without stoppage, (if God permit) having eighty able horses to perform the whole stage." Now the whole distance is performed in 46 hours! On the whole, it is manifest the whole civilized world have learned to move every where with accellerated motion! The facts, as they were in olden time, are to the following effect, to wit:—

In 1683, mo. July, Wm. Penn issued an order for the establishment of a post office, and granted to Henry Waldy, of Tekonay, authority to hold one, and "to supply passengers with horses from Philadelphia to New Castle, or to the falls." The rates of postage were to wit:—"Letters from the Falls to Philadelphia 3*d.*—to Chester 5*d.*—to New Castle 7*d.*—to Maryland 9*d.*—and from Philadelphia to Chester, 2*d.*—to New Castle 4*d.*—and to Maryland 6*d.*" This post went once a week, and it was to be carefully published on the meeting-house door, and other public places. These facts I found in the MSS of the Pemberton family. A regular act for a post office at Philadelphia, was first enacted in the year 1700.

Col. John Hamilton, of New Jersey, and son of gov. Andrew Hamilton, first devised the post office scheme, for British America, for which he obtained a patent, and the profits accruing. Afterwards he sold it to the crown, and a member of parliament was appointed for the whole, with a right to have his substitute reside in New York.

In 1717, mo. Dec. Jonathan Dickinson writes to his correspondent, saying, "We have a settled post from Virginia and Maryland unto us, and goes through all our new colonies, whereby advices from Boston to Williamsburg, in Virginia, is completed in four weeks, from March to December, and in double that time in the other months in the year.

In 1722, the Gazette says—"We have been these three days expecting the New York post, as usual, but he has not yet arrived," although three days over his time!

In 1727, the mail to Annapolis is opened this year, to go once a fortnight in the summer, and once a month in the winter, via New Castle, &c. to the Western Shore, and back by the Eastern Shore; managed by William Bradford, in Philadelphia, and by William Parks, in Annapolis.

In 1729, December, the Gazette announces that while the New York post continues his fortnight stage, we shall publish but once a week, as in former times. In summer it went once a week.

In 1738, Henry Pratt is made riding post master for all the stages between Philadelphia and Newport, in Virginia; to set out in the beginning of each month, and to return in 24 days. "To him all merchants, &c. may confide their letters and other business, he having given security to the post master general." In this day, we can have little conception of his lonely rides through imperfect roads; of his laying out at times all night, and giving his horse a range of rope to browse, while he should make his letter-pack his pillow on the ground!

In 1741, it is announced in the Gazette, that the "northern post begins his fortnight stages on Tuesday next for the winter season."

In 1745, John Datley, surveyor, states that he had just made a survey of the road from Trenton to Amboy, and hath set up marks at every two miles to guide the traveller. It was done by private subscriptions, and he proposes to do the whole road from Philadelphia to New York in the same way, if a sum can be made up.

In 1748, when professor Calm arrived at Philadelphia, from London, many of the inhabitants came on board his vessel for letters. Such as were not so called for, were taken to the coffee-house, where every body could make enquiry for them, thus showing that, then, the post office did not seem to claim a right to distribute them as now.

In 1753, the delivery of letters by the penny post was first begun. At the same time began the practice of advertising remaining letters in the office. The letters for all the neighboring counties went to Philadelphia, and lay there till called for—thus letters for Newton, Bristol, Chester, New Castle, &c. are to be called for in Philadelphia.

Even at that period the northern mail goes and returns but once a week in summer, and once a fortnight in winter, just as it did 25 years before.

But in 1754, month of October, a new impulse is given so as to start for New York thereafter, on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday: and in the winter, once a week. This, therefore, marks the period of a new era in the mail establishment of our country. It owed this impulse, extending also to Boston, to the management of our Franklin, who was made post master general.

In 1755, the post master general, Benjamin Franklin, publishes, that to aid the trade, &c. he gives notice that, thereafter, the winter northern mail from Philadelphia to New England, which used to set out but once a fortnight, shall start once a week all the year round, whereby answers may be obtained to letters between Philadelphia and Boston, in three weeks, which used to require six weeks!"

In 1758, newspapers which aforetime were carried post free per mail, will, by reason of their great increase, be charged thereafter to the small price of 9*d.* a year for fifty miles, 1*s.* 6*d.* for 100 miles. This was, most probably, the private emolument of the rider; the papers themselves not having been mailed at all, it is probable.

Finally, in 1774, which brings colonial things nearly to their final close, by the war of independence, soon after, we read that "John Perkin, engages to ride post to carry the mail once a week to Baltimore, and will take along or bring back led horses or any parcels."

FRAUDS ON THE REVENUE.

From the New York Commercial Advertiser.

Believing that our citizens only require to be fully informed of the great extent to which frauds have been and are still practiced at our custom house, in order to enlist public opinion in aid of the officers whose duty it is to take care that the revenue is faithfully collected, I as one, who suffered much by them, ask permission through the columns of the Commercial Advertiser, to state my views on this important subject.

Such has unfortunately been the difficulty heretofore of getting at the proof of these frauds, that many who have been fully satisfied of the fact, have given the matter up almost in despair.

A laxity in the practice of enforcing the penalties under any law, naturally excites boldness in the violators of the statute. And such has been the great latitude given, from the press of business and other causes, that while the conscientious man, complies with the law to the letter, the rogue sets it at open defiance. The public having no immediate interest in the matter, and for this cause not having the data before them, had gradually from the long habit, of thinking the city was prosperous, and therefore all was right, become fixed in the belief that these frauds were of no great magnitude. Added to this, by a partiality to these men, and their practices of fraud, which nothing that an honest man can conceive of could warrant, whenever any attempt has been made to disabuse the public mind, some of the newspapers of our city, have invariably denied the existence of fraud, and enlisted in aid of their denial, the prejudices of the mercantile part of the community. From these causes it had become unpopular to speak or to write upon the subject. Such indeed had been the burthen felt on this account by one of our highly respectable fellow-citizens, Mr. Peter H. Schenck, who has been reviled and abused by one particular press heretofore alluded to, that many others of our useful citizens have been deterred from taking an active part to correct this evil, from an unwillingness to have their names thus dragged before the public. Nor should this excite astonishment or surprise, since the conductor of such a press has the power to villify character, in a manner that reparation never can be made for. Hundreds if not thousands who read the calumny, never see its refutation.

The time has now however gone by, in which these men can control public opinion. The prejudices against the home industry are gradually wearing away, and the late highly respectable convention in this city, have satisfied many of our honest citizens that they have looked on with a censurable apathy, while these frauds have been increasing.

It is therefore deemed a favorable opportunity to present some views, which will throw light on this matter in which every American citizen has a deep interest. Not only are they interested as regards the present collection of the revenue, but to protect their own interest and that of their countrymen, from great injury, to benefit a foreign rogue.

That the public may be able to judge of the total impossibility that cloths can be honestly imported and sold at the prices between 3¼ and 4¼ dollars per yard, without extravagant profit or great loss, I will state the cost of importation of the description of cloths to which I allude.

A cloth of 6-4 wide (which is the ordinary width) costing 6s. 9d. sterling, or one dollar fifty cents per running yard, being the highest cost which can lawfully come in under the one dollar minimum, can be imported at $2 53, which includes cost, duties and expenses of importing; add to this 25 cents per yard for credits on sales, commission, guarantee, &c. making up the whole cost, and expenses of sale, to $2 78, per yard for dollar minimum cloths—if they will sell at $3 per yard it is a clear profit on the investment of 15 per cent. If the cloth cost but 8s. sterling and pays the lawful duty, which is one dollar per yard more than on the cloth costing 6s. 9d. it must sell for $4 per yard to pay the cost and charges, and remit to the owner his nett cost of 8s. per yard without any profit. If a cloth cost 9s. sterling it must at least bring $4 30, to pay cost. If it cost 10s. it must bring $4 60. If it cost 11s. $5 to pay the cost.

Merchants will not long carry on business that yields no profit, either on one or the other side of the Atlantic. On the contrary, it appears that some classes of importers appear to have made profits beyond all belief, or have suffered heavy losses. Thousands of pieces of cloths have been sold in this market by private and public sale at the prices of between 3¼ and 4¼ dollars per yard, mostly at 3¼ and 3¾ dollars, and the sellers were well satisfied, as I am informed, with the prices they obtained.

All cloths that cost but 6s. 9d. sterling per running yard of 6-4 wide paying the dollar minimum duty, and which sell

At $3 per yard	yield a	clear profit	of	15	per cent.
At $3 25	do.	do.	do.	31	do.
At $3 50	do.	do.	do.	53	do.
At $3 75	do.	do.	do.	75	do.

If they cost but 3d. sterling more than 6s. 9d. they, of course, come under the two dollar fifty cents minimum, and are subject to a duty of one dollar per yard more. Thus, if a cloth cost but 7s. sterling per running yard of 6-4 wide, pays the lawful duty, and sells for but

$3,	it produces a loss to the owner of	55	per cent.
If at $3 25,	the loss is	38	do.
If at $3 50,	the loss is	23	do.

To an intelligent public I appeal whether either of these two cases is probable? That the market has been well stocked with cloths selling at 3¼, 3½ to 4 dollars, is notorious; to believe that either can be true, we must consent to the absurdity, that the owners have either realized the enormous profits of from 30 to 75 per cent. or lost from 23 to 55 per cent. There is no mistake in these figures!

When, therefore, to these calculations, which cannot be controverted, the fact is added, that no honest man can import from England (purchased for cash) at a cost of 6s. 9d. a cloth that will sell, taking the average of all colors, for more than $3 per yard, can a doubt remain? The writer has in vain tried to have cloths bought in England at 6s. 9d. that would sell for more than $3, and he asserts fearlessly, (and challenges proof that he is in error,) that the whole average of cloths of all colors that have been honestly imported at 6s. 9d. for the past nine months, have not sold in this market above the average of $3 per yard; many cloths would not bring that price. And that nearly every yard of cloth that has been sold in this market at $3½ to $4, has either been smuggled or fraudulently entered, or it produced a considerable loss to the owner; and from what has been previously stated, no doubt can exist that by FRAUD ONLY, is this market so fully supplied with cloths of this description, thousands of pieces of which have been sold this season both at public and private sale, and the owner no doubt laughing at our folly and credulity.

They have been repeatedly detected in attempting to pass their fraudulent entries. Have they been punished or the frauds been stopped? No, fellow-citizens they have not. Have they been branded with that public odium they merit? the answer is as certainly, No.

The Washington Telgraph contains an article in reply to the report on frauds by the late convention, in which it is stated that a parcel of cloths imported by Messrs. Sands, Spooner & Co., of this city, had been stopped by the appraisers as undervalued, an attempt having been made to enter them at 6-9, subjecting them only to the duty on the one dollar minimum. The appraisement of the most part of them was above that price. In case No. 12, they estimated only 57 yards at 6s. 9d. the remaining 237 yards were appraised from 7s. 3d. to 8s. 3d. This is the elucidation of the cloths which have been fraudulently entered and sold at 3½ to 4 dollars per yard, which, as before stated, on 8s. 3d. cloth, must bring $3 25 to pay cost and charges, though the government is defrauded one dollar per yard in the duty, and if it had paid the honest duty, it must sell for more than $4, to pay cost and charges. If this lot of cloths had not all been sent to the public store, they would not, it is very certain, have paid duty but at the dollar minimum.

The writer of this article has been informed by a member of the committee on frauds, of the late convention, that he saw in the public store, two packages of cloths, consigned to the same house under detention, because of an undervaluation, they having been invoiced at 6s. 9d. per yard, and the committee and the importer who accompanied them estimated them to have cost at least 10s. to 10s. 6d. per yard.

I again repeat that cloths cannot be fairly imported, and sold in this market at the prices of between 3¼ and 4¼ dollars per yard without loss, for the reasons which have been already stated. And it is only such cloths as the above, which have not been detected, that have sold at $4 to $4¼ the yard, having only paid duty under the dollar minimum—as those are attempted to be entered, I challenge proof to the contrary.

Let the honest American merchants look to it!—and not permit their government and fellow citizens, to be thus cheated and peculated upon by a set of unprincipled foreigners, who have settled among us for no other purpose than to get rich by plundering and defrauding our revenue, as several have already done, and departed.

A SUFFERER BY THE FRAUD.

LATE EVENTS AT WASHINGTON.

The war waxes hot in the newspapers. Many rough things are said—but as they implicate private or personal character, we cannot even notice some of them, if disposed to enter upon "the throes and convulsions" of editors professing the same general creed.

The Philadelphia Sentinel loudly calls on the president, "without fear or without favor" to strike Dr. Randolph "from the roll"—as certain "unimportant midshipmen" were. He was acting secretary of war when he carried a challenge from Mr. Eaton to Mr. Ingham, and personally intruded himself into Mr. Ingham's room on the "Sabbath," threatening personal violence—out of all which the Sentinel makes a strong case.

The same paper also contains some strictures on the correspondence of the president with the second auditor and others—published in our last. The suggestions were probably made by Mr. Ingham. The following is an extract:

"The gentlemen whose correspondence with the president we publish to-day, like all persons over-anxious to contradict a charge, admit substantially all the facts which Mr. Ingham connects them with. It will be seen from Mr. Ingham's letter, that he alleges the "persons concerned" in the intended outrage on him, "were the late secretary of war, and the acting secretary of war — that the second auditor of the treasury, register of the treasury, and the treasurer of the United States, were in THEIR company; and the treasurer's and register's rooms, in the lower part of the building of the treasury department, and a grocery store between his lodgings and the office were alternately occupied as THEIR rendezvous while lying in wait—the former affording the best opportunity for observing his approach."

"The charge, therefore, of lying in wait, entirely refers to the late secretary of war, and his brother-in-law, the acting secretary of war: the imputation upon the other persons simply is, that of being in the company of the 'principals' at the scene of intended action, and during the time they waited in the treasury department the approach of Mr. Ingham."

Of Mrs. Ingham, introduced into the contest by Mr. Eaton, the "Sentinel" says—"We would do violence to all honorable feeling if we did not express our deep abhorrence of the horrible insinuation contained in major Eaton's last letter to Mr. Ingham. An American matron more pure, more exalted, more exemplary in all the relations of life, does not exist in this country, deservedly celebrated as it is for female excellence, than the amiable and excellent lady of Mr. Ingham. In making an assault so utterly unjustifiable, general* Eaton has assumed a most awful responsibility, a responsibility not to be referred to the umpirage of the pistol, or any other of the various means by which fashionable murderers endeavor to make the worse appear the better cause; but to be fixed by the wise, the virtuous and the good, who, thanks be to a governing providence, if they are not in high places, still are the safe guardians, of our republic."

And further, speaking of Mr. Eaton, the "Sentinel" observes—"In the first place, he equivocates on the vital question of the conspiracy to assail Mr. Ingham, and only answers it by asking why he did not 'organize his band from the war, rather than the treasury department.' Why major Eaton, your brother-in-law, the bearer of your challenge to Mr. Ingham, and your advance guard in the intended assault upon him, was the head of the war department—yes, the acting secretary of war. In the second place, he admits, that 'it appeared a matter of duty in him to dissolve all connexion with the administration of the government,' before he proceeded to extremities with Mr. Ingham. True enough, major!! but in this admission, you pass sentence against the bearer of your challenge, and your sentinel, the acting secretary of war."

Mr. Ingham was waited upon at Philadelphia by a committee from the "democrats" of Bucks county appointed to receive him, and while in Philadelphia was waited upon by a "large number of democrats," &c. On Saturday, at the line between Montgomery and Bucks counties, he was met by a "numerous cavalcade of the substantial yeomanry of his native county," and a procession was formed of the "bone and sinew of Pennsylvania"—"major gen. W. T. Rogers acting as marshal, assisted by col. Davis and capt. Merrick, and preceded by the venerable gen. Samuel Smith and capt. Francis Baird, soldiers of the revolution, the latter being the presidential elector, who in 1828 recorded the voice of the people of Bucks in favor of Jackson and Calhoun." The procession gathered numbers as it proceeded—a collation was partaken of, and address delivered and reply given, &c. which we shall publish among the "politics of the day," when received.

From the Washington Globe.

To the editor—It may be proper for me to state, that when I consented to bear the communication from the late secretary of war, Mr. Eaton, to the late secretary of the treasury, Mr. Ingham, it was distinctly understood by maj. Eaton, that, in the event of the correspondence leading to a meeting, my agency was to cease entirely, and that major Eaton was to be attended by another friend; who was not in the city when the note was sent.

The assertion of Mr. Ingham, that I intruded into his room and threatened personal violence, is entirely erroneous. I called at his lodging, inquired if he were at home, was answered in the affirmative and invited to his room by the servant. After the usual salutation, I asked him if he intended to answer maj. E's note. He replied that he should take his own time, &c. I then told him that it was my business to communicate to him the intention of major Eaton to take a decisive and prompt course in relation to the matter—if he failed to respond to the note of which I had been the bearer the day before. I then took my leave without the slightest menace of personal violence on my part.

P. G. RANDOLPH.

The "Telegraph" shews a determination to give a full history of late events at Washington. The editor places Mr. Eaton in an awkward situation for quarrelling with Mr. Ingham for the reasons that he did, while impeaching the character of Mrs. I.—for that, if justly assailed, she was unfitted to associate with a virtuous woman. He says the president is "yet surrounded by an irresponsible cabal, who use the malign influence as the means of controlling the power and patronage of the general government," &c.

The New York Courier and Enquirer of the 23rd June had the following paragraph, in reference to the new controversies in the party to which it, for the time being, belonged—or belongs: We have no idea as to what is meant by this grave annunication—

"This scandalous conspiracy will not terminate where the conspirators wish—They will find that the subject will not be dropped when they most desire it. The real causes of the dissolution of the cabinet will be in time spread before the people, and it will be discovered that woman had no part or lot in the matter. The time has not yet arrived to bring forward the actors in this scene, but it will be shown that the plot was organised before gen. Jackson was sworn into office."

The New York Evening Post speaking of the various correspondence that has taken place between Messrs. Eaton and Ingham, and the letter of the president to the persons implicated by the latter and their replies—says,

*General—major and mister—are indiscriminately used in the "Sentinel."

"Here is a controversy between two individuals, late functionaries of the government, but now retired to private life, about the characters of their wives, spread before the community as if it were a matter, like the West India treaty, for public discussion—a thing to be debated in taverns and at the corners of streets, and read aloud at beer-clubs, by the best winded member, for the edification of his fellows. Here is a charge of a conspiracy to commit murder, deliberately made against four officers of the government, preferred to the president, and published at the same time in a newspaper—a charge since solemnly denied by the persons accused, and declared to be wholly imaginary. The president appears exceedingly well in the affair; and, whatever may be the effect of these personal controversies upon those who are engaged in them, they affect not him."

POLITICS OF THE DAY.

FROM THE TELEGRAPH OF JUNE 2.

To the agency of an unseen, irresponsible influence, is to be attributed the rupture between the president and vice president; and to it is to be attributed the late extraordinary dissolution of the cabinet.

General Jackson, so far from removing them on account of the manner in which they have discharged their official duties, in his letters to Mr. Ingham and gov. Branch, says:

"In accepting of your resignation, it is with great pleasure that I bear testimony to the integrity and zeal with which you have managed the fiscal concerns of the nation. In your discharge of all the duties of your office, over which I have any control, I have been fully satisfied."

Wherefore, then, were they dismissed? Was it because the public interest required their removal? Mr Ingham is explicit on this point. He says in his letter lately published.

"The official intercourse of the heads of departments with each other, and with the president, has never, to my knowledge, been interrupted for a moment, nor has any difference of opinion, as to the measures of the government, divided the cabinet in a single instance, so far as I recollect, according to the line of separation now so generally ascribed in the public papers."

It is apparent that public considerations did not control this movement. What did? Gov. Branch has said, that he went as far as a man of honor could go, and in a late letter he consents to be a candidate for congress, expressly upon the ground, that he dares believe that his country will approve the course which he felt it his duty to pursue in his intercourse with the citizens of Washington, during his late residence among them. Mr. Ingham and governor Branch were dismissed for political and private causes. Neither have been avowed, because neither would be approved by the people. One of the causes was, that they would not permit the executive will to regulate their private intercourse with the citizens of Washington; an attempt to do which, although often threatened by an irresponsible combination, of which major William B. Lewis is an acting agent, was for many months resisted by general Jackson, and was not acquiesced in, until surrounding him here with their chosen agents, and operating upon him from abroad through prepared channels, they persuaded him that his "popularity could stand any thing."

The same influence which revolutionised the late cabinet seeks so to organise the new one as to confirm its power and subserve its purposes, as well of private pique as of political control. The change of cabinet was a measure dictated by the mingled influence of mortified vanity, disappointed ambition, and revenge. Who can believe that their work is done? Who does not see that that measure, which they would have the country believe was intended to promote the public good, was adopted as a means of grasping more power? We have said that the change in the cabinet was the work of mortified vanity, disappointed ambition, and of revenge. We have said that William B. Lewis is an acting agent. He is the brother-in-law of the secretary of war, who is the biographer and personal friend of the president, possessed of his private papers, and upon whom he relies as the guardian of his future fame. General Jackson has been persuaded that the character of the hero is identified with that of his biographer, and thus the devotion of an old friend, and the vanity and self love of an old man were enlisted. We will not now speak of the peculiar "circumstances" which gave to that partiality, which is neither concealed nor denied, an absorbing and controlling influence. Nor will we now examine the political arrangements of which those "circumstances" form the basis. These may hereafter be unfolded, upon a theatre so elevated as to raise them upon the common prejudices of the day. Our object is to state a fact. As far back as the 21st of October, 1829, major Lewis called upon the editor, at his office, and urged him to enlist this press in the defence of those "circumstances." We refused, and argued that, if we were to do so, instead of resting upon its measures and the popularity of gen. Jackson, the administration would be tested by the "circumstances" in question, and that its utter overthrow must be the consequence. Those who have witnessed the progress of the intrigues that have thrown discord into the republican party, will see the bearing which this had upon subsequent events. The editor of the Globe, then the editor of the Frankfort Argus, did enlist himself as a partisan; and that which the Telegraph had refused to do in October, 1829, was done by the Argus in 1830. The editor of the Argus was translated to Washington. The Globe was established upon the patronage of the government,* and the Telegraph denounced.

We have already spoken of some of the means used to destroy this paper. We lay before our readers the following letter:

"New Orleans, April 13, 1831.

Mr. Green: Martin Gordon, the collector of this port, doubtless acting under the orders of his superiors, is, at this time, busily engaged in proscribing you, and has his agents appointed to call on each subscriber you have in this country, and have them erase their name from your list and add it to that of the Globe. He is aided here by the brother in-law of Mr. Livingston, (Mr. Carleton), and his partner Lockett. The post office here can furnish the information necessary, and the officers lend a helping hand. You are denounced as a traitor, and are to be broken down. The facts above stated I pledge myself to prove, when called upon."

JOHN SMITH.

A few days after the receipt of this letter, another, open, and having the names of a number of our subscribers in N. Orleans, directing the discontinuance of this paper, was brought to our office by major Lewis' messenger. Such a proceeding needs no comment.

This paper was established to maintain the rights of the people, to oppose executive influence, when exercised with an intent to control the elective franchise; to urge and enforce a faithful and honest administration of public affairs; to maintain the right and the duty of the people to choose their own chief magistrate, and to develope and oppose all arrangements, or attempts, of the incumbent to appoint his successor. We honestly and ardently believed that general Jackson would devote himself to his country. We confided in his "deep rooted popularity" for success, and in his fame and character as the guaranties that he would be the president of the nation—that he would purify the public morals, and invigorate, public virtue. We expected him to bring to his aid the talent and virtue, the strength and energy, of the republican party. For this we were pledged, and in the honesty of our hearts we believed that the objections urged by his opponents, would be as beacon lights to guide his administration. Above all we confided in his own firmness and independence; in the strength of his own mind, and in his reputed knowledge of men, (a belief confirmed by his brilliant career), for the fulfilment of the pledges made in his behalf. It is known that the just expectations of the country were disappointed in the organization of his cabinet. But those who were nearest to his person, and witnesses of "its deleterious operation," were more disappointed in the organization of the irresponsible "malign influence" which artfully obtained his confidence, and used his name and patronage to corrupt the public and private morals, and defeat the great object for which he was elected.

That that influence does exist is corroborated by the positive assertion of governor Branch, and the unerring testimony of admitted facts, the tendency and origin of which cannot be concealed or denied. That influence yet surrounds the president. It is beneath, but it controls the cabinet. It has dismissed able and faithful public ministers; it has corrupted a portion of the public press; and is resolved to ruin that which it cannot corrupt. It is our pride and boast that it makes war upon the Telegraph. Our conflict has heretofore been before the president. We have been faithful to him, we have premonished him of his danger; we have kept his counsels and our own as long as we could safely do so; we have seen and apprehended the consequences; we have known the bearing which the presidential question would have on local elections now in progress, and we have been silent. But we are compelled to go before another tribunal. Are not the rights of the people as dear; is not executive influence, when exercised with intent to control the elections, as dangerous; is not a faithful and honest administration of public affairs as necessary; is it not as much the right and duty of the people to choose their own chief magistrate; and is it not as much our duty to develope and oppose all arrangements and attempts of the incumbent to appoint his successor now, as it was in 1828? If these questions be answered in the affirmative, (and who dares openly to deny them in the negative?) the question for the American people to discuss, is not the man, but the measures, which this press should support. The question which we propose to our readers is, will you desert and proscribe this press, because it has refused to desert the principles upon which it was established, and which it was pledged to maintain; shall the "malign influence" which has dissolved the late cabinet, also dissolve the liberty of the press? Shall that influence which, failing in its effects to regulate the private intercourse of the citizens of Washington, has seized upon the name of the president, use the organization of the party, and his popularity, to trample under foot the principles upon which he was elected, and perpetuate their power on the ruins of public and private virtue.

The appeal is to an intelligent and virtuous people. It is not made upon slight causes, nor without a careful survey of all consequences.

FROM THE SAME OF A SUBSEQUENT DATE.

From the following letters it will be seen that the Telegraph is to be put under the official ban. First, Amos Kendall, then

*The Globe boasts that the cities of N. York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, contributed 6,000 dollars to establish a daily paper. When in New York, we heard that two thousand dollars were levied, as follows. Sundry office holders were invited to dine with Mr. Blair, the editor: when assembled, they were told that the friends of the president, and the president himself, desired the establishment of a daily paper for the purpose of putting down the Telegraph, and that they were desired to contribute two thousand dollars, in sums of one hundred dollars each; thirteen hundred dollars were thus contributed; one of the thirteen then proposed that they should contribute the other seven hundred, which was done.

Wm. B. Lewis, and then came the collector and a few others at N. Orleans, and now our respected friends, the second comptroller and the successor of Mrs. Barney's husband. Our old friend Dabney should keep cool. He is in a comfortable birth, and, unless we are misinformed, is no longer an advocate for his once favorite doctrine of "rotation in office." He who once needed a friend, may, perchance, need him again. But really if the object of these official gentry is to frighten us into the ranks of Mr. Van Buren, they have, to use the quaint phrase of the member from Tennessee, "barked up the wrong tree."

If official patronage had been our object, if we had yielded to our private interest, instead of performing our public duty, we, too, would have been so blind as not to see; so deaf as not to hear; or else so prudent as not to believe our own senses. How are we to account for the displeasure of our official friends? Have they been so much devoted to their public duties as not to know passing events? Has the shock been too sudden for their official nerves? If this be all, there is yet room to hope. In some sixteen months, they will discover that they have made a—mistake. For ourselves and our paper, we believe there remains enough of the spirit of our fathers, among the tax paying voters of the country, who desire to know the truth, to maintain a press, whose editor dares be honest; and will not bow the knee that "thrift may follow fawning." But, to the letters. Here they are, verbatim et literatim.

Treasury department, 2d comptroller's office, June 3d, 1831.

Sir—The United States' Telegraph, of the 2d instant, is received at this office, I have to request you to discontinue the paper, and present your bill for payment. I am, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant, J. B. THORNTON.

Gen. Duff Green.

Baltimore, 3d June 1831.

Dear general—I will thank you to discontinue the U. S. Telegraph, which is sent to me; the subscription is paid.

Yours, &c. D. S. CARR.

Gen. Duff Green, Washington.

In our paper of the 2d inst. we said:

The Globe boasts that the cities of New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, contributed 6,000 dollars to establish a daily paper.—When in New York, we heard that two thousand dollars were levied, as follows: Sundry office holders were invited to dine with Mr. Blair, the editor: when assembled, they were told that the friends of the president, and the president himself, desired the establishment of a daily paper for the purpose of putting down the Telegraph, and that they were desired to contribute two thousand dollars, in sums of one hundred dollars each; thirteen hundred dollars was thus contributed; one of the thirteen then proposed that they should contribute the other seven hundred, which was done.

To this the Globe replies:

"The Telegraph speaks of a contribution of 2,000 dollars made to the Globe, by the friends of the administration in New York.

"No such contribution was made to the Globe as is insinuated. The editor expressly told those interested in the establishment of this paper, that he would accept no contribution. The sum in question arose out of a subscription for papers which are to be sent to the subscribers upon the usual terms, as an equivalent for their money."

Is this a denial of the statement? It is true, that we are told that the "sum in question arose out of subscription for papers which are to be sent to the subscribers upon the usual terms." We learn that the Globe prints some fifteen hundred papers. Are we to understand that it is usual to send fifteen numbers to each subscriber? It is not true that this was an usual proceeding. The answer of the Globe admits—1st. That certain office holders were invited to dine with Mr. Blair.—2d. That they were told that the friends of the president, and the president himself, desired the establishment of a daily paper, for the purpose of putting down the Telegraph.—3d. That they were desired to subscribe two thousand dollars, in sums of one hundred dollars each.—4th. Thirteen hundred dollars was thus subscribed.—5th. And that one of the thirteen then proposed that they should subscribe the other seven hundred, which was done.

Now the only objection which the Globe makes to this proposition is, that it was no contribution. It admits that the thirteen office holders agreed to take two thousand dollars worth of Globes!! This is a distinction without a difference. But the Globe makes a precious confession. It says: "The editor expressly told those interested in the establishment of this paper, (the Globe), that he would accept no contributions." The gentlemen interested in the establishment of the Globe!! Now pray, who were the gentlemen interested in the establishment of the Globe? A disinterested editor, truly, to change his opinions and his principles for the benefit of gentlemen, whose contributions he refused to accept!!—Surely he has been touched by a magician's wand!!!

☞As an appendix to the preceding, we think that general Green, who likes not the doctrine of "rewards and punishments" as it stands at present—should publish an article from the "National Journal" of the 28th June, which gives the names of sixty eight persons, describes the offices that they hold, and puts down the salaries which they enjoy, who attended the late "Jackson meeting" in Washington city—though the "Journal" observes that "not an individual holding office" attending the late much larger meeting of the friends of Mr. Clay. These sixty-eight are chiefly clerks in the different departments, but the marshal of the district, two assistant post master-generals, the 2nd comptroller, the post-master at Washington, the keeper of the penitentiary, keeper of the jail, and sundry other officers, were among them—and the salaries of the whole amount to eighty-six thousand and forty five dollars a year; though Mr. Green himself as printer to congress, Mr. Blair, as printer to the executive, and several other employed persons, in attendance, are not counted, or their requisitions on the public purse added. To this list Mr. Green might yet add a column designating those who had been subscribers to the Telegraph, and now are not. It would be an interesting item in the history of this "age of revolutions," and instructively shew the "mutability of human things!"

COPY RIGHT LAW.

From the New York Commercial Advertiser.

The origin and progress of laws for securing copy-rights, constitute an article in the literary history of a country of no inconsiderable importance. In this country the subject has derived additional importance from incidental circumstances. All the material facts in the following statements have been taken from men personally concerned, and eye and ear-witnesses, or from official documents and original papers.

In the year 1782, Mr. N. Webster composed two small books, intended as elementary works for the instruction of children in the English language. He resided in Goshen, Orange county, state of New York; the American army then lying on the banks of the Hudson. The country was then impoverished by the war; it was ill furnished with school books; and there was no certain prospect of peace, which would revive an intercourse with Great Britain.

In the autumn of that year, Mr. W. visited Philadelphia, for the purpose of showing his manuscripts to influential men, and of obtaining a law to secure the copy-right of literary works to their authors. As the legislatures of the states were not then in session, the object of obtaining laws for the purpose could not be accomplished. But being encouraged in his undertaking by respectable gentlemen to whom he showed his manuscripts, and communicated his views, he determined to prosecute his designs.

On his way, Mr. W. called on governor Livingston, then at Trenton, and inquired of him whether it was probable a copy-right law could be obtained in New Jersey. The governor took time to consult his council, and reported for answer that his council gave him very little encouragement.

On this journey Mr. W. showed his manuscripts to professor, (afterwards president), S. S. Smith, of Nassau Hall, who gave him a written recommendation of his works, and his opinion of the expediency of enacting laws to secure literary property. This recommendation is subscribed also by Archibald Gamble, of the university in Philadelphia. The original in the hand writing of professor Smith, is before the writer, and dated Princeton, Sept. 27, 1782.

In October following, Mr. W. went to Hartford, with a view to petition the legislature of Connecticut, for a copy-right law; and the petition was presented, but too late in the session to obtain a hearing. He then returned to Goshen, and revised his manuscripts, with a view to introduce some improvements which had been suggested to him by professor Smith.

In January 1783, Mr. W. prepared another memorial to be presented to the legislature of Connecticut for the same purpose. This was committed to the care of John Canfield, esq. of Sharon. But the necessity of it was superseded by the enactment of a general law, on the petition of several gentlemen; among whom, the writer believes were Mr. Dwight, afterwards president, Mr. John Ledyard, and Mr. Joel Barlow. The following is an extract from Mr. Webster's memorial.

"Your memorialist, ever ambitious to promote the interest of literature and the dignity of the American empire, designs the above mentioned works for the general benefit of youth in this country. In order to prevent spurious editions; to enable your memorialist to have the books under his own correction, and especially to secure to him the pecuniary advantage of his own productions, to which he conceives himself solely entitled—your memorialist humbly prays, that this general assembly would by a law passed for that purpose, vest, in your memorialist and his assigns, the sole right of printing and publishing said books in the state of Connecticut, for and during the term of thirteen years, &c."

The following are extracts from Mr. Webster's letter to Mr. Canfield, accompanying the memorial:

"I am fully of opinion that a reformation of the language we speak, will some time or other, be thought an object of legislative importance. America must be as independent in literature, as she is in politics—as famous for arts as for arms; and it is not impossible, but a person of my youth may have some influence in exciting a spirit of literary industry."

In the same winter or spring of 1783, Mr. W. prepared a memorial to be presented to the legislature of New York, then sitting at Kingston, in Ulster. Mr. W. attended in person. But the necessity of presenting it was superseded by the prompt attention of gen. Schuyler to the subject. On motion, the senate, at that session, passed the bill desired, and the bill passed into a law at a subsequent session.

In the same winter, the legislature of Massachusetts enacted a copy-right law, and it is understood to have been through the influence of the late president Dwight, then a member of the house of representatives.

As the congress under the confederation, had no power to protect literary property: certain friends of literature, judged it advisable to petition congress to recommend to the several states, the enactment of laws for this purpose. A memorial was accordingly presented by some gentlemen, among whom, it is understood, was Joel Barlow.

In May 1783, the congress, on the report of Mr. Williamson, Mr. Izard and Mr. Madison, to whom were referred sundry papers and memorials, on the subject of literary property, passed a resolution recommending to the several states, to secure to the authors and publishers of any new books not hitherto printed, &c. the copy-right of such books for a certain time, not less than fourteen years, &c. Journals, vol. 4. Ed. 1823.

It is understood that New Jersey, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Pennsylvania, complied with this recommendation in the course of the year following. Other states may have done the same; but some of them neglected an immedite compliance.

In May, 1785, Mr. W. undertook a journey to the middle and southern states, a principal object of which was to obtain copyright laws in the states which had not yet enacted them. He visited Mount Vernon, and called on Dr. David Stuart, at Alexandria, then a member of the house of delegates in Virginia, to whom he communicated his wishes, and who promised his assistance.

The legislatures of the states not being in session, Mr. W. returned to Baltimore, and sailed thence to Charleston, S. C. and returning spent the summer in Baltimore.

In November he went to Richmond, where the legislature of Virginia, was to convene that winter. On his way, he visited Mount Vernon, and received letters of introduction from general Washington, to governor Harrison and the speakers of both houses. On the last day of December Mr. W. went to Annapolis, for the same object; and on the first of February, 1786; he visited Dover in Delaware, where the legislature was in session, for the same purpose. On petition, the legislature appointed a committee to bring in a bill for a copy-right law; but it was the last day of the session, and the business was deferred to the next session.

These are the material facts in relation to the securing of copyrights, anterior to the formation of the present constitution of the United States. In this constitution, an article vests in congress the power "to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing, for limited times, to authors and inventors, the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries." In pursuance of this power, congress enacted the law of May 1, 1790, which superseded all the state laws on the subject. A supplementary law was enacted April 29, 1802.

When Mr. W. was in England, in 1825, he learned that the British parliament, had, a few years before, enacted a new statute on the subject of copy-rights, which had very much extended the term of exclusive right to authors. It occeurred to him that this rendered an extension of the right in the United States, very important to the citizens of this country; otherwise Americans, whose writings might be adapted to both countries, would send them to England for publication. This reason, co operating with his own private interest, induced him to take measures for obtaining a new and more liberal law of the United States, on this subject.

With a view to this object, he addressed a letter to the hon. Daniel Webster, requesting him to use his influence to obtain a new law on the subject of copy rights, which should extend the rights of authors. Mr. Webster replied and promised his aid.

In the autumn of 1827, Mr. N. Webster applied to the hon. Mr. Ingersoll, a representative from Connecticut, stating to him the facts of an extension of copy-right in Great Britain, as also in France, and requesting him to use his influence to have a bill for a new law brought forward in congress. Mr. Ingersoll very cheerfully complied. On the 17th of December, on the motion of Mr. Ingersoll, the house of representatives, "resolved that the committee on the judiciary inquire into the expediency of exteuding the time for which copy-rights may be hereafter secured to authors, beyond the period now allowed by law, and also affording further protection to authors against the publication of abridgments or summaries of works, after the copy rights thereof have been secured." As the committee delayed several weeks to make a report, Mr. Ingersoll conversed fully on the subject with one of the members, and addressed a note to the committee, in which he stated the provision of the British statute 34th, Geo. 3, enlarging the rights of authors, and the liberal provisions of the French laws on the subject. He stated some of the defects of the old law of the United States, and urged the expediency and justice of a more liberal law.

A petition signed by many respectable literary men, was, about this time, presented to congress, praying for the same object. Some members of the committee were opposed to the measure; but at length, on the first of February, 1828, the committee reported a bill consisting of three sections only, extending the term of copy-rights from fourteen to twenty-eight years, and securing the benefit of the act to authors who had previously obtained a copy-right under the old law.

On the 21st of February, Mr. Verplanek submitted to the house of representatives, an amendment to the bill reported by the committee, entitled an "amendment to a bill to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copy-rights." This amendment was printed by order of the house. It was intended to embraee all the material provisions of the two former laws, and those of the bill reported by the judiciary committee,—it contained also some additional improvements. Nothing further was done, and the bill and amendment died at the close of the session.

At the next session (1829 30) the hon. Mr. Ellsworth, a member from Connecticut, was appointed one of the judiciary committee, of which the hon. Mr. Buchanan was chairman.

Before Mr. Ellsworth left home, Mr. N. Webster applied to him to make efforts to procure the enactment of a new copy-right law; and he sent a petition to congress, praying for the renewal of the copy-right of one of his books. This petition being referred to the judiciary committee, brought the subject distinctly into consideration. After consultation, the committee authorised Mr. Ellsworth to prepare a bill for a general law on the subject.

In order to present the subject in its true light, to the committee and to congress, Mr. E. wrote notes to the ministers of the principal European nations, requesting information from each of them, respecting the state of copy-rights in the nations they represented. From their answers, and an inspection of the laws of some of the governments, Mr. E. formed a report, stating the terms of time for which copy-rights are secured to authors in Great Britain, France, Russia, Sweden, Denmark and certain states in Germany. He also formed a bill for a law intended to embraee all the material provisions of the old laws with those of the bill reported by the former judiciary committee.

In this bill Mr. E. introduced some valuable provisions which had been omitted in the old laws, and in the bill and amendment offered at the former session. He also obtained from his friends some suggestions which enabled him to correct some errors and supply defects.

This bill was approved by the judiciary committee, reported by Mr. Ellsworth, and printed by order of the house. But such was the pressure of business, and so little interest was felt in the bill, that no efforts of Mr. E. could bring it before the house at that session.

Finding the efforts of the friends of the bill in congress unavailing to obtain a hearing, Mr. N. Webster, notwithstanding his advanced age, determined on visiting Washington in the winter of 1830-31.

The difficulties which had prevented the bill from being brought forward now disappeared. Mr. W. had no occasion to solicit a vote. No sooner were his wishes known, than gentlemen manifested an interest in the success of the bill. Some gentlemen were not disposed to pass a general law, extending the security of a copy-right to every petty publication; but on account of Mr. Webster's great labors, were willing to pass a private act for his benefit; and one gentleman declared that he was willing to grant him the term of forty years. Mr. W. replied that petty publications would not live forty years: but he did not wish for a private act—he wished for a general law, as others of his fellow citizens deserved the benefits of the law as well as himself.

The bill, at the second reading, in the house of representatives, met with some opposition; but it was ably supported by Mr. Ellsworth, Mr. Verplanck and Mr. Huntington. It passed to a third reading by a large majority, and was ordered to be engrossed without opposition.

When the bill came before the senate, it was referred to the judiciary committee. Mr. Rowan, the chairman, being absent, the committee requested the hon. D. Webster to take the bill, examine it and report it, if he thought proper: he did so, and under all circumstances, deemed it expedient to report it without amendment. On the second reading Mr. Webster made a few explanatory remarks—no other person uttered a word on the subject; and it passed to a third reading by a unanimous vote. On the third reading, the senate, on motion, dispensed with the reading, and it passed to be engrossed, without debate.

In the different applications for copy-right laws, made by Mr. N. Webster, before and since the formation of the present constitution, he is supposed to have devoted nearly a year's time, and expended nearly a thousand dollars.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 19—VOL. IV. BALTIMORE, JULY 9, 1831. [VOL. XL. WHOLE No. 1,033

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

☞The venerable ex-president of the United States, JAMES MONROE, died at New York on Monday last, the fourth of July, at half past 3 o'clock in the afternoon—aged about 73 years. His decease had been for some days expected, but life lingered until the anniversary of his country's independence, and his spirit departed on the 4th of July—the day on which those of ADAMS and JEFFERSON left their earthly tenements. These are really wonderful things!

We shall next week devote a considerable space to a grateful remembrance of the illustrious dead.

☞For the first time in my life, I performed a day's labor on the FOURTH OF JULY—working at the desk eleven hours, to prepare the leading article published in the present number. The frolick was a severe one—but if I shall have the good fortune to amuse or instruct any of my readers, and especially of the class particularly addressed, I shall not regret that I thus spent one anniversary of the new and magnificent DECLARATION OF THE RIGHTS OF MAN.

The subjects touched are deemed of vital importance; and the essay is written in the fulness of the spirit which I felt on the day. I have endeavored to strip political economy of the mystery which too often envelopes it—and to relieve the reader of the necessity of study, as he proceeds with the article—adopting, so far as I could, the most simple style, and using the plainest words to express ideas which should be familiar to every free laboring man. If I have succeeded in the accomplishment of my purposes, and can again find myself in the same good humor for writing in this hot or sultry weather, three other like essays, on contingent matters, shall pretty soon be prepared—for the "signs of the times" shew that every effort should be made to defend that SYSTEM which is annually adding uncounted millions to the wealth of the nation—for it is assailed from within and without, and no time, labor or money is spared to UNDERMINE its foundations. Let those more immediately interested, then, rally round it, as "a band of brothers"—and intrigue and management, supported by corruption, and urged on by VIOLENCE, will avail nothing against it. We shall nullificate the whole of them, with little bits of paper—the magic power of the ballot.

The length of this essay is objectionable on several accounts—but it seemed as if I could not say what I thought necessary, in a less space; and the consequence of this length is, that the general business of the present sheet has been considerably interfered with, the holiday also somewhat embarrassing the mechanical operations of the week. But by the aid of a supplement, which we intend to publish with the next number, present omissions will be fully supplied.

☞We give the full account of Mr. Ingham's reception at home, and had written some remarks upon it—which we are, at last, compelled to postpone, with a large quantity of other articles prepared for the press.

POLITICS FOR WORKING MEN—or an essay on LABOR and SUBSISTENCE—addressed to the free productive people of the United States, July 4, 1831.

I have several times contemplated an essay on labor and subsistence, to explain, so far as I am able, with all possible simplicity and in the plain manner of a practical mechanic, certain great principles of POLITICAL ECONOMY which every working-freeman should not only understand, but give an earnest and unqualified support to; for they deeply interest every man whose means of subsistence are furnished through the labor of his own hands. The times are pregnant with important events to all such persons in the United States. There is a manifest desire in many to reduce the grade of these in society, and to stint the comforts which honest industry enjoys, a conspiracy of the influential few against the divided and undisciplined many. But the latter have the power to direct events to their own advantage—they command at the ballot-box as well as in the field—they may hold the will and the sword of the national government; and if they do not ascertain their rights, and, with unity preserve them, the fault shall not rest with me—for the humble ability afforded has been, for more than thirty years past, devoted to exalt the character and advance the interests of my own class in society, and give to labor that rank which "genuine virtue" should hold in the republic.

Among the natural and inalienable rights of man, as set forth in the "great paper" issued on this glorious day, fifty-five years ago,—are "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness"—and the working men of the United States compelled an acknowledgement of these rights by the "tyrant" who had oppressed them—whose ministers would have forbidden "even the manufacture of a hob-nail," lest it might contribute to a severance of those chains which Great Britain had forged to hold an austere dominion over the people of her colonies. But the hardy and free, intelligent and patriotic laborers of the new states, having served seven years apprenticeship to the trade of war, conquered the independence of their country, and then joyfully returned to the peaceful toils of the field and the work-shop, honorably to earn a plentiful subsistence, and promote their private fortunes, beneath the Eagle-banner which they had raised up and sustained, under the Good Providence of the ALMIGHTY, to mark and bless the happy land of the free.

I am not about to enter upon speculative discussions. I am not fitted for them either by education or habit—both which are plain, indeed. I had rather chop wood, than "chop logic." But I intend to seat myself down, as it were, in every working man's family—if he will permit it, and then and there talk with him about matters of the highest importance to himself and me—our wives and little ones. And I hope that he will see and FEEL and ACT UPON the fundamental principles which I shall attempt to explain in the simplicity of that truth which, I trust, influences me, so that we may go to work together to defend ourselves in the right to "pursue our own happiness," while duly respecting the rights of all other men. We claim no monopolies—we ask no exclusive privileges—but, being by far the majority, we claim the natural and reasonable exercise of our power, so to mould the government as may best, in our own opinion, promote the "general welfare." We will not suffer the minority to construe the constitution, at its will. Mr. MADISON tells us, (what must needs have been the case) that this constitution was formed to protect the industry of the American people; and we intend to insist that this element of the confederacy shall be observed—SHALL BE OBSERVED.

As it is probable that the present essay may be followed by three others on dependent subjects,* and that

*One specially addressed to farmers, on the benefits of the "home market," and internal improvements—the savings made in the cost of transportations being first and most extensively felt by themselves. With comparisons and statistical facts, as well relating to the condition of farmers in other countries, as the advantages derived from having our "work shops at home" where the products of agriculture may be consumed, and the amount of such productions be brought to equalize itself to the demand—insuring reasonable compensations to farmers, but preventing gluts, and very reduced prices.

A second more especially for mechanics—including all the trades working in metals, wood, leather, furs or cloth, &c. in supplying materials and building and furnishing houses, &c. pointing out the protection which they have directly received, or its happy results, leading these articles may fall into the hands of numerous persons who are strangers to the leading principles on which I have acted for many years past, it may be proper in this place to offer a few remarks, to obtain, if I can, some portion of the confidence of my readers in the sincerity of my opinions, and the verity of the facts which I shall offer to their consideration.

Every body has heard the story of the poor Irishman, who having had too much to do with the "cratur," fell out of his bed—but promised to get in again when he could catch it, as it flew round the room! "Pat" is made the butt of many a joke—yet there are not a few Jonathans who have thought that a tree or a post left its location, to run against them! But many tens of thousands have been, and are, intoxicated from other causes than the immoderate use of distilled liquors. Politics produce more intemperance in the United States than whiskey—and political drunkenness causes many to believe that beds, as it were, whirl round the room, or trees leave their roots, wickedly to knock down harmless persons—the obliquity of their vision making them suppose that a ~~~~~~~~~~, "worm fence," or snake's course, is a [redacted] bold straight line! And hence I well know that some have been prevented from giving me a patient hearing, because that my opinions—(entertained when the "greatest and best" public men of the day were as obscure and humble as myself)—are dictatorially pronounced, by drunken or profligate politicians, as belonging to the transient disputes about persons to preside over or direct the affairs of this nation. It is the business of these, "whole" gallon generals and half-gill captains, to intoxicate thoughtless persons, and so lead them through all the filth of furious party—holding any thing lawful which may accomplish the desired end—a senseless and unreflecting vote at elections. Most of these do know, or at least ought to know, that such proceedings are dishonest towards me. But "all's fair in politics," says the contemptible thing at N. York, who fills a high office under the U. States, and manufactures paragraphs to serve any party to which, for the time being, he may happen to belong, and, with the rest of his "herd," will laugh at any deception, any rank falsehood, or foul corruption, that subserves the party, and fills his pocket,—the rights of things being measured by the amount of "grist which they bring to his own mill." On this account, I take leave to repeat (and abundant proof of the truth of the assertion exists in all my writings), that the elements of every opinion that I now hold, as to the justice and necessity of protecting the labor of the American people, that "none, may go supperless to bed," were just as well, and as firmly established in my mind, when in the 20th year of my age, as at present, having passed my 53d. And it will be seen, that in all the "changes of circumstance and time," I have never wavered—never passed for one moment to the right or to the left, from the leading principles which I embraced in my youth—that, as labor was the source of all wealth, those who labored were the primary concern of every wise and paternal government. To take care of these—or rather, to enable them to "manage their own concerns in their own way," is the true reading of the words "PURSUIT OF HAPPINESS," which the sages of the revolution regarded as one of the "unalienable rights" of all men.

"What constitutes a state?
Not high raised battlement or labour'd mound,
Thick wall or moated gate;
Not cities proud with spires and turrets crown'd;
Not bays and broad-arm'd ports,
Where, laughing at the storm, rich navies ride,
Not star'd and spangled courts,
Where low-brow'd baseness wafts perfume to pride.
No:—MEN, HIGH MINDED MEN,
With powers as far above dull brutes endued
In forest, brake, or den,
As beasts excel cold rocks and brambles rude;
Men who their duties know
But know their rights, and knowing DARE MAINTAIN,
Prevent the long aim'd blow,
And crush the tyrant while they rend the chain:
THESE CONSTITUTE A STATE. Sir William Jones.

I have only to add, that no projects of politicians or "humbugs" of the day, now abounding, shall divert me from the course that I have so long pursued—and I should feel myself a traitor, if abandoning those opinions, the yet partial operation of which has so powerfully increased the population and wealth—and the means of present comfort, (sweetened by the hope of "happiness") in my own native land.

I shall now proceed practically to shew what the congress of seventy-six meant by the words "PURSUIT OF HAPPINESS."

There is no country under heaven wherein the free working people live so well, and so rapidly advance their fortunes, as in the United States—and it will be because of their own fatal indifference, if they do not always maintain that high ground which separates them from the "white slaves" of the old world, or black working-machines of the new. Let every man look around him and see from whence came the most wealthy and useful of his neighbors. He will find that many, perhaps a large majority of the richest, and bearing the reputation of honorable men, were humble plough-boys, plain mechanics, or poor day-laborers. Let him also enter into the dwellings of those who get labor every day, and he will find a plentiful supply of all the necessaries of life, many of the comforts, and some of the luxuries, within the premises or subject to the command of the prudent and industrious poor. There are some exceptions because of sickness, or other casualties—but it may be generally said, without the fear of contradiction or shadow of a doubt, that every man, able and willing to labor, has, or may have, as much of the best bread and meat as his family can consume, with a sufficiency of decent clothing, good shelter from the weather, and a full supply of fuel. So much must be conceded. And can it be believed, that there is a large and powerful party in this country, which would deny such rightful enjoyments to industry—that would send the laborer "supperless to bed?" THERE IS SUCH A PARTY! They are those who call themselves "friends of free trade"—while not knowing that such a thing as "free trade" exists; preaching against the laws of their own land, which protect the working people in their several employments, and are yet mean enough to recommend that we should consume British calicoes, though Britain will not receive our best superfine flour in exchange for the least important of the products of her labor—nor accept a hogshead of Virginia hams in part pay for a keg of Jews-harps! This party, this "free trade party"—in some of the states called "THE republican party" (though every British agent is a member of it), would put down the working people of the United States to the condition of those in Great Britain and Ireland—where 16 hours labor in every 24 will not secure to a man's family a sufficiency of "herriogs and potatoes," with a little oat-meal, to make a thin gruel for breakfast—meat being hardly seen once in a week within the miserable tenements which they inhabit. But this is not all—these British semi-paupers have no hope of bettering their condition, at home. As they themselves wear out a weary life of base servitude and scanty subsistence—so must their children. As they are ignorant, and rejected from what are called the respectable classes of society—so must their descendants be! Ne sutor ultra crepidam—"let the cobbler stick to his last," is stamped upon the forehead of every British laborer—though now and then one of them rescues himself from his caste, and takes rank among his fellow beings as a MAN! And what is the result of all this? About a seventh or eighth part of the whole population are ACTUAL paupers—hard-worked and yet not filled with the cheapest and coarsest food, such offals as a free laborer's dog rejects with scorn in America. This is only a faint outline of things as they are in to the manufacture of better articles at reduced prices, while the working people have received more liberal wages, or at least more regular employment, because that the home market has been secured for their benefit.

The third on the circulation of values—to shew how contemptible in amount is the foreign trade compared with the interior, or every day's commerce between different persons—of the life and spirit which it gives to all sorts of business, and the utter impossibility that our nation can prosper without a vigorous "circulation of values."

Great Britain and Ireland. It is notorious, that the working people, in large districts of that country, are often almost in a state of starvation—though the poor-houses had before relieved from ten to twenty-three* of every hundred of the gross population! It is difficult for the full-fed American to apprehend a condition so miserable—but it is often officially made known to us through the British papers. And withal, this remarkable fact is presented—a fact which we desire may be carefully remembered—the distress is generally more severe, more awful, in the agricultural than in the manufacturing counties. Can the farmers of the rich lands of Loudoun, in Virginia, Frederick in Maryland, Lancaster, in Pennsylvania, Munroe, in New York, Berkshire, in Massachusetts, &c. &c. &c. believe it possible that more than one half of all their inhabitants could be actually suffering for want of a sufficiency of potatoes, turnips, or cabbages, or other like vegetables—or such meats as sheep's-heads and trotters, to keep life a-going? Yet such has been, and is, the case in British and Irish counties,† as much blest by nature, and in a much higher state of cultivation, than those just above named. The laborers in husbandry in England, are regarded as among the most unhealthy classes!—and entirely because their means of subsistence are inadequate to their wants!!—as observed by Mr. Thackrah, a late and highly esteemed British writer on health. He says—"A man who has himself, his wife and family to support on twelve or sixteen shillings a week, cannot be well fed. Hence this body of men are far less robust in figure, than we should expect from the nature of their employ. They are subject to disorders of the digestive organs, and generally suffer also greatly from epidemics." The average, fourteen shillings a week, at the present rate of exchange, is equal to about 340 cents in the United States, and the cost of provisions and house rent almost twice as much as like American laborers are charged for like things. And thus "the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn is muzzled." Those who plough, and sow and reap the wheat, are not allowed to consume one grain of it. And why are these things—aye, why is there so much misery in the land of our ancestors? I will tell you, my friends: it is because the British working people have suffered their kings and lords and gentry and priests to manage the affairs of government, and divide the profits on labor at their own will; and they, poor things, intoxicated with politics, and rejoicing in the result of battles in which they had no interest, except because of the slaughter of some of their brothers or children!—have thrown up their old and ragged and greasy caps and huzzaed for general, the duke of Wellington, to whom four millions of dollars of their money had been given by a parliament in which they were not represented—and who, with his legion-family, his mother and children, uncles and aunts, brothers and sisters, brothers-in-law by the half dozen, cousins by the score, and the sons of accommodating women, so far as he has them, or holds an interest in them,* are fattened at the public crib, being "splendid paupers," at a known cost to the people of about two hundred and sixty thousand dollars a year; and no small part of this latter enormous sum is totally independent of services rendering by any of the family, and also fastened in perpetuity on British labor. These sums together, (the latter estimated at 4 per cent. interest, the highest value of money in England), make a capital of more than ten millions of dollars, bestowed on one successful general, wring from the wretched and hungered and naked and shoe-less "white slaves" of Great Britain and Ireland. And what "flourishes of trumpets" have we had, when the British government, out of its great humanity, has granted a twentieth part of such sum, in any one year, to relieve thousands from actual starvation! Even now, we just learn that the king of England's wife, Adelaide, (who, by the bye, seems to be a very good sort-of-a-woman), is greatly lauded in the British papers, because that she has given up some small portion of the enormous amount of the people's money, (which she receives only because she happened to marry William Henry Guelph), to the relief of the hungry population of several counties in Ireland—a less sum, perhaps, than has been expended at a single evening's entertainment in her house—or else, perchance, has been paid for green peas, peaches, or other like important articles, provided for one meal. And, while the public charity is thus excited, by piteous tales of excessive suffering of whole families swept to the grave for want of food—the "half pay and retired allowances" paid in Britain in 1830, were as follows:

Navy,	1,531,646	17	11¾
Ordnance,	357,090	0	0
Civil department,	485,370	18	7
Total,	5,313,714	6	0¾

Now, this is more than twenty-five millions of dollars—or about fifteen millions more than the whole regular expenditures of the United States, payments made for the reduction of the public debt excepted. Here is, indeed, an army of "paupers."

We have thus shewn the real condition of the working classes with whom the "free trade party" in the United States would compel our working people to contend! I shall not mince the matter—such would be the effect of a demolition of the "AMERICAN SYSTEM." What!—shall the "high minded men" of these states, "who know their rights," not "DARE" maintain them?—Shall these be placed in COMPETITION with the squallid poverty and excessive toil of British laborers? Not until "the Ethiopian changes his skin," and our farmers, mechanics and manufacturers repudiate their present wives and intermarry with black wenches! Admit, for the sake of the argument, that an Englishman, who has oat-meal gruel for his breakfast, a few boiled potatoes, and, perchance, a part of a sheep's head for dinner, and no supper—can make a pair of shoes, a hat, or a coat, a spade or a yard of cloth, cheaper than an American, who has his well sweetened bowl of hot coffee, with an ample quantity of bread and butter, and a cut of ham, or something else to give a relish to his breakfast—who, at his dinner eats just as much good beef, veal, mutton, lamb or pork, as he can, or desires to have†—and partakes of a plentiful supper every evening of tea or milk, with a huge loaf of bread, a big pie, and a chunck of meat before him, all saying "cut and come again"—

SHALL THE LATTER BE REDUCED TO THE SUBSISTENCE OF THE FORMER, FOR THE BENEFIT OF "FREE TRADE?"

* Even so long ago as 1815, according to Dr. Colquhoun, 20 in every 100 of the whole population of Oxford, 21 in Berkshire, and 23 in Sussex and Wilts, were PAUPERS—and these are agricultural counties!

† The following extract from a letter, addressed to earl Grey, by the right rev. Dr. Machall, a Roman Catholic bishop, gives a frightful picture of the sufferings of the poor of the west of Ireland. "Famine," he says, "is extending its ravages in Mayo, and it is, my lord, my painful duty (adds the writer) to communicate through you to his majesty's government, that already some lives have become victims of that calamity. On last week, having visited a distant parish of the diocess, I learned the afflicting news that contagion, the effect of want, prevailed to a great extent; that in one instance, the father, mother, and three children, were stretched on the same bed, without a morsel of nourishment, or a penny to procure it, or a human being to go in quest of relief, but as it was administered by the casual visits of some charitable neighbors; and that the first intimation the father received of the death of his wife, was the lips of the sucking babe being besmeared with the blood, which instead of milk, it extracted from the breast of its deceased mother.'

* The duke of Wellington's family, however, is not the only one in England provided for in this manner—nor is England the only country in which such things have happened!

†Yes—and he takes his meat before his pudding or pie—not using the last first that his appetite may be cloyed! He lays a solid foundation in his stomach, and on that builds up as much of the lighter jim-crack or extra articles as he can!

Herein is the REAL MERITS of the great question at issue—but no British agent or pattern-card man in America—none of our own "philosophers," have yet had the AUDACITY to say, SUCH IS THE AIM AND THE END OF THEIR PURPOSES. The man who is vile enough to contrive such an issue, should have impudence sufficient to avow it! But in these severe remarks—caused in part, perhaps, by a selfish regard, being of the working class, (as are my adult children),—I do not mean to include all—no, not nearly all, the partizans of what is called "free trade:" for I cannot believe that a plain and practical representation of the operation of their theories has ever offered itself to their minds. But I do know there are some, themselves, perhaps, old oystermen, hod-carriers or pin-pedlars, or the immediate descendants of scavengers, who effect to despise laboring people, and regret that they "wax fat" and become "saucy!" And these creatures, though only, in themselves, worthy of being held up as objects for "Scorn to point her slow unmoving finger at," ☞ have great influence over the public mind, and use it—to prevent others from reaching that grade in society which they fancy has been gained for themselves! These are chiefly selected to give the hurrah at electioneering meetings—and it is the "HURRAH BOYS," who, (in the opinion of a late great public functionary), decide questions of the deepest interest! But these may yet discover that a belly-full of hurrahs would be a very cold supper to sleep on, and not afford much refreshment for the labors of the ensuing day! I say—that every industrious and prudent American has a RIGHT to live well—and that this is the true meaning of the "natural and unaleniable right" involved in the words, "pursuit of happiness," as used in the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE!

But though excusing a majority of the "free trade party" as I have done—this charge I seriously prefer against all; that they affect a regard for a thing which is not—which, in the very nature of things, cannot be. Where is "FREE TRADE?" It belongs not to the past or present condition of society—but when the MILLENNIUM comes, and the lamb shall lie down with the lion, when food and clothing will no more be needed, there may be "free trade"—that is, no restrictive laws! But such laws must and will exist until the dispositions and the wants, and the public and private requisitions on labor (as the only true measure of value), shall be equal upon the nations and kingdoms and states of the civilized world. The peaceful Quaker says "resist not evil,"—but will he buy any thing which he can make, unless he can sell his own productions? Nay—he will shut himself up, and divert some portion of the labor of his family, say to the spinning of wool and knitting of stockings, which his ill-natured neighbor will not give him in exchange for bread. Here is the "restrictive system," in its fullest extent. The Quaker says—"Neighbor Bull, my wife and children are badly off for stockings—and I desire to obtain some of thee. My farm produceth not silver nor gold—but I have a plenty of fine white wheat flour—rye, corn and potatoes. I will allow thee thy asking price for the stockings, and sell thee flour, or grain, at half the price which thou art now paying for it—and so let us exchange labor." But stocking-weaver Bull roars out, "you and your grain may go to ——, Mr. Ephraim Broadbrim! Mind your own business, sir—your suggestions are impertinent! Your wife and children shall go bare-legged, unless you bring me gold or silver." "Now that's hard," the Quaker would return, "but I pray thee, friend Bull, do not put thyself in a passion. Keep, or eat thy stockings, as shall be most agreeable to thyself—they are thine to do what thou wilt with them. And as thou pleaseth not to trade with me, I must so contrive it as to do without thee. Farewell, neighbor Bull." And then the Quaker, "as stiff as a pike-staff," but without feeling any spirit of resentment, retires. Whereupon old Bull leaves his counter to abuse Ephraim, and calls him a "monopolist," an "extortioner," a "rogue," and a "thief"—and curses him because he seeks "exclusive privileges"—and all Bull's calves, big and little, horned or not horned, white, black or brindle, bellow in chorus, "free trade—no restrictions—free trade," and sing the glories of the stocking weaver! But the Quaker, though somewhat disturbed by the catfish din, looks not back—he proceeds "straight-way to his own house," wherein dwelleth peace and plenty, cheerful hearts, bright faces and willing hands—that he may counsel with his "help-mate." And when Jemima learns the issue of the proposed trade with neighbor Bull, she says—"Well, good Ephraim, I must say that this does not look clever, but let it not grieve thee," as she raises her spectacles and casts a kind look at her husband. "If thou wilt spare a little of thy wheat and corn-land, to pasture sheep and make hay to keep them in the winter, I'll be bound that none of us shall want stockings." AND SO IT IS SETTLED. To proceed with our subject.

Let us first understand what is price, and what is value? Many persons apprehend these terms to be synonymous, and they may be so—but they are as often as different in their bearings as the antipodes. There are two men on a desolate and desert island—one has a bag of potatoes, the other a bag of diamonds. The potatoes have value, because they will sustain life—the diamonds, in themselves, are worth nothing, having neither price nor value. But if the two agree to divide the bags equally, the owner of the potatoes obtains his price, and he that possessed the diamonds gets value. If the bag of potatoes is sufficient to subsist both until relieved by some passing vessel,—both may have made a good bargain; but if both perish for lack of food, though the supply might have sustained one of them, the owner of the potatoes, so far as he made merchandize of his property, dies the death of a fool—yet, as a man he should have equalized his valuable stock with his unfortunate fellow. Price is something—any thing, money or goods, and depends on exchanges—value has no indispensable relation to price or exchange. A starved rat sold for a guinea on board the Jersey prison ship,—the crimes committed in which vessel were almost enough to sink a nation, and will yet be avenged! Five or six cents is the price of a day's labor in parts of the East Indies—but cannot be the value of one in the United States, because the laborer would perish were only so much means of subsistence afforded—as well on account of the different prices of provisions, as because of the kinds used, and the totally different habits of persons. These habits enter nearly as much into the value of commodities, as commodities themselves are necessary to sustain life. By habit, the East Indian lives on a little rice and water—the Irishman on potatoes—the Spaniard on a spoonful of rancid oil, a crust of black bread and a root of garlic—the Esquimaux on the raw blubber of a whale!—and with enough of these, and other small occasional supplies, either may reach long life; but place a Pennsylvania farmer under such a diet, and he must soon be almost starved! He would think, and think, and think—and soon make his public servants accountable for the adversity which they had brought upon him, in discarding and consigning them to the infamy of unfaithful agents of the people's will—as traitors to the "general welfare" of the American people.

It is well known to most readers, that it is the practice of English noblemen, gentry and clergy, when their estates become embarrassed because of their gluttony in vice, to retire to France—and, by residing there, recruit their fortunes; though living quite as well, and keeping up the same pomp and parade, and style, in all things, (gambling excepted), which they observed at home. There is nothing mystical in this. Thirty British sovereigns, or pounds, will purchase as much of the general necessaries, comforts or luxuries of life—and go as far in the indulgence of most of the vices, as one hundred sovereigns in Britain. The value of a bushel of wheat, or gallon of wine, is the same in both countries—but the price differs 70 per cent. Hence it is utterly impossible that a "free trade" can exist between France and Britain—that the latter can exchange day's labor, as determined by its true value, the cost of subsistence, with the former, unless absolute beggary ensues. A bushel of wheat which costs only 30 pence sterling in France, contains the same nutriment as a bushel of wheat which costs 100 in Britain. Regarding wheat then, as a measure of the cost of subsistence, a Frenchman, having equal industry and skill, may make a pair of shoes, for example, just as well for 15*d.* as a Briton can for 50*d.* Thus we see that they cannot exchange bread-stuffs, or SHOES. Britain, because of the plentifulness of her coal and iron, and the mighty extent of her scientific power or labor-saving machinery, would gladly furnish France with iron and all its chief manufactures—but France forbids the supply, because French bread cannot be exchanged for British iron, and on account of the necessity that prevails of making a home-market for the products of French agriculture. And there is yet another and a prouder reason that influences France: iron and its chief manufactures are indispensable to the NATIONAL DEFENCE, and it is impossible that even a half-witted government can yield up THAT to the casualties and caprices of a FOREIGN POWER.* And the natural operation is—that, though the French farmer may pay something more for the small quantity of iron which he needs, it is many times refunded to him in the enhanced price of his grain—the nearest, and what should be the best foreign market for his surplus, being sealed against him. France has no right to complain because the British people are compelled to pay to their own farmers twice or thrice as much for bread as it costs in France; nor has Britain to be offended because that France protects her own manufactures of iron—such restrictive laws being absolutely requisite to the preservation of the national independence of each, or, at least, to support the SYSTEMS OF GOVERNMENT which they have respectively adopted.

*There is yet another reason, and hardly less important, in times of peace. Since this article was written, we learn that the transportation of merchandize on the Morris, (New Jersey) canal has been interrupted—and, as we are informed, by the breaking of the English iron chain on the inclined plane at Borneton. This chain was one and an eighth inch in diameter—and yet broke six times, while an American chain, only three-fourths of an inch in diameter, which had been used to lengthen the English one, held on like a true "Buck-skin," and stood the trial of passing the boat, when the other gave way. And yet we are told that this same English chain when imported, was accompanied with certificates and affidavits of its adequate strength—and that it had been fully tested by a powerful machine which is provided for such purposes. This singularly contradicts certain statements made before the senate at the last session of congress, as to the unfitness of American iron for chain cables!

Well—and is this canal to remain useless because the English chain has not performed the duty required of it? No—not yet; such a thing will not happen until the workers in iron in the United States are "reformed" into persons not having a sufficiency of food, and their employers are "punished" with ruin—that we may be dependent on the tender mercies of Great Britain, for plough-shares, horse-shoes, scythes, sickles, spades, shovels,—swords, guns and cannon, because she makes iron cheaper than we do, or that it breaks the more easily! We have heard that John Bull has sent us cast-iron bridle bits! What does he care if the brains of thousands are knocked out in a month, if he makes a good profit on his fraudulently manufactured wares? It is here a good place to remark, that no British manufacturer for the home market, would DARE attempt such impositions. His logwood blue cloths and cast iron bridle bits are good enough for the "Yankees"—if they will sell. I wonder that some Englishman has not thought of sending us a cargo of members of congress!

Two of the most prominent opponents of a protecting tariff in the United States are two full-blood ENGLISHMEN: the famous Dr. Cooper, and a new man named Sarchett, of Philadelphia; put forward to instruct the people of the United States how to manage their affairs, and hugged into greatness by general Hayne, who commands the nullifiers, and others. Couldn't these gentlemen find an American worthy of being honored with senatorial enquiries, concerning so great an interest as the iron manufacture? "It looks queer!"

We are willing to extend, and have always extended, the right hand of fellowship to all persons seeking a home in our land—if conducting themselves peaceably; but must confess that we do hate to see strangers interfering with our concerns, before the shoes in which they came to us are yet worn out.

In further explanation of the leading facts suggested, we offer below a very interesting table. It appears to have been carefully made up—and, though many of the facts stated must rest chiefly on opinion, notwithstanding the great extent of statistical knowledge in both France and Britain, we have no hesitation in believing that, as a whole, it must be accepted as correct. We earnestly exhort our readers to dwell a little while on this table, and carefully to consider the few remarks that shall be made upon it.

The following, copied from a late number of the Messager des Chambres, presents a comparative view of the production and consumption of France and England.

Every item in this table is full of interest—as well to the philosophic statesman as to the reflecting workingman. It abounds with instruction of the most important kind—for it has a general relation to the first principles of political economy—THE SUBSISTENCE AND COMFORT OF MAN. But there are only some parts of the table that are directly useful to our present purpose—which is to dissolve the baseless visions about FREEDOM IN TRADE, in the present state of the world. We are not called upon to consider what should be—but must take THINGS AS THEY ARE.

1. The cultivator in France produces a money-value of only 246 francs—say 45 dollars a year, and in Britain, of 609 francs, or 114 dollars: and yet the QUANTITY, (because of the excessive relative number of "individual proprietors" in France, as every man is supposed to be the best manager of his own affairs), produced by each cultivator, may not have any important average difference. Here is a strong exemplification of what has been said of price and value.

2. Each inhabitant of France consumes of the products of agriculture the money-value of 141 francs, or 26 dollars a year; and in Britain of 242 francs, or 46 dollars. These plainly shew that the French live much better than the British, or at least as well, though at only a little more than half the money-cost, or price, of subsistence in Britain.

3. But, and notwithstanding this great difference in the cost of subsistence, each French manufacturer produces an annual value of 286 francs, or $53 62, and the British manufacturer produces only 316 francs, or $59 25.

4. And yet—though the fact is well known that the French people are quite as well clothed and supplied with manufactured articles as the British, the former consumes only the annual money-value of 48 francs, or 9 dollars, but the other requires the value of 125 francs, or $23 43. This great difference in the cost of clothing, &c. more results from the different habits of the two nations, than because of any essential difference in the cost of commodities—the fashions as well as the wants of the two people not being the same. And besides, the generally more mild climate of France has a very material effect on these comparative items.

5. The vast home market which France possesses is seen in the quantity of lands cultivated and the amount of agricultural produce exported, as compared with those items in Britain; and so much is the industry of the French people guarded, that this market may be kept lively—that only 38 millions of francs, or the value of 7½ millions of dollars worth of manufactured articles were imported in 1828—the latest return that we can just now refer to.

The hectare is equal to 2,473,614 English acres—that is, very nearly 2½ acres. In France as there are 127 millions of acres being cultivated and the gross population 32 millions, it appears that nearly four acres of land are in use for every individual—but in Britain, the population being 22 millions, and the land in cultivation only 50 millions, there are only 2 3 acres for every individual. The cultivation in Britain is more close and severe, and the crops of heavier kinds than those of France—the vine covering large tracts in the latter, and much being given up to gardens and orchards, &c. The human agricultural power, added to that of horses, oxen, asses, &c. in France, is estimated as equal to that of 37 millions of persons—the same in Britain at 24 millions. The commercial and manufacturing power of each is put down at nearly the same—say equal to the labor of 4½ millions of men; Britain, though of a much smaller population than France, having a larger proportion of scientific power, which is considered in the account.

I might make many important additions to bear upon the points aimed at, but fear as well to render this article too long, as to confuse or divert some of my readers from the great question under consideration—which is this: that a Briton, the price of whose subsistence and clothing is 367 francs, or 67 dollars a year, CANNOT COME INTO COMPETITION, "by free trade" with a Frenchman, whose subsistence and clothing has a price of only 189 francs, or 35 dollars a year. Whatever there are of exchanges between these must be regulated by arbitrary circumstances,—such as the use of labor-saving machinery;—for manual labor in each, being equally productive in quantity, the Briton must work 67 hours, days or weeks, to obtain as much of the necessaries of life, as a Frenchman will earn in 35 hours, days or weeks.

Again—the average amount of British revenue for several years past, may be stated at about 50 millions of pounds, and the tythes and poor rates are equal to 15 millions more, together 65,000,000 pounds, or say 290 millions of dollars—which is equal to 13 dollars per head for every inhabitant of Great Britain and Ireland. In France the annual public revenue, (applicable to the same purposes as in Britain), has an average of about 930 millions of francs, or 175 millions of dollars—equal to 5½ dollars for every inhabitant of France. Thus, while a British laborer and his family, in all, 6 persons, must in some way pay 78 dollars a year to his government, a Frenchman, with a like family, pays only 33 dollars. Now this difference of payment, in itself, would be great profit to French laborers, could they make "free" exchanges with British laborers.

Further—though the value of a bushel of wheat cannot be greater in Britain than in France, it is indispensable to the preservation of the British system of government that its price should be FORCED up—and hence the obnoxious and oppressive corn laws. The chief part of the disbursements of Britain have a determinate money-value—the public debt bears a certain per centum, the salaries and all other regular payments of the king and royal family, placemen and pensioners, priests and soldiers and sailors, &c. &c. are so many pounds and shillings; so also, is a large part of the rents of lands, lots and houses. Hence the chief products of British industry consumed at home, must needs be enhanced in price, that such money-amounts may be produced. We may easily shew this—a certain tract of land in England is subject to the annual payment of 100 pounds a year, for taxes, rates, tythes or rent. When wheat is at 10*s.* a bushel, the cultivator makes his payments with 200 bushels, and all else that he has yet to spare bears a proportionate high price; but the growing even of 300 bushels of wheat in a better season, when the price falls to 5*s.* (as it necessarily will because of an excess quantity in market), he must fall short 25 pounds in his payments, and all his barley, oats, potatoes, &c. will suffer the same rate of reduced price. And what is the consequence? Why, the farmer is ruined. A few years ago, so abundant was the crop of wheat in England, that several cargoes arrived in the United States and were sold at a profit, after paying the charges of freight, &c. with our duty on wheat: but the effect of this plenty was terrible to British cultivators—many tens of thousands of them were sold out, or bankrupted, and the jails were literally crammed with them, so much so that the grand juries, or other persons having authority, in numerous cases, took it upon themselves to forbid the reception of further inmates, lest they might perish because of their crowded condition! Such a scene of distress as this plenty produced, was hardly ever before witnessed in England, because of a failure of the crops! Provisions were plenty—but there was a want of money to buy them. Britain, then, never can admit of "free trade," until she wipes off her national debt, and discharges her hosts of placemen and pensioners and government-priests.

But Britain will very gladly have "free trade" IF other nations will permit her to prescribe the articles to be exchanged! "Are you there, Old Truepenny?" To a proposition of this kind, the French director of the customs, M. de St. Criq, made the following sagacious and cutting remarks, the British having proposed a mutual reduction of duties on certain things. "The system adopted by England is admirable, because it endangers none of HER MANUFACTURES. And we, when we are as forward as England, will be as LIBERAL! But until then, WE MUST STAND FAST BY OUR PROHIBITORY SYSTEMS."

It is impudent—supremely impudent, in Britain to "palaver" about "free trade" while prohibiting the importation and consumption of foreign bread-stuffs, though to be obtained at half the price of her own, and having the same real value: it is mean and selfish, or base and dastardly, in Americans, to yield to Britain the right of selecting what she will receive of the United States and in what manner,—while willing to swallow whatever she pleases to send us,—"Waterloo stripes" or London mincing cockneys—cloths made out of old clothes, or drab-gaitered Yorkshire swearers at the custom house—cargoes of paupers to be maintained at the expense of our pockets, or emissaries with "lots of books" to teach us the beauties of "free trade!" If she treated our cotton growers as she uses our farmers—general Hayne would issue a decree of nullification against Great Britain "in less than no time," and drive "the fast anchored isle from her moorings," by a long speech!—if seconded by the reputed author of the "East Room letter!"

And now a few words by way of application and exhortation, and I shall hasten to close this "too-long" essay—though the stock of materials for such a discussion seems hardly yet reduced in quantity.

We feel entirely able to shew, that the progress of manufacturing industry has had a powerful effect to reduce the price of like commodities imported. This is the natural result of competition. It is like two lines of steam boats or stages, presenting themselves for the public patronage. We also feel able to shew,—and would shew it, but because of the length of this article,—that the prices of all such British manufactures as are not rivalled in the United States, very nearly maintain their old prices. Take a simple and familiar case to exemplify British impositions. A little while ago, the British charged us 70 dollars a thousand for "fire brick," an indispensable article in certain manufactures, and very useful in the common business of life. The Messrs. Berry, of Baltimore, entered upon a series of experiments, and soon produced fire brick at least equal to the best English Stourbridge. The cost of making such brick has not been materially affected in England—no new and better clay, no new power, has been applied to their manufacture—but those who thus had swindled us when they had the game in their own hands, are now willing to take 30 dollars a thousand for their brick—that being the honest and fair American price of them: but I have the pleasure to say, that the foreign extortioners have been indignantly driven from our market, by the superiority and cheapness of the American manufacture. This is one example out of many that I have at my "fingers' ends," to shew the benefits of competition—and the practice of Englishmen so to regulate supplies that the profits gained may be enormous. Such, however, is the spirit of trade,---and we must not condemn it, except on account of English hypocricy—which recommends that "commerce should be relieved of its shackles!" My rough notion is---that that man is a scoundrel who asks me to do for him, what he himself would not do for me, in the same circumstances; and yet as to brick, the duty in "free trade" England is equal to 540 cents a thousand, for the most common kinds, or the average of their usual selling price in the United States. In looking over the British tariff, I could not refrain from a contemptuous sneer at some of the "free trade" members of congress, who objected to the specifications of articles contained in the tariff of 1824—especially at the observations of a certain gubernatorial gentleman, remarkable for never getting into such a "passion" as would make old CHUONONHOTONTHOJOGOS, tremble like an aspen! The specifications of duties on goods imported into Great Britain, fill seventy octavo pages, of small type—and we notice that even "Bull-rushes" have a specific duty of so much the "load, of 63 bundles"—12*s*! and oysters pay 33 cents the bushel! We have not time even to laugh at such "free trade" things; but may just notice, en passant, that 29,000,000 lbs. of tobacco, worth much less than two millions of dollars in the United States, paid a consumption duty in Britain last year of 2,938,050*l*. 10*s*. 10*d*. or more than thirteen millions of dollars.

I shall admit for the sake of the argument, if it best pleases our "philosophers," that a Briton can make a pair of shoes, or a hat, or a coat—a cradle, or a coffin or a hobby horse———a ton of iron or a piece of cloth, cheaper than an American will make them! But it must be admitted that an American makes a bushel of wheat, rye, barley or oats—a gallon of whiskey or cider, a pound of beef, veal, mutton or pork, much cheaper than an Englishman can make them. Shall we then, take of Britain those things, being the common products of both countries, which she can supply at lower prices, while she rejects those which we can furnish at half those prices which her own like commodities cost the people of Britain? We put this question seriously to the farmers, mechanics and manufacturers of the United States—while we have to express a hope that they will not feel insulted with us for offering a proposition, which partakes so strongly as the modesty of that member of congress, who reported the coasting vessels of Great Britain at near nine millions of tons, to depreciate this business in his own country, though it is not much less than that of his glorious Britain; and, because of the extension of internal improvements, is about to exceed it—will far exceed it, in a very few years.

To conclude—the free working people of the United States, the bone and sinew of the republic, live well—better, much better, than their own class in any part of the world; and what is yet more important, there is no industrious and prudent man among us, (it may be generally said) who does not look forward with confidence to arrive at what his moderate wishes regard a state of independence. Here is the glory of our country! "FORWARD" is every American's motto! This spirit diffuses itself through all society. Consider the poor and wretched emigrant who arrives on our shores, exhausted and penyless—flying that he may have bread for himself and his children, which he dared not hope for in his native land. His mind has been as rudely dealt with as his body—he is stupidly ignorant, and "oppression hath made him mad!" Follow him, if a sober and industrious person, for only two or three years—and behold the happy change! He already begins to feel that he is a man—he walks erect, and has a hundred little comforts in constant enjoyment, which were "like angels visits, few and far between," in the country of his birth. He has begun to reason, and calculates the future!—An ample subsistence being supplied, he soon feels the want of education, and even now is resolved that his children shall go to school. He is regenerated—disenthralled; the blackness of despair which had steadily surrounded him, has been dispersed by the sun of liberty—the actual want of food which stared him in the face every morning, serves only to remind him of the blessings which flow from a flourishing industry, moderate taxation and just laws. Follow this man yet a little further—and you may find him seated in a comfortable house of his own, pursuing his trade—or see him, conscious of his own powers, treading a portion of the soil which his heart exultingly tells him is his own.* And shall these be cast back into the suffering that they fled from—shall the price of labor be depressed in America, that her free-born sons may contend with the enslaved population of Europe? Here is the question! Let every working man answer it for himself. Let him examine this matter, and he will find "confirmation strong as proofs from holy writ," that, with the destruction of our manufactures must follow the ruin of our farmers, and general distress to all the laboring people—that capital will flee away, confidence be lost, and all sorts of improvement, such as the building of houses, factories and shops, and the making of roads and canals, be suddenly checked—THAT ONE LINK IN THE GREAT CHAIN OF OUR PROSPERITY BEING BROKEN, THE BEAUTIFUL SYSTEM WILL FALL TO THE GROUND.

Answer this question at the polls, working men! I ask you not to vote for this man or that man, or any particular man—but this I exhort and entreat you to do—by all that is good for the nation, by all that is beneficial for yourselves, to give your suffrages to no human being who does not stand broadly pledged, manfully and honestly "committed," and unquestionably devoted, to the preservation of the AMERICAN SYSTEM—the fountain of public wealth, the guarantee of private comfort—proclaiming plenty and securing peace—offering relief to the oppressed of all nations, and establishing the independence of these United States.

I am your friend,

H. NILES, printer.

RIOT ON THE RAIL ROAD. Until too late to supply the omission, it did not occur to us that an article concerning the riot last week on the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, &c. had not been prepared—but so far as needful for record, the affair shall be attended to in our next paper. The facts simply are, that one of the contractors having absconded without paying his workmen their wages, on a section of the road 25 or 26 miles from Baltimore, the laborers, (all Irishmen, we believe), attempted to redress their wrongs by doing all the injury to the road, by destroying the rails, &c. that they could! Their number was so large and their leaders so outrageous, that a military force was called out, which, promptly arriving at the scene of operations, quieted the rioters without bloodshed, and marched about sixty of them to town to be dealt with according to law. The damages sustained are of a large amount. The chiefs, we trust, will obtain the full benefit of the law—but their poor and ignorant followers have been, or will be, chiefly excused. These men must be taught that force cannot be thus applied in this country.

---

* Until this part was in type, it never occurred to me that I had so closely followed the ideas contained in the following extract from a letter from KOSCIUSKO to JOHN DICKINSON, dated November 29, 1785.

"In travelling through the remote parts of your continent, I learn how to compare the lives of your farmers with those of the patriarchs. It is there that misery discovers the golden age—and a poor European finds means in settling there to change his slavery for liberty, his wants for ease. Scarcely he lives two years but his ideas enlarge, he becomes man and almost citizen—he is forced to quit his habitudes, his prejudices and even his vices, and take the sentiments and virtues of his neighbors. Yes, I have there seen the subjects formerly of a bishop think freely on religion, and heard the natives of ——— reason."

POLITICAL MOVEMENTS, &c. It is now, and again, roundly asserted, that Mr. White, of Tennessee, has not, and will not, accept the place of secretary of war, because of domestic afflictions—which appear to have been indeed, "hard to bear."

We have said, that many believed Mr. McLane would decline the place of secretary of the treasury—but if we might venture an opinion we should now say that he will not, because of another acceptance—and for the same reason.

The "Standard of Liberty" thus announces the preferment of Mr. Buchanan—this paper is published at Lancaster, Pa. the residence of the new minister to Russia—

"Hurrah for Buchanan!!

Our honorable James Buchanan has been appointed by the president, as minister of the United States, at the court of St. Petersburg. We wish this illustrious man of the people, a safe journey, and that we could have the pleasure of accompanying him, to see once more our former townsman, Nicholaus, and some other clever fellows."

The president returned to Washington on Thursday last.

WHEAT. It is feared, and we think justly that the late heavy rains, or numerous small showers, will materially diminish the product of this year's harvest. Let the farmers who have old wheat—hold on, a little. We think that the present low price cannot be reduced.

NEW YORK. A fire broke out in New York in the night of Monday last in Varrick street, between Charlton and Vandam streets, and spread so rapidly that some persons hardly escaped with their lives from their beds, many of the buildings being of wood, and water was so scarce that a dozen of them were on fire before the engines were in play. About 40 houses were destroyed, and 125 families deprived of their lodgings, most of them losing all their goods—loss estimated at 100,000 dollars. The North Ceriah Baptist church was among the houses burnt. It was a large frame.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL. The branch leading to Alexandria was formerly commenced on the great anniversary, with much ceremony and gladness of heart. There was a large civil and military procession, and several appropriate addresses delivered, &c.

FAYETTEVILLE. A return of all the monies collected for the relief of sufferers by the late fire will be published. Baltimore has forwarded $5,762, besides 250 from two of the fire companies. The manufacturing village of Lowell has sent more than $1,200.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

By an arrival at New York, London advices to the 30th May have been received.

ENGLAND.

Parliament was to meet on the 14th June, but as the preliminary ceremonies of electing the speaker of the house of commons and swearing in the members would occupy a week, the king did not intend to go in state to open the session till the 20th.

There are 19 Catholic members elected.

The king has spontaneously conferred the order of the garter upon earl Grey. The blue ribband was expressly given by the king, to use his own words, "to mark publicly his approbation of lord Grey's conduct, and for the same reason he had purposely chosen this time to confer the honor."

There has been heavy failures in London, causing great excitement in the stock market, and premiums of ½ per cent. had been paid for money stock. A principal had deserted a stock broker, refusing to pay £30,000 differences against him, though by former operations he had realized a profit of £80,000. This circumstance had caused one of the failures.

IRELAND.

The distress in Ireland was of the most frightful character---thousands were nearly famishing from want of bread, and were subsisting on barley meal mixed with sea-weed. Active measures were taking to raise subscriptions for their relief. In this work the queen and young princess were contributing—returning a little of the money which they were receiving of the people.

The duels alluded to in the former advices, terminated without bloodshed.

At a meeting in London to afford relief to the starving people of Ireland, a Protestant minister contended that the distress now existing in that unhappy country was a visitation by the Almighty for their apostacy, and that the Roman Catholic religion was that of apostacy! This furious bigot was replied to by the marquis of Clanricarde in a most indignant and feeling manner, but the mischief was already infused into the meeting, and it adjourned without doing any thing.

The duke of Leinster and lord Cloncurry have been sworn in as members of the privy council in Ireland.

Certain parts of Galway and Tipperary have been declared in a state of disturbance.

FRANCE.

Louis Philippe was, at the last advices, at Dieppe, where he had been received with the greatest eclat. The national guards of France, now fully armed and equipped, amount to 750,000 men.

The French government, says rumor, have sent to Vienna and Berlin, requiring either an entire or partial reduction of their present military establishments. The cabinet of Vienna is reported to have replied, that Austria desired to place her army on the peace footing, but could not do so until certain important questions, relative to Poland and Italy, were settled. France rejoined that Austria had transcended its rights in controlling the affairs of Italy, and therefore she could not be permitted to use the condition of these states as a pretext for new armaments. The report further states that the emperor of Russia had been reminded by France and England that the convention of Vienna recognizes the independence of Poland.

A government messenger had arrived at Paris from Rome, and it was currently reported the king had been recalled from his tour.

BELGIUM.

A conflict took place on the 22d May, at Namur, between a corps of lancers and one of volunteers, the commander of the latter was arrested. Prince Leopold, it was said, would be almost unanimously elected king, 96 out of 122 members, of which the congress consists, had declared for him, and only two had openly opposed him—the others were reserving their votes.

TURKEY.

The governor of Bagdad has submitted to the porte: 500 persons had been put to death for their insurrectionary movements.

The insurgents under the pacha of Wrana and Persoreen had attacked the grand vizier's troops near Pielepo, but were completely beaten with the loss of 1,000 men.

GERMANY.

The canton of Schaffhausen is in open rebellion, and the peasants were marching against the city. They had had several skirmishes, and many persons had been killed and wounded.

A proposition had been adopted in the second chamber of the states, to extend the liberty of the press, and the formation of a new constitution was also in agitation.

ITALY.

Savoy and Piedmont were ready to unite with France, and crush the influence of Austria.

Jerome Bonaparte had imparted to his mother the intelligence that the French government were about to replace the statue of Napoleon on the column in the place Vendome. She was at the point of death at the time, but the news was so grateful to her feelings that it instantly revived her and she became convalescent.

POLAND

The Poles have been successful. A corps of 8,000 men had been despatched to afford succor to the revolutionists of Volhynia, under the command of gen. Chrzanowski. This gallant corps had passed through a body of 24,000 Russians and arrived in triumph at the fortress of Zamosc, with 800 Russian prisoners. A noble enthusiasm animates the people of Volhynia, Lithuania, and of all Poland. In the government of Wilna, 60,000 insurgents were in arms.

A general battle was hourly expected between the armies of Deibitsch and Schrznecki—both armies were in motion. The Russians were manoeuvring to operate against Warsaw on the opposite side of the Vistula, and the Poles to frustrate this attempt. The country on the line of march was desolate, and the cholera prevailing to an alarming extent.

RUSSIA.

The emperor Nicholas was determined to carry his operations against Poland to the last extremity, and the nobles were arming and equipping an army of 100,000 men at their own expense, to march against the Poles. Deibitsch is to concentrate an army of 140,000 men to move on Warsaw.

ONE DAY LATER FROM LONDON.

A London paper of the evening of the 30th May, says—From Paris it is stated that offers of mediation on the part of England and France, having been made to the emperor Nicholas, for the pacification of Poland, the autocrat has declared, in answer, that he will make no concessions to "rebellious subjects," and that had he been disposed to make any, he would not have waited for advice to that effect from the west.

Another of the 31st. has reports of some advantages gained by the Poles—but nothing decisive was known to have happened.

Something that may lead to an adjustment of the affairs of Belgium was expected soon to happen.

The British funds were rising—consols 84 3-8, 84 5-8.

Flour in bond 27*s.* per barrel—196 lbs. or, at the present rate of exchange, equal to $6¾.

POLITICS OF THE DAY.

RECEPTION AT HOME OF SAMUEL D. INGHAM.

From the "Doylestown Democrat." Extra.

As soon as it was known upon what day Mr. Ingham might be expected to return home, a number of his republican fellow citizens of Bucks county, assembled, and requested John Pugh esquire, and the honorable John Fox, to meet him at Philadelphia, and conduct him to the county. These gentlemen performed that duty on Friday and Saturday last.—They were met at the Sorrel Horse tavern, in Montgomery county by a body of gentlemen from Bucks, on horseback, and by them escorted to the line of the county. Here Mr. Ingham was received with enthusiastic cheering, by a great concourse of his fellow citizens, on horseback, in carriages, gigs, dearborns, and on foot.

The cavalcade immediately formed, and moved in procession to the Bear tavern under the direction of the Marshals of the day—major general W. T. Rogers, and col. John Davis, and Assistant marshals—capt. Geo. Merrick and Mr. Jos. Archambault.

A long line of carriages preceded and followed that in which Mr. Ingham rode. The horsemen forming in open order on either side of the carriages.

In the carriage immediately preceding Mr. Ingham who was accompanied by Mr. Pugh and Mr. Gowen of Philadelphia, rode the venerable soldiers of the revolutionary war, general Samuel Smith and captain Francis Baird.

Upon their arrival at the Bear tavern, where a large concourse were waiting to receive him, he was again heartily cheered. After receiving a hearty welcome, and the congratulations of all present, he was conducted to the head of a large table, spread under the shade of venerable trees, on which was prepared a good dinner. He was supported on his right by the venerable patriot gen. Samuel Smith and judge Fox—and on his left by the democratic Jackson electors of 1824 and 1828 respectively, John Pugh, esq. and captain Francis Baird.

As soon as dinner was over, the following address was delivered to him by captain Baird and Henry Chapman, esq.

SIR:—A number of your democratic republican fellow citizens of Bucks county, learning that you were expected to return among them this day, have assembled for the purpose of giving you a cordial welcome home.

Regretting, as we do, the existence of that inauspicious influence, whatever it may be, that has caused you to leave the elevated station which you have filled with so much advantage to the public and honor to yourself, we heartily congratulate you that no one has been able to cast a shade of reproach on your moral character, official conduct, or political course.

Such being the fact, we confess a strong desire for some explanation of this extraordinary measure which has shocked the public mind and broken up the elements of party throughout the country.

We now sir, as a testimony of regard for you, invite you to partake of refreshments with us, and the democratic republicans now assembled at the Bear tavern.

REPLY.

My friends and fellow citizens:

It is impossible not to feel deeply sensible of this manifestation of your kindness.—It has been my good fortune to have been long connected with you in all the various relations of social and political life. I am indebted to the generous confidence of my fellow citizens of this congressional district, and especially of my native county, for all the numerous public employments in which I have been engaged for the greater part of the last twenty-five years—I have received from them and from you in common with them, innumerable favors which can never be repaid, but from the overflowings of a grateful heart; but this scene imposes a deeper obligation than all the rest—It is impossible to find language to express my feelings—I can therefore only return to you my sincere thanks and assure you that it will ever be remembered with the most profound and unwavering gratitude. For the kind partiality with which you have contemplated and spoken of my public services, I can only offer you additional thanks—between us, the heart and not the tongue is the organ of communication, and it speaks its feelings best in silence.

When I resigned the trust which the citizens of this district last conferred upon me, to engage in another of greater hazard and responsibility; you wisely permitted me to enter upon the new scene of probation, without indulging or exciting expectations; you felt as I did, that the undertaking was hazardous, and you sympathised in my anxiety for the consequences. It was known that the department committed to my care, had recently been charged with heavy additional duties and responsibilities, in which a vast amount of the active capital of the country was closely connected—that the laws for the execution of these duties were defective in efficiency, and obnoxious for their rigor—That jealousy and hostility had sprung up in various sections of the union, as well in regard to the disposition of the public lands, as the great and disturbing question of impost revenue; that the treasury department was the point of contact, in fact, the battle ground of these contending and excited interests. It becomes me not to say how this duty has been executed. I can only assure you, that every faculty of my mind has been constantly devoted to my official duty; that for the last two years the midnight watch has seldom found my eyes closed in sleep—not engaged in the dissipation of the gay metropolis, but alone, in the dry, arduous and severe investigation of the various subjects presented for decision. You will excuse me for thus alluding to matters so personal to myself. I could not have done it, but for the peculiar relation which exists between you and me, and the persuasion that you had been informed of the same facts, through other channels; public sentiment having done me more than justice in these respects. It had also cheered me with the hope, that the confidence thus kindly reposed, might have been employed in promoting other and higher objects of public good, in which I was zealously engaged. It ought not to be disguised, that the final extinguishment of the public debt, which is very near at hand, will present a new crisis in the affairs of our country—The public mind should therefore be familiarized to it, and preparation made in advance for the event. To continue permanently upon the people, taxes equal to ten million of dollars, the amount of the present sinking fund, more than will be required for the current expenses of the government, will, I most conscientiously believe, hazard the existence of this union; and the more we disregard the complaints of those who think themselves aggrieved, the more rapidly will that great evil be hastened. What can compensate for the breaking up of a confederation, which is the highest and may be the last hope of liberty? On the other hand, suddenly and indiscriminately to reduce the impost duties to the scale of revenue for the current expenditure, would cause a scene of ruin which cannot be described. I have no doubt but all these evils may be averted, and instead of multiplying antagonist interests and exciting animosity and hatred throughout the nation, marked by geographical boundaries the most dangerous of all, that measures might be adopted which would preserve every interest of the country, in the operation of which, every section would be reconciled; and which would in fact, draw together the different parts with bonds of affection founded in mutual personal as well as political interests. The successful adaptation of these measures to their end, will require not less of the spirit of patriotism and of compromise, than knowledge of the condition, and skill in the arrangement of our diversified pursuits. The system is complex, and simplicity can only be restored by slow degrees, and the time is at hand when the work should be in progress. The difficulties are great, but they are not insurmountable, and the object is worthy of the highest effort of human intelligence. To establish more firmly the bonds of this union, not by physical power, but by means of the moral cements, mutual affection and mutual interest, is a work of the most exalted character, and when accomplished will perpetuate an undisturbed possession of our rich inheritance, not only to our posterity, but render it at no distant day, by the mere force of example, not less valuable to the cause of human liberty and happiness throughout the world. This work so far as it depends on the treasury department, has now been committed, I trust, to abler hands, and I devoutly hope it may meet with the attention and success it so well deserves.

If in the desire to discharge with fidelity to the country, and satisfaction to those more immediately concerned and under the pressure of great anxiety to prepare for the high objects I have just referred to, I have not mingled in the partizan operations which, whether intended for good or evil, are usually found about the sources of power and patronage, I shall be excused for having no leisure for such employment, even if I had a taste for the associations of this nature, which existed at the metropolis. Nor was I engaged, as has been insinuated by some who seem to speak by authority, in arranging plans for the selection of a successor to the presidential chair. My correspondence with you my friends, limited as it was, will bear strong negative testimony at least to this fact, but if it be not satisfactory, I take this occasion to absolve every person to whom I have written a letter, from the date of my appointment to that of my removal, from every obligation of confidence on that subject, which is usually deemed to belong to private correspondence, that the proofs of this charge may be given to the world, if any exist.

You must not suppose that I am about to pour out complaints for private griefs. I have no private griefs. My judgment has never wavered for a moment, as to the course which duty and honor prescribed, in the relation I bore to the president, and the other members of the administration; and sustained by an approving conscience as well as by many evidences of public opinion, and most especially by your generous and kind countenance on this occasion: I should be unfaithful to my own character and a heartless ingrate, if I could entertain, much less express, a sentiment of private grief. Although stripped of the attractions of power, and exiled from the public service by the chief magistrate, for whose character you and I had entertained so high an opinion—to be thus met and greeted by such a crowd of my fellow citizens, among whom I see, attended by their sons, the companions of my childhood, the associates, friends and confidants of my riper years, and more than all these, some venerable relics of the revolutions of whom, God be praised, there are yet a few among us. I say, such a meeting as this, is a reward infinitely more valuable than the possession of any favor in the power of the chief magistrate to confer. But even without these consolatory evidences of the good opinion of those whose good opinion I value more than that of all the world beside, because you know me best—I say without these, I would be deeply mortified if any friend of mine should suppose that I was an object of sympathy for private grief. On the contrary, I regard the moment in which my separation from the public service was determined on, as the most propitious moment of my life; and although it might now be difficult to persuade those who partake deeply of the prevailing passion for office, of the sincerity of this declaration, yet I perfectly know that the time will come, when it will be readily believed. As to pecuniary loss, (if any think of this) much less labor than I should have bestowed on official business, well directed, will easily procure something more than a bare subistence, which all know is scarcely afforded by the salaries at Washington,—I can have no cause of resentment therefore on this account. It will not be thought profanity, I hope, to say that the president is but a mortal; subject to all the infirmities incident to human nature; his displeasure or denunciations are not directed by an omniscient eye, nor do they carry with them political or corporeal death. And even, if, as he suggested in his correspondence with me of the 20th of April last, I was intended as a sacrifice to propitiate public opinion for others whom he loved, and whom it had severely threatened, that of itself is not good cause for resentment. It was not the ancient custom even in idolatrous sacrifices to select the worst of the flock for those purposes. But whatever may have been the motive for my removal, I shall enjoy the effect, and I feel like a mariner who has safely returned from a long, toilsome and somewhat perilous voyage, to receive the joyous greetings of his companions and friends.

Among the American people, the public judgment alone can fix lasting disrepute on a public man. There is too much independence in the press, for truth to be successfully perverted, or the public mind to be permanently deceived by the arts of the servile and mercenary part of that body. I cannot be mistaken, however, in the indications I have seen, that whatever may have been the motive for dissolving the cabinet, that object is not deemed to have been fully accomplished by it, and it is very apparent that a corps editorial has been organized, ready to let off their poisoned shafts at whomsover, and whenever, directed by the master of the signals. Some of these, perhaps too eager for the chase, or perhaps in obedience to some private signal, have some time since commenced their attacks on me.—I could not mistake their connexion, but I heed them not. The foremost of our temporal duties is that which we owe to our country, and with this guide for a polar star, whoever makes careful observations can never mistake his way. The treatment I am to receive from the corps I have adverted to, will depend not upon the character of my services to the country, nor on their benefit or injury to the administration, but upon the meekness and silence with which I shall submit to what they deem the greatest of all grievances, the loss of office.—But, as they and I place a different estimate on these things, and this loss is deemed to be a gain, I shall have no opportunity of making a merit of my meekness, or commending myself to their favor by a self-denying silence—I shall, therefore, pursue the course which duty to the country shall seem to prescribe, perfectly convinced that all patriotic minds, when fully informed as to the history of the last two years, will come to the same conclusion—until then, it is due to prudence, as well as justice, to forbear a definitive judgment.

You have been pleased to express a strong desire for some 'explanation of the extraordinary measure which has shocked the public mind, and broken up the elements of party throughout the country,' alluding, as I understand, to the dissolution of the cabinet. It is reasonable to suppose that there was an adequate cause for a proceeding so unexampled in the annals of our country —measures of this kind are not very uncommon in those governments where it is held that the chief magistrate "can do no wrong;" but this doctrine does not belong to our system, and it must be an extraordinary case which could render such a step expedient—Of this, however, the people must be the judges in the last resort, and, before it is drawn into a precedent which might be used for undefined and dangerous purposes, they have a right to be fully informed. I do not, therefore, object to your request, as improper; but when it is considered that the proceeding, so far as I am concerned, was exclusively the act of the president, who alone can perfectly explain his own motives, it might seem improper for me now to anticipate the explanation, which, as none is above the reach of public opinion, he will no doubt think it his duty to make of these transactions to the American people. But if it be thought that I have incurred any responsibility in this proceeding, I have only to say, let the facts be investigated, and the veil which now envelopes this matter in so much mystery will be completely removed. If all is right, the public mind will be satisfied; if any thing is wrong the people only, who are sovereign in such cases at least, can apply the remedy. It is the boast of our system that none are above the power, or beneath the protection of this tribunal—Upon their intelligence and virtue depends the maintainance of all the preservative principles of our government. It is their sacred duty, as well as right to scrutinize the acts, and scan the motives of all who are connected with the public service, and guard with a vigilant and jealous care against every exertion of power, which, by weakening the influence of virtue and patriotism, may impair the moral energies of our republican system. Entertaining these views, but for the reasons I have mentioned, I would unhesitatingly have responded to your request, and communicated to you, while time and strength permitted, all the lights which I possess as to be whole subject. But I am the more reconciled to declining a compliance with your wishes, seeing that so many channels are open for communication between the people and their agents, through which they may have direct access in this case to the responsible agent. I have only to add, that as to myself personally, I neither seek nor avoid the scrutiny—if done at all, it should be on public account, and the object should be the public interest. When this is undertaken; God forbid that I should interpose any obstacle to a scrutiny in which the purity and integrity of public men are to be called in question. Unless these virtues be cherished, this beautiful fabric of government will soon become a melancholy ruin, and the execrations of millions yet unborn will, while the page of history lasts, be poured out on the heads of those who shall have contributed to its destruction.

When Mr. Ingham had concluded, judge Fox rose, and addressing Mr. Ingham, said, that many of his fellow citizens present, had a great desire to know the facts connected with the attempt to assassinate him before he left Washington, and as there was much anxiety to possess correct information on the subject, he requested him to relate to his friends assembled, such facts, as would enable them to disseminate correct information on this interesting subject.

Mr. Ingham in reply, observed, that he could not refuse to comply with the request, but he would much rather for the character of the government and the nation, that he had the power to bury the whole transaction in oblivion.—This was not now practicable, and he would state the material facts as minutely and briefly as he could.

On Friday the seventeenth, about ten o'clock, I received a note from Mr. Eaton, by the hands of Mr. Randolph, then chief clerk in the war department, demanding an avowal or disavowal of a publication in a newspaper, without any other connexion with the paper being suggested, than that it was supposed to be friendly to me, and was published in the city where I resided. I could not doubt that such a demand was a prelude to a wanton and premeditated quarrel, and although I did not understand whether it was the fact stated in the paper, viz: that my family had refused to associate with his; or the authority to publish, which I was called upon to disavow; I chose to avoid a prolonged correspondence, and gave him my answer in each alternative —You have probably seen the correspondence and I need not be more particular. On the same day that my note was delivered, I received a challenge, viz: about three o'clock, by the hands of Mr. Randolph, the chief clerk, now acting secretary of war. Having company to dinner and until, late in the evening, I sent no answer that night; the next morning, Sunday, the same Mr. Randolph intruded himself into my room, and threatened personal violence if I did not answer the note. I informed him that I should take my own time to do it, and showed him the door. On the following morning I replied to Mr. Eaton's note, and went out to take leave of some of my friends in the city, which occupied me till after one o'clock. On my return to my lodgings, I learned that Mr. Eaton had been at the treasury department in the morning, enquiring when I would be at the office, and that he also enquired for the treasurer's room and went into it, and that he had spent a part of his time, since about ten o'clock, in the lower rooms of the treasury department, occupied by the register and treasurer, and that he had been seen in company with those officers, and had been for the greater part of the time stationed in a grocery store about half a square from my lodgings, during which he was occasionally visited by Mr. Randolph, and by a Mr. Vankleck, another clerk in in the war department, who appeared to act the part of videttes. From the information I received of the movements of Mr. Eaton and Mr. Randolph, I expected the assault to be made by them, and prepared myself for that purpose. Colonel N. Towson had been invited to my lodgings, and went with me unarmed as a witness, and to prevent a surprise. Three other young men were in company; but directed to follow at some distance behind, to prevent or resist an attack by superior numbers. My son, being the only person whose life I had any right to expose in such a conflict, was by my side, both of us well prepared for defence. I expected the attack in the passage of the treasury department, as Mr. Eaton had not long before entered that building, and after having taken so much pains to obtain a meeting, it was scarcely to be expected that he would then avoid it, and as my approach could easily have been observed.—We passed in, however, unmolested. I went into the second story to the room I occupied, and finished what little business I had to close before I finally left the office, which had been previously fixed for that day. I learned while in my room, that Mr. Eaton and major Lewis, whose offices were in another building more than a quarter of a mile distant, went out of the treasury department in a direction towards the president's house where major Lewis lived. I was also informed that they came out of one of the register's rooms—Nothing further occurred worthy of notice till evening.

Soon after dark I was informed, by several persons calling in to see me, that Mr. Eaton, Mr. Randolph, and a Mr. Overton, the latter a clerk in maj. Lewis' office and near relative of judge Overton, of Tenn. who was there on a visit to the president, were seen, apparently armed, passing to and fro on the street, not far from my dwelling, and sometimes passing my door. On one occasion, while thus passing, Mr. Eaton stopped at the door and looked into the passage, and while standing there, prudently hesitating in his purpose, a gentleman in one of the lower rooms, (Mr. ———), who resided in the house, stepped into the passage in time to see Mr. Eaton standing at the door and retire from it. I received many tenders of personal service for the night one of which I accepted, and the gentleman slept in the house. Sometime between 10 and 11, a highly respectable inhabitant of the city informed me that he met Mr. Eaton and six or seven other persons, walking near the president's gate, whence it was concluded they had retired for the night, in company with some others who had been privy to the scenes of the day, tho' perhaps not actors in them—A part of their conversation was overheard, which may hereafter be imparted. On the following day I finished my visits, in order to leave the city on Wednesday morning, as I had appointed, in answer to a letter written by your committee a week before. Some time on Tuesday evening the same men, viz: Eaton and Randolph, (and it is believed Overton was also with them) passed and repassed my door frequently, looking impertinently into the windows, and exhibiting other signs of the gasconade they had been practising. I found a high degree of excitement prevailing in the city, and information was communicated to me that some appearance of preparation had been discovered to way-lay me on the road to Baltimore. I therefore prepared for that event, but met with no molestation.

It occurred to me in the evening that I could not with propriety leave the city without bringing the subject distinctly before the notice of the president, and I addressed him a letter to that effect. My engagements were such that I could not remain to be present at the investigation he might direct, nor was it necessary. I was not a witness to the acts I stated to him, though I believed them, and still believe them to be true. If there had been any difficulty in procuring testimony as to the facts, I would have furnished the names of witnesses to any fact stated. This, however, is not now necessary. The president has thought proper to call on the three officers of the treasury department, whom I represented as having been in the company of the principals on that day, and these officers, tho' they deny the truth of my statement in general terms, have each admitted its truth in every material particular, as far as it affected themselves. I have stated that Eaton and Randolph alternately occupied the treasury building in the treasurer and register's rooms, with a view to a personal assault upon me, which I have termed assassination; for, although I had received notice of Eaton's design, I did not believe that either he or Randolph would attack me, unless they could get behind my back, or to take some other advantage. I therefore considered the threat as a cover for a dastardly attempt to assassinate. I have not said that the treasurer, register and 2d auditor were privy to the design of Eaton; I have only said that the rooms of the two former were occupied by him while lying in wait, and that each of them was in his company. Now it is admitted by Mr. Eaton, that he was seeking a personal rencontre with me on that day —and the exculpatory statements of the officers named, without even the aid of a cross examination, leave the mind irresistibly to infer even more than I have stated.

T. L. Smith, the register, says he did not give aid or succor to Eaton; but does not deny knowing Eaton's object in coming to the treasury department. W. B. Lewis, the 2d auditor, says he knew of no "conspiracy," He does not say that he knew nothing of Eaton's design. Mr. Campbell, United States treasurer, says he did know that a conflict was expected, but did not believe it would take place that day. Perhaps he thought I would not come to the treasury after such a parade of menaced rencontre; or that if I did come, perhaps he knew that Mr. Eaton would contrive to keep out of the way as actually happened. As to Mr. Randolph, he does not deny being in the treasury department on the same day, and says he only saw Mr. Eaton ten minutes at a time, between nine and three. With such equivocations and admissions in prepared statements, what might not be expected from a cross examination of all these persons, and of all the persons about the building? I have only to add, that I complain of no injury inflicted on me---I do not, therefore, present myself as a prosecutor. I believed that a department of the government, which ought to have been regarded as a sanctuary at least against the lawless violence of the United States officers, had been violated for purposes of blood, and that the majesty of the law had been offended under the eye of the chief magistrate. In this aspect I communicated to the president a sketch of what had occurred, knowing that the means at hand were ample, for a thorough investigation by a regular examination of witnesses on oath. I had another reason for making that communication to the president. Mr. Evans, a clerk in the register's office, who is a brother-in-law of Mr. Eaton's, declared publicly in the hearing of a number of persons, that if he "were in Mr. Eaton's place, he would assassinate me, and the president would turn every clerk out of office who took my part in this business." Mr. Barry had expresed himself in terms of the greatest bitterness towards me.

These and other facts of which I was very credibly informed, satisfied me that a state of feeling existed among those who sypathised with Mr. Eaton, which was not only deeply discreditable to the government, but threatened much individual injury to some very worthy men. I therefore determined to bring the subject to the notice of the president and of the public at the same time. I have said nothing lightly which I do not believe could be proved by witnesses of unquestionable character---but after the menace of Mr. Evans, they would require an assurance of protection before they could be expected to give voluntary statements. All the means for ascertaining the truth, are at the president's command. The statement I communicated to him, was shown to several persons who were on the spot and witnessed the excited feeling and great anxiety which pervaded the most sober minded people of the city. It was deemed by all who saw it, a temperate statement of the facts. I am aware that it will be difficult to believe that a person so closly connected in feeling with the president of the United States could have been permitted to lie in wait, armed with sword cane and pistols, in the rooms of one of the public buildings, for the purpose of a rencontre with the head of a department. Such a transaction is too gross to be realized by the American people, and hence they will disincline to give it their belief, but it is impossible to resist the force of truth. If an impartial investigation of this transaction shall ever be made, much more than I have said will be fully proved and whenever such an investigation shall be instituted, if my presence should be deemed necessary, I will, without hesitation, attend at the seat of government for that purpose.

I have remarked that the note of Mr. Eaton indicated a predetermination for a quarrel. This is clearly proved by his seizing as a pretext for it, a newspaper statement of a fact which had been notorious in the city of Washington for two years past, viz: that my family had refused to visit his. This fact he well knew I could not disavow. He did not even allege that I had said any thing to the disparagement of his family; and I could not have disavowed the fact upon which he had predicated his menace, unless I would have consented to be bullied into a statement which every body knew to be false. My reply to his menace was neither more nor less than an unequivocal refusal to disavow the fact that my family had refused to visit his. The guilt or innocence of his wife never was in controversy between Mr. Eaton and myself. He never even complained that I had made any charges against her. She had been charged by others with offences against society which had excluded her from it, long before I went to Washington; and the attempt was to compel me and my family to associate with a woman whom the respectable society of that city had deemed unworthy of such countenance. I RESISTED THIS ATTEMPT, and this is the complaint of Mr. Eaton, for which, he sought my life.

The following "good thing" is from the Boston Gazette—

A celebrated wag in the custom house, on reading the correspondence between Messrs. Ingham and Eaton, was struck with a passage in the first note of the former gentleman, which speaks of the farce that Mr. Eaton is playing before the American people. "Farce," "farce," said he—that must have some reference to Mr. Van Buren. Ah, I have it—it's the flying Dutchman! "It made a great laugh at the time," as might be expected.

[It may be necessary to say to some, that the "Flying Dutchman" is a grand spectacle and great farce, which has been performed at many of the theatres.]

Among the remarkable things which have lately happened, it may be mentioned—that the four gentlemen, elected last year as representatives in the legislature of New Jersey, as "Jackson men," for Salem county, and who so acted—have come out openly and joined others, in calling a meeting for the support of Mr. Clay.

From the Globe.

Mr. Blair: If a sincere wish, and a course of conduct corresponding therewith, could have prevented my name from appearing in the public papers, blended with party politics, I should have escaped the painful necessity of soliciting your giving publicity to this communication.

I had no agency or concern in the affair between Mr. Eaton and Mr. Ingham: but in a speech said to have been lately made by Mr. Ingham, he has ascribed participation to me in it. This statement in relation to me, is entirely untrue. I repeat, I knew nothing of the difference between Mr. Eaton and Mr. Ingham, except that I had understood Ingham had challenged Eaton.

On Tuesday, after it had ended, I remarked to a gentleman (in the presence of several others) who said that some of Mr. Ingham's clerks had determined to defend him against the attacks of Mr. Eaton, that I thought Mr. Eaton was right in vindicating the character of his wife, and if I were present and Mr. Ingham's clerks should interfere, I should feel it my duty to take part with Mr. Eaton; but this was on Tuesday, after the affair of Monday had closed.

There were five gentlemen present, three of whom have authorised me to say, they did not hear me say, were I in Mr. Eaton's place, I would assassinate Mr. Ingham, and the president would turn every clerk out of office who took part in this business. Nor was any thing said by me that would in the most remote sense authorise such an inference. Very respectfully,

FRENCH S. EVANS.*

To the editor of the Globe.

Dear sir: Mr. Ingham, in his address at the Bear tavern, in Bucks county, Pennsylvania, speaking of maj. Eaton, says he "had been for the greater part of the time stationed in a grocery store about half a square from my lodging, during which he was occasionally visited by Mr. Randolph and by a Mr. Van Kleeck, another clerk in the war department, who appeared to act the part of videttes."

This statement, so far as I am concerned, I feel it my duty to myself and the religious society with which I am connected, to pronounce utterly untrue. I assert most solemnly, that major E. was never visited by me at a grocery store, as is represented by Mr. I. I declare, according to the best of my recollection, that I never saw maj. E. from Saturday the 18th until late in the evening of Monday, when I casually saw him at the house of a friend, a period embracing the controversy in question. I further declare, that I had not the slightest agency or participation in that controversy, and that I never had any intimation from maj. Eaton, or any of his friends, that he wished or expected me to take any part in it. Very respectfully,

LAW. L. V. KLEECK.

From the same.

Mr. Blair:—I have read with no little surprise a statement in a reported speech of Mr. Ingham, made to his friends in Bucks county, Pa. since his return home—in which he throws out some imputations against me, in his late difference with major Eaton. Insinuations of this kind had been previously made by an anonymous writer, which I deemed unworthy of notice; but coming now from the late secretary of the treasury who, no doubt has been misinformed, I deem it a duty which I owe to myself, to contradict them, and will further say, that I never had any hostility to Mr. Ingham, but was at peace with him and never harbored a thought to harm him.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

JNO. W. OVERTON.

Washington city, July, 1*st* 1831.

It is proper to state, in justice to judge Overton, whose name has been introduced by Mr. Ingham, that the judge, after a short visit to the president, left this city for Old Point in company with general McComb, on Friday 17th of June, before the offensive matter in the Telegraph appeared, and three days before the incident alluded to by Mr. I., occurred. CHESAPEAKE AND DELAWARE CANAL.

At a general meeting of the stockholders of the Chesapeake and Delaware canal company, held at their office, in the city of Philadelphia, on the 6th of June, 1831—the president and directors presented a full and distinct report of their proceedings, and statement of their accounts, during the last year; and it was on motion,

Resolved, That the report this day presented be approved and adopted.

Resolved, That the thanks of the stockholders be and are hereby given to the president and directors, for the zealous and faithful manner in which their duties have been discharged.

Resolved, That the president and directors cause the said report to be published.

JOHN READ, chairman.

Chesapeake and Delaware canal office, June 6, 1831.

Twelfth general report of the president and directors of the Chesapeake and Delaware canal company.

In accordance with the requisitions of the charter of the Chesapeake and Delaware canal company, the president and directors present the annual report of their proceedings with the treasurer's statement of the fiscal concerns of the company.

Nothing has occurred since the last annual meeting of the stockholders, to alter the favorable views which were then taken of the usefulness of the Chesapeake and Delaware canal, and the ultimate profit that its proprietors would probably derive from it. During the past year, constant supervision and care have been exercised to prevent the accidents and stoppages to which all newly made works of this description are liable, and it may be remarked as a singular fact, that this canal, since it was opened for navigation in October 1829, has never been impeded for a day, except by ice, and then only while that of the rivers with which it communicates was closed by the same cause. During the drought of August, September and October last, when operations on many other canals was suspended for want of water, although the depth on the summit level of this was somewhat diminished, its navigation was not interrupted, and vessels of the ordinary draught met with no obstructions in their passage.

The experience, however, of last season, has forcibly evinced the good effects of the reservoirs which have been provided on this level, as without them, the supply of water would have been insufficient. The quantity on this part of the canal, will be increased by raising one of the locks, and thus obtaining an additional depth over a surface of about six hundred acres. The increased height of water, will make requisite a coresponding height of the walling. This work has been partly done during the last year, and the remainder can be finished in a short time. There is, also, a small portion of the lower level, which it was expected would not require protection, but the heavy gales of this spring have shown its necessity. Both of these works can be accomplished without any considerable expense. The large waste wier, with lift gates is finished, and will secure the summit level from overflowing, by effectually controlling the surplus water, which might otherwise endanger it. The gates of the locks have been so altered and improved, as not only to save a considerable quantity of water, but also, greatly to expedite the lockage of vessels. The towing path on the summit level has been increased and strengthened by earth taken from places on the deep-cut where it was supposed to be desirable to lighten the pressure on the side slopes of the canal, in consequence of the character of the soil, of which they were formed. Much attention has been given to the banks, and various seeds sown, and manures applied, to get them covered with grass; as yet with but partial success: in many places small traces of vegetation can be seen, while in others it has a more promising appearance: but in all, it will evidently require considerable time before they will be covered with a good sward, which when formed, is found to be an excellent protection.

On the lower level, a culvert was originally placed under the canal to aid in carrying off the waters of the Dragon creek, and the drainage of the adjacent country; but the sinking of the towing path and embankments, previous to the finishing of the canal, depressed the ends of the culvert, and so much injured it, that last autumn it was deemed necessary to have it stopped for the safety of the canal. Owing to this circumstance, the other means of carrying off this water, (viz: the large drain cut through the high land on the north of the canal) has been found insufficient to vent it, and the adjoining marshes have been overflowed, which with the carrying away of the dam by a freshet in 1826, and the sinking of the embankments in 1827, while the work was in progress, has subjected the company to claims for damages: a recurrence of these claims will be prevented by the plan that has been adopted to remedy this evil, placing a large culvert under the canal; which now can be made effective and permanent. As the embankments have ceased sinking, it will not be liable to the same danger which destroyed the former one, and can be made without any interruption to the business of the canal. When these things, which are incidental to the completion of the work, are done, it is believed the contingent expenses of this company, owing to the peculiar character of the canal, will be less in proportion than almost any other: as the whole cost of keeping it in repair, supervision and all other expenses, will probably not exceed a half per cent. per annum on the capital.

Numerous frauds on the company have been attempted, by captains and agents of vessels making false statements of their cargoes; this practise is, in great measure, stopped by a strict supervision, and, in suspected cases, by an examination of the cargo; and it is believed that the organization and system of checks on the canal, and in this city, will in most cases lead to detection and exposure. On the application of this company to the secretary of the treasury, that officer appointed one of the company's toll collectors, an inspector of the customs; this will give him great facilities in detecting impositions on the revenue of the company, as well as on that of the United States, and will probably enable him to prevent infractions of the revenue laws. The officers of the custom house in this city have also promptly tendered their aid with the same views.

The difficulties in the navigation of Back Creek, still continue to prevent the free passage of steam boats, and other vessels, to and from the canal; and although the bill which contained an appropriation for clearing out this public highway did not pass the senate, after having passed the house of representatives, yet the necessity of the measure is becoming so obvious, and constantly increasing, that it is confidently hoped, at the next session of congress, an appropriation will be made for this object, which is now so requisite to the public convenience.

The advantages already derived, by the city of Philadelphia, and the community generally, from the Chesapeake and Delaware canal, are so apparent and so well appreciated, that it is unnecessary to advert to them further, than to give a brief statement of the sources from whence they principally arise.

Between Baltimore, Alexandria, Richmond, Petersburg, Norfolk and Philadelphia, there have been employed during the past year, in the transportation of passengers and merchandize by way of this canal, two lines of steamboats and seven lines of packets. There were made during that time the following number of passages through the canal:

1,230	packets with merchandize
600	vessels with wood, carrying	13,332	cords.
272	do rafts, and arks, with lumber, carrying	7,118,734	feet.
294	do flour, do	101,462	barrels.
246	do wheat, corn, &c.	289,173	bushels.

2,638 do cotton, iron, oysters, fish, whiskey, and various other articles, making a total of 5,280 passages of vessels of different descriptions through the canal between 1st June, 1830, and 1st June, 1831.

It will readily be perceived, that large portions of this trade could not have come to this city, in consequence of its bulky character, except by the canal; and its effects are strongly indicated by an increased business, and demand for stores, particularly on the margin of the Delaware, where the effects of this new trade are more directly and obviously seen, and its benefits felt.

Notwithstanding the severity of the last winter, which kept the river and canal navigation closed by ice unusually long, viz: from the 12th January to the 3d of March, yet there has been an increase in the amount of the receipts of toll thus far of this season, over that of the last of nearly 50 per cent. The tolls received since last year's report, viz: from 1st June, 1830 to 1st June, 1831, amounted to 62,223 dollars 15 cents. This sum, earned in so short a time, after the canal was opened for navigation, is believed fully to equal in proportion the receipts of any other canal in a similar period; and when viewed as a commencement, presents to the stockholders a highly favorable prospect for the future.

If the tolls of the past year, and the increase of them this season, over those of the corresponding periods of the last, be considered as a data, on which to found an estimate of the probable amount of revenue, it will be a fair inference to suppose, that the amount of tolls will be about 90,000 dollars the ensuing year. This ratio of increase is, no doubt, too large to be calculated on for a term of years; but it is, perhaps, not sanguine to suppose, that the receipts will not fall far short, even of this rate of increase, during the year; and for some time after the Delaware and Raritan canal, and the Amboy rail road, shall be completed; and when the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, and the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, will be farther extended to the west, and embrace a larger scope of usefulness. The Chesapeake and Delaware canal—being so situated that it is necessarily the great thoroughfare between the internal improvements of the north and south—must prosper with their prosperity, independent of its increasing sources of success; which are found to be constantly extending themselves, and flowing in from new and distant channels.

LIABILITY OF SECURITIES.

From the Pensacola Gazette.

Mr. Editor: The following case was decided at the present term of the superior court of the western district of Florida, now in session at Pensacola, the hon. judge Brackenridge presiding. You will please insert it in your next paper. B.

The post master general vs. Antoine Collins and M. Crupper, securities of John Fitzgerald, a defaulting post master at Pensacola.

(Note by the reporter.)

John Fitzgerald was the printer of some newspaper in Tennessee*, and shortly after the 4th March, 1829, came to Pensacola, and made various inquiries to ascertain the profits of the several civil employments held by the incumbents against whom no complaints had ever been heard in the territory. After casting about with the fastidious taste of one conscious of power, he finally resolved not to starve between "two stacks of hay," but decided that the post office suited him better than the collector's or marshal's office. His wishes were made known, and one of the best postmasters in the southern country had leave to retire in short order, in the plan of reform then going on. About the first of July, 1829, the Tennessee printer took the key of the mail bags, and entered upon the funds of the office. The instructions of the late post master general then required the money to be deposited in the "nearest bank." This was before the post office department was reformed by the new code of laws which requires such strict accountability on paper. As the first quarter progressed, there being no branch of the United States bank at Pensacola, and the new incumbent animated by the spirit of that reform, in support of which he had distributed so many type, and seeing it inscribed "on the list of executive duties in characters too strong to be overlooked," determined to obey his instructions to the letter, to deposit the first quarter's proceeds in the "nearest bank," called Faro. The deposit being safely made, he set out for Washington to account, where he remained all winter with the reformers.

In the mean time, the military, naval and civil officers of the place all made representations against him. The delegate insisted upon his removal. The senate passed a resolution calling for an account of his defalcation; all which was made known to the postmaster general, who, it was proved was distinctly apprised that if Fitzgerald came back to Pensacola without a dismission from office, he would embezzle the remainder of the funds of the office. No order was given, no step taken to stop the money in the hands of the deputy.

A known and acknowledged defaulter was kept in office for more than six months, and finally was permitted to leave Washington, forgetting to pay his bills, and return home, pocket the remainder of the money, and a suit was brought to hold the securities responsible.

The defendants pleaded several pleas in bar, some of a technical character, and others charging the loss to the result of the laches of the postmaster general. The omission alleged on his part, was the failure to require an account and payment according to law and his own instructions, all of which it appeared had been violated, and the failure to sue the principal within the time required by law. The case was urged at length upon the law instructions, evidence, &c. Wright, district attorney, for P. M. G. and White and Blount for defendants.

The court gave no exposition of the law, and upon that branch of the subject which referred to the laches of the postmaster general remarked, that sureties could not in general avail themselves of the laches of the government, or its officers, but that cases might occur of such gross negligence and evident irregularity, as to release the sureties from liability. Whether there had been that negligence and irregularity in this case, the court did not say or intimate, as that was a matter arising out of facts applicable to the laws which had been explained.

(Further note of the reporter.)

The jury, without hesitation, found a verdict for the defendants. The effect of which is that all the postages collected at the post office, Pensacola, is in the "deep bosom of the ocean buried."

If the learned counsel had seen before this trial the Baltimore Republican of 2d May, he could have found what the lawyers call a "case in point." It is not a good rule that will not work both ways. The suit was not commenced within six months.

The following is the authority in defence of the postmaster general in the matter wherein he is charged as being the surety of a defaulting postmaster in Kentucky.

[From the Baltimore Republican of May 2.]

"It is a further principle of law long settled, that in cases of suretyship, if the obligor fails to use due diligence against the principal, the security becomes released from his liability. The rule holds more forcible in the case under consideration. The sureties had a right to presume that the postmaster general would do his duty and see that his subordinate officers complied strictly with the laws. If he neglect his duty, he, and not the innocent sureties should be the sufferer, otherwise the sureties might be ruined by the defalcation of their principal, and have no knowledge of the fact until coerced to appear before a court of justice. The law of congress, therefore, wisely provides, that in case the postmaster general shall not cause suit to be commenced within six months from the end of every three months, the balance due from every such delinquent shall be charged to, and be recoverable from the postmaster general.

"It is admitted that the suit was not brought within the time; when brought was not sustained, and yet the Clay presses continue the cry that Barry is a defaulter."

There is another "case in point," which the reporter begs leave to refer the learned counsel when he has a similar suit. The case to which we refer is to be found in "Webster's spelling book, page 56, Albany edition, 1812." "The fable of the lawyer and the farmer." This authority is the elementary book of all lawyers.

Quere—Will the president order a suit against the postmaster general?

INDIAN WAR.

FROM THE ILLINOIS ADVOCATE.

Copy of a letter to gen. Clark, superintendent of Indian affairs.
Belleville, May 26, 1831.

General Clark, superintendent, &c.

Sir: In order to protect the citizens of this state, who reside near Rock Island, from Indian invasion and depredation, I have considered it necessary to call out a force of the militia of this state of about 700 strong, to remove a band of the Sac Indians who reside now about Rock Island. The object of the government of the state is to protect those citizens by removing said Indians peaceably, if they can, but forcibly, if they must. Those Indians are now, and so I have considered them, in a state of actual invasion of the state.

As you act as the general agent of the United States in relation to said Indians, I consider it my duty to inform you of the above call on the militia, and that in or about 15 days, a sufficient force will appear before these Indians to remove them dead or alive over the west side of the Mississippi. But to save all this disagreeable business, perhaps a request from you to them, for them to remove to the west side of the river, would effect the object of procuring peace to the citizens of the state. There is no disposition on the part of the people of this state to injure those unfortunate deluded savages, if they will let us alone; but a government that does not protect its citizens, deserves not the name of a government.

Please correspond with me on this subject. Your obedient servant,

JOHN REYNOLDS.

Superintendence of Indian affairs,
St. Louis, May 28, 1831.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 26th inst. informing me of your having considered it necessary to collect a force of militia, of about seven hundred, for the protection of the citizens of Illinois, who reside near Rock Island, from Indian invasion: and for the purpose of removing a band of Sac Indians, who are now about Rock Island, &c.

You intimate that to prevent the necessity of employing this force, perhaps a request from me to those Indians to remove to the west side of the Mississippi, would effect the object of procuring peace to the citizens of your state. In answer to which I would beg leave to observe, that every effort on my part has been made to effect the removal from Illinois of all the tribes who had ceded their lands.

For the purpose of affording you a view of what has been done, (in part), in relation thereto, I enclose you herewith extracts from the reports of the agent of the Sac and Fox tribes; by which it will be seen that every means short of actual force, has been employed to effect their removal.

I have communicated the contents of your letter to general Gaines, who commands the western division of the army, and has full power to execute any military movement deemed necessary for the protection of the frontier. I shall also furnish him with such information regarding the Sacs and Foxes, as I am possessed of; and would beg leave to refer you to him for any further proceeding in relation to this subject.

I have the honor to be, with high respect, your obedient serv't.

WILLIAM CLARK.

His excellency, John Reynolds,
governor of the state of Illinois.

Copy of a letter to major general Gaines.
Belleville May 23, 1831.

General Gaines,

Sir: I have received undoubted information, that the section of this state near Rock Island is actually invaded by a hostile band of the Sac Indians, headed by Black Hawk; and in order to repel said invasion, and to protect the citizens of the state, I have under the provisions of the constitution of the United States, and the laws of this state called on the militia to the number of seven hundred men, who will be mounted and ready for service in a very short time.

I consider it my duty to lay before you the above information, so as that you, commanding the military forces of the United States in this part of the union, may adopt such measures in regard to said Indians as you deem right.

The above mentioned mounted volunteers, (because such they will be), will be in readiness immediately to move against said Indians. And I, as executive of the state of Illinois, respectfully solicit your co-operation in this business.

Please honor me with an answer to this letter. With sincere respect for your character, I am your obedient servant,

JOHN REYNOLDS.

Copy of a letter from major general Gaines.
Head quarters, western department, May 29, 1831.

His excellency governor Reynolds:

Sir: I do myself the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday's date, advising me of your having received undoubted information, that the section of the frontier of your state near Rock Island, is invaded by a hostile band of Sac Indians, headed by the chief called Black Hawk. That in order to repel said invasion, and to protect the citizens of the state, you have called on the militia to the number of seven hundred militiamen, to be in readiness immediately to move against the Indians, and you solicit my co-operation.

In reply, it is my duty to state to you, that I have ordered six companies of the regular troops stationed at Jefferson barracks to embark to-morrow morning, and repair forthwith to the spot occupied by the hostile Sacs; to this detachment, I shall, if necessary, add four companies from Prairie du Chien, making a total of ten companies. With this force, I am satisfied that I shall be able to repel the invasion, and give security to the frontier inhabitants of the state. But should the hostile band be sustained by the residue of the Sac, Fox, or other Indians, to an extent requiring an augmentation of my force, I will, in that event, communicate with your excellency by express, and avail myself of the co-operation which you propose. But, under existing circumstances and the present aspect of our Indian relations on the Rock Island section of the frontier, I do not deem it necessary or proper, to require militia, or any other description of force, other than that of the regular army at this place, and Prairie du Chien. I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDMUND P. GAINES,
Major general, by brevet, commanding.

Belleville, May 31, 1831.

Col. Buckmaster: The annexed is a copy of a letter from major general Gaines to me which will show the situation in which we are placed. We had better remain in a state of readiness, so as to be able to operate efficiently with a militia force against said Indians, should it become necessary. Within one week from this date, I expect an express from the general, informing me of the situation of our affairs near Rock Island. When this information is received, it will not be difficult to decide our course. Respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN REYNOLDS.

Belleville, June 9, 1831.

Col. Buckmaster:

Sir: I have a call from general Gaines for our troops to co-operate with his regulars. The Indians, it is supposed, will give us a battle. You will cause the mounted volunteers of Madison to meet at Beairdstown on the 15th inst. At that place we will obtain provisions to reach Rock Island. The troops must furnish themselves with provisions to go to Beairdstown. Yours respectfully,

JOHN REYNOLDS.

STATISTICS OF POLAND.

Yesterday we gave a brief summary of the causes that led immediately to the present revolution in Poland. The Foreign Quarterly then proceeds to speak of "La grande Semaine des Polonais," but as the particulars of that week, and the events that have since taken place, are before our readers we pass them by.

Though our readers are all familiar with the patriotism, daring, and courage of the Poles, yet we think some new light will be shown, as to the country, population and resources, by the statistical account, which as promised yesterday, follows:

Since the establishment of the grand duchy of Warsaw, we may enpassant remark, the peasantry of that part of Poland have been emancipated; they live on the estates of the great landlord, each family having a cabin and thirteen acres of ground, on condition of working for the owner three days in the week. They may remove themselves, by giving up their tenements. Several proprietors have adopted the system of free labor and wages.

[N. Y. Mer. Adv.

From the London Foreign Quarterly.

"The kingdom of Poland is divided into eight palatinates, viz: Masovia, Cracow, Sandomir, Kalisz, Lublin, Plotsk and Augustown. The population, according to the last census in 1829, was (exclusive of the army) 4,088,290, which may be thus classed:—

"By their several races.		By their religion.
The real Poles	3,000,000	Roman Catholics	3,400,000
Rusini, or Rusniacks, from the eastern parts of ancient Poland	100,000	Greek Church	100,000
Lithuanians	200,000	Lutherans	150,000
Germans	300,000	Calvinists	5,000
Jews	400,000	Jews	400,000
		Other sects	5,000
	4,000,000		4,000,000

"The population of the towns is to that of the country as one to five.

Employed in agriculture, there are house holders	1,871,259
Their families and servants	2,221,188
Manufacturers	140,376
Their families	358,035
Tradesmen	49,888
Their families	121,331
Landed proprietors	4,205
Copyholders	1,886
Freeholders in towns	41,654
Persons employed under government	8,414
Patients in the 592 public hospitals	5,376
Prisoners in the 76 prisons	7,926

"The proportion between the nobles and the plebians is as one to thirteen.

"According to a verification made by the senate in 1824 there were in the kingdom 12 princes, 74 counts and 20 barons, besides the inferior or untitled nobility.

"The city of Warsaw reckoned, in 1815, only 80,000, inhabitants, it now amounts to 140,000, besides the garrison. The provincial towns are Lublin, having 13,400; Kalisch, 12,100; Plotsk, 9,200, &c. The population of the kingdom has been increasing since 1815, at the rate of 100,000 individuals every year.

"It appears from Dr. Rodecki's statistical tables published at Warsaw, in 1830,—that there are Jews in almost every town of the kingdom of Poland; that in 14 of these, their number is equal to that of the Christians, in 114 it is greater; in three, the inhabitants are either all Jews, or almost entirely so. In Warsaw alone they muster 30,000. Their number is fast increasing. They monopolise almost all trade, to the exclusion of the Christian population. The government has endeavored to check this evil, but with little success; and with this view professor Chiarini has been employed in translating the Thalmud, and in laying down a plan of reform for that singular people.

"The Catholic religion being that of the great majority of the kingdom, is under the special protection of the government, without infringing, however, on the public freedom of other forms of worship, and on the equality of individuals of every communion in the enjoyment of civil rights. The Catholic hierarchy consists of the archbishop of Warsaw, primate of the kingdom, and eight bishops, one for each palatinate.

"There are 1,638 parish churches, 117 auxiliary ones, 6 colleges, 11 seminaries, 151 male convents, and 29 female. In 1819, Pope Pius VII. suppressed by a bull 31 male convents and 13 female. The number of the clergy of the Latin Catholic church is 2,740. The Greek Catholics have a bishop at Chelm, 287 parish churches, 1 seminary, and 5 male convents. Their priests amount to 354. There are, besides, 6 churches of the Russo-Greek communion under the jurisdiction of the bishop of Minsk. 29 Lutheran and 9 Calvinist churches, having their respective consistories, 2 of the sect of Philipines, 274 synagogues, and 2 Mahomedan mosques with their imams!

"The university of Warsaw was founded in 1816 in lieu of that of Cracow, and it consists of five faculties, having 48 professors, and about 750 students. There are besides at Warsaw four lyceums, besides other schools, Sunday schools for mechanics, and girls' schools. In the provinces are 11 palatine schools and 14 district ones. In all the kingdom there are 1,756 professors or teachers, nearly 30,000 students, and about 11,000 female pupils.

"In all chief towns of palatinates there are civil and criminal courts, besides commissions of peace in every district. The two courts of appeal and the supreme court assemble at Warsaw. The senate takes cognizance of offences against the state; there are also a court of commerce and a territorial court.

"The army consisted, in 1830, of eight regiments of infantry of the line, besides the guards, four regiments of light infantry, eight regiments of cavalry, besides the yagers of the guard, two brigades of foot artillery, and two do. of horse; a corps of engineers, &c. in all 36,000 men. The arsenal and foundry are at Warsaw.—There are two fortresses in the kingdom, Zamosk and Modlin. Every individual from 20 to 30 years of age is subject to military service, except in cases of exemption provided by law. The two new military schools, formed in 1825, near Warsaw, have educated already 7,000 pupils.

"The budget of 1827, consists as follows:

Receipts.	*Florins.
Direct taxes	17,646,652
Indirect do.	40,685,630
Income of national lands and forests	7,048,265
Income from tolls and rates on bridges, roads, &c.	3,769,955
Receipt from mines, mint, prisoners' labour, &c.	2,837,600
Total	71,988,102

Expenses.	Florins.
Civil list reduced in 1822, from 2,324,705 to	1,508,450
Vice-roy, senate, council of state	924,609
Ministry of public instruction and religious worship	3,831,821
Do. of justice	2,528,901

Charges on separate administrations	2,837,600
Total	69,916,030

"There are in the kingdom, especially about Kielce, mines of iron, zinc, coals, and also copper and lead.

"Of the 451 towns in the kingdom 353 consist more than half of wooden houses; 83 are entirely of wood; 6 have half their houses made of brick; and 9 consist of more brick than wooden houses. Warsaw contains 1,540 brick, and 1,421 wooden houses.

"Besides the towns, of which 214 are national property and 237 belong to private families, there are in the kingdom 22,365 villages, 5,373 of which are national, and 16,992 private property.

"The communications have been extensively improved since 1815. Two fine substantial roads cross the whole kingdom, one from Kalisz to Brzesk Litewski, another from Cracow to the Neimen, both passing through Warsaw. Diligences have been established; inns and post houses erected; 523 bridges have been constructed or repaired. Embankments, in great part of stone, have been raised to restrain the waters of the Vistula. The other rivers have been cleansed, and a canal has been cut to join the Narva to the Niemen.

"The city of Warsaw has wonderfully improved since the peace. New streets, squares, palaces, gardens, private and public buildings have been constructed either by government or by individuals, assisted, in many instances, by the public treasury. The streets are well lighted, several of them have been Macadamized. The management of prisons has been ameliorated, the convicts are employed in the public works, mendicity has been suppressed. A society of beneficence has been formed at Warsaw, as well as a society of the friends of science. A new exchange, a new theatre, the new church of St. Alexander, new barracks, and a monument to Copernicus, by Thorwaldson have been raised.

"The exports of the kingdom consist chiefly in corn and cattle, besides honey, wax, timber, wool, hides and tallow. The imports are wines, tobacco, colonial produce and articles of luxury and fashion.

"The manufacturers of woollen cloth, linen, carpets, and leather, have thriven since the peace. While in 1815 there were hardly one hundred looms for coarse woollen cloths, there are now above six thousand, which now supply the whole kingdom, including the army. More than ten thousand families of foreign workmen, chiefly German and Swiss, have expatriated to Poland, where they have built new towns and peopled districts formerly deserted. There are numerous distilleries of spirits, and the brewing trade is also very extensive; they brew porter and ale equal to those of England. By the former laws of Poland commerce was depressed; and no noble, however poor, could, without degradation, resort to it, whilst he often served in a menial capacity a richer nobleman.

"The balance of trade between the kingdom of Poland and the neighboring states in 1827, stood as follows:—

	Florins.
Imports from Russia	11,079,683
Exports to do.	14,548,522
Imports from Prussia	20,216,433
Exports to do.	15,544,730
Imports from Austria	8,527,480
Exports to do.	91,697
Imports from the republic of Cracow	748,857
Exports to do. do.	2,880,265

"Agriculture, which is still the principal occupation of the population, suffers under a depression of prices. In 1827, they reaped 4,439,899 korsecs† of rye, 3,183,023 of oats, 1,506,062 of barley, and 751,076 of wheat, besides 4,289,185 korsecs of potatoes, and hay, flax, hemp, and honey. The cattle are improving both in quantity and quality.

"In 1827 there were in the kingdom 694,728 cows; 475,946 oxen; 259,990 calves, 703,207 pigs, about two million and a half sheep, 192,841 horses, 8,771 stallions, 167,901 mares. About one half of the extent of the territory of the kingdom may be reckoned to be cultivated, one-fourth of the remainder is occupied by forests, and the rest by marshes and uncultivated lands.

*The Polish florin is about sixpence sterling. It is divided into 30 groschet.

†A korsec is nearly two hundred weight. It is divided into 32 garnices, of four kwartz each.

☞Mr. Madison's letter concerning the bank of the United States, see page 351, must go far, indeed, to correct the judgment of those who have sincerely believed in the unconstitutionality of that institution. It was after his manner, but with much less power, that we have often reasoned with ourselves for several years past—and by so doing, had nearly retired from those opinions which we formerly entertained on that subject. But thus guided by the FATHER OF THE CONSTITUTION—one of the ablest and best men, too, that ever lived, we have no hesitation in saying, frankly and openly, that we now have no doubt as to the constitutionality of the bank of the United States; and that, the question of re-chartering it should be decided according to the expediency of the proceeding—as presented, when the time to act upon the matter shall arrive.

☞The luscious rewards that I offered for the discovery of "free trade," have not yet been claimed—and I do not think that my friends of the "National Intelligencer" will have a "chance" for a seat at the feast—so justly due, because of their courtesy in copying my advertisement!—which, however, has not yet been published in a single "free-trade" paper that I have seen, no editor of any such having had soul enough to return my disposition to oblige, in giving place to the call for a "free trade" convention, to be held at Philadelphia, a little while hence. Do the gentlemen who have talked so much about "free trade," duly consider the condition in which they are about to be placed before the people?—are they prepared to admit that that which they have so highly recommended as a wise policy, is condemned as RANK FOOLISHNESS by the civilized nations in the world?—that their beautiful theories are as idle as the dreams of the follower of Mahomet, respecting associations with female dancing-angels after death?—that they have been preaching to the people about a thing which is not—or if it is, may be so easily shewn? And, really—ten bushels of York river oysters, two dozen Piankitank terrapins, and a dozen of Adlum's best wine, are not to be despised—they are not every-day things! They are worth at least 20 dollars!!! Cannot we find a respectable man to certify the existence of the "free trade," which we daily see in —— the newspapers, for so great a reward? —the CASH, or the oysters, the terrapins and the wine? What—all dumb as oysters, and flat too, as those caught in the Patapsco? Earn the reward, somebody!—and we'll have such a feast as Jupiter himself never gave to the gods!—for, by some little practice, we pretty well understand the preparation of the articles named. There is no speculation in that!

Oyez, Oyez, Oyez!—Don't nobody know nothen about somethen that's called "free trade?"

POLITICAL ITEMS. Lewis Cass, of Ohio, (governor of Michigan), has been appointed secretary of war—Mr. White, of Tennessee, not accepting.

The Richmond Whig says—"The fact is, we believe, clearly ascertained, that John Randolph has transmitted positive instructions to withdraw his name from the canvass for congress." We almost regret this.

We see it stated that a daily paper is about to be published in the city of Washington, avowedly to advocate the election of John McLean to the presidency of the United States.

Dr. P. G. Randolph, brother-in-law of major Eaton, and late acting secretary of war, has resigned his place of chief clerk in the war department, and of course, retires altogether from it. Until the arrival of gen. Cass, one of the members of the "cabinet" will discharge the duties of the secretary. It is stated that Dr. R. would have been dismissed, had he not resigned.

We insert a copy of the letter of a committee of the "Union and state rights party," at Charleston, who invited the president to dine with them on the 4th of July, and his reply. The letter of the committee, because thought to impute an opposition to the union of the states, in the "state rights and free trade party," has caused no small degree of excitement at Charleston, and a meeting was to be held with a view to repel it, "in the spirit that belongs to the occasion." We are glad that the anniversary passed over without a contact between the parties, which some hot ones seemed to wish might happen!

Mr. Van Buren has declined a public dinner at Albany—because "the nature of his engagements at this time renders such a course a matter of personal inconvenience." The Daily Advertiser says a main reason for declining the honor was, that Mr. Van Buren would have been expected to "make a speech, explaining the cause of his withdrawal from the cabinet."

The "New York Courier and Enquirer," was stricken off the list of printers employed by the corporation, by a vote of the board of aldermen—but the other branch of the city legislature refused to concur. The following is a specimen of what the editors of that paper were pleased to say on the occasion:

"Our time will not permit us to pursue this subject at present; but let these enemies of their country tremble for the fate that awaits them. Let them thank their God that they live in a community the members of which are more orderly and more respectable than they, their representatives; and that in consequence they may escape being TARRED and FEATHERED. If, however, the scorn and indignation of honest men—if the contempt and pity of a whole people is to be dreaded—then have they cause of alarm."

A MIRACLE!—wit in the Richmond Enquirer! "Mr. Niles changes the favorite saying of Cato, about Carthage, into "Delenda est Telescopium"—and hopes as he has made the Latin for our use, we will "of courtesy excuse it, in obedience to the old saw "don't look a gift horse in the mouth." The Latin is bad enough—and we readily excuse it, because we expected no better. But Mr. N. mistakes the expression in English, as well as in Latin—Instead of a "gift horse" he might truly have said "an ungifted horse in the mouth." [GOOD!

"AS WELL AS COULD BE EXPECTED"—want of candor in the Richmond Enquirer! Such is the unfortunate habit of Mr. Ritchie, that it seems almost impossible for him to present an opponent to his readers with a decent respect for their judgment. No one has a right to be confident that the sun shines at noon-day, unless admitted in the commentaries of this quill-driving guide in all things. And it is his manner to offer the opinions or represent the proceedings of others, so much in his own way, that those who entertained such opinions or conducted such proceedings, know not either of them, under his grave corrections and obsta principiis deductions! In this little matter, had he copied the word "made" in Italic, as I marked and printed it, his "oyster-knife" wit would not have amounted to much at this—"MOMENTOUS CRISIS!"—for persons would then have thought it possible that, "ungifted" as I am, the Latin word for Telescope might have been discovered, through the assistance of some friend, knowing how to make references in a dictionary almost as well as Mr. R. himself!

But as Mr. Thomas Ritchie does not like my make of Latin out of English, I shall try to please him by making English out of French. The motto of the "Richmond Enquirer" is verite sans peur—which I take the liberty to render "TRUTH as CONVENIENT." My "authority" is in the "East Room letter"—which was so slowly, and faintly, and delicately acknowledged to have originated in a "mistake"—though on the face of it, there was positive evidence that a tissue of coldly calculated falsehoods had been determined on, by the "honorable" correspondent of the "Richmond Enquirer."

Let us not, however, give up all hope of the editor of the "Enquirer!" He is quite melancholy, because that certain toasts were drank at Richmond at the late anniversary, and perchance may get upon the stool of repentance, because of the "signs of the times"—when we may expect new discoveries of "nuisances" and "curses"—or their opposites, as convenience requires.

It may be well to remark, for the sake of record, that Mr. Ritchie just now seems not a little cheered with a hope that the anti-masons will reduce Mr. Clay's chance of success, and he publishes many articles the tendency of which is "to fan the embers" of the supposed opposition of these to him. For example, see his paper of July 5.

COAL. A benefit of almost incalculable value is now being conferred on the inhabitants of our cities and large towns, and in aid of manufactures and the mechanic arts, in the roads and canals latterly made by which the coal fields of our country are brought into use. It is the less matter whether the stock in these roads and canals yield a large profit to capitalists, or admit of no dividend at all—but it is more than probable that the savings made to the people, because of such roads and canals, is already nearly equal, in one year, to the whole cost of such improvements. It is in this way that roads and canals ought to be valued—they are mighty "labor-saving machines," and, indeed, NATIONAL OBJECTS.

We have an idea of a calculation of the values of some of the roads and canals already made; and, perhaps, shall, at some period when less pressed for time than at present, attempt a statement on facts obtained. Our idea is this—say, that before the present turnpike roads or canals between Philadelphia and Pittsburg were made, the cost of transportation between those cities was six dollars the cwt. and that now it is only two dollars. Then further admit that the goods transported between the two cities, (or intermediate places), equal an amount of 30,000 tons annually, the whole distance—then,

30,000 tons at 120 dollars	$3,600,000
Same, at 40	1,200,000
	$2,400,000

And the real annual saving, which is added to the national wealth, or national comfort, is two millions four hundred thousand dollars.

Such calculations are founded on very simple elements—and the character of their operation cannot be mistaken. The goods are transported at least as safely as before, and the time gained, because of a saving of interest on the value of the goods, (which are not available while in transit), would amount to a sum sufficient, perhaps, of itself, to pay the interest of the money expended in making the improvements specially referred to! And suppose that we add the time and subsistence saved by persons journeying between Philadelphia and Pittsburg, or the Ohio—for "time is money," as "Ben. Franklin" said? But it would be difficult, indeed, to trace all the beneficent ramifications of this great arm of the "AMERICAN SYSTEM."

Economy and solid comfort for the poor. A stove for cooking with Anthracite coal, which costs but a dollar and a half, may be seen at the office of the Lehigh coal company, in Front street. The committee of superintendence of New York, who examined this stove, states that, with six cents worth of Anthracite coal, a room has been warmed, and the cooking of a family performed for a day.

Delaware and Hudson canal company's office,
Honesdale, June 11, 1831.

Received at Honesdale by rail road from Carbondale, for the week ending this day, 720 rail road wagons, containing 1,800 tons coal; a total received since 20th March, 21,600 tons. Arrived at Honesdale from Bolton in the same, 92 boats with merchandise, &c. Cleared at Honesdale for Bolton, in the same time, 82 boats containing 2,296 tons coal.

WEST INDIA TRADE. A very able writer in the "United States Gazette," has severely dissected and broadly exposed, (in a series of numbers), the instructions and pleadings and proceedings of Messrs. Van Buren and McLane, in relation to the West India trade—which, Mr. Ritchie's opinion to the contrary, we have steadily regarded as a sheer "humbug," obtained in a disreputable manner, and intended for party-political effect—as every one will believe who shall honestly read the essays that we have alluded to. Practical evil, rather than good, has so far resulted from this arrangement, and we shall probably suffer no small degree of positive injury in our navigation, because that we begged so humbly for that which every West India merchant in Baltimore, we believe, thought would render no benefit, if obtained.*

The following article will shew that the matter is "working," just as we stated some weeks ago. The transportation of the products of the west, so far as they were required for the supply of the British dominions in Europe or America, is to be in British bottoms.

From the Cleveland, (O.) Advertiser of June 28.

☞ Colonial act. The advantages that the inhabitants of this part of the country will experience by the passage of this act, which we published in our paper two weeks since, is already beginning to create a spirit of enterprise among our business men, to turn trade into another channel. The exhibition of the following prices current of different articles in the Montreal market, will serve to open the eyes of the people to the benefits they may receive by improving the act.

Montreal June 14, 1831.

Wheat,	$1 40 per bushel.
Flour,	6 a 6 50 per bbl.
Ashes, pots,	6 20, cwt.
Do. pearls,	6 90, cwt.

Thus it will be seen that flour is worth more by $1 25 per barrel than in New York, and when we take into contemplation that the carrying of the article to Montreal amounts to only $1 02—35 or 40 cents cheaper on the barrel than the transportation on the Erie canal, we may well congratulate ourselves on this great and beneficial change, which interests every man in the country. And what is still more fortunate, we are to receive from this act the benefit of a staple market. By the existing laws, Canadian wheat can be sent to Great Britain at all times, on payment of 5*s.* per quarter, [8 bushels], and we can avail ourselves of the West India market free of duty.

We trust the effect of this act will be to turn the attention of every western man to the Canada market, and thereby procure the highest price for his products.

When the Rideau canal shall be completed, which will be most probably next season, there will be a new revolution in the affairs of trade, that will open to the far west. In some future number, a more minute and particular notice will be given of this subject; we can assure the reader it will not be lost sight of.

RAIL ROADS, &c. On the 29th and 30th ult. it was known that a contractor on the 3rd division of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, about 25 miles from the city,

*The rush to Jamaica with flour has ruined the market altogether—from the 25th March to the 17th June 22,558 barrels arrived at Kingston, only—and the market was so glutted, that, to use the words of a mercantile house in that city, "it was impossible to say how it would terminate." We shall soon partly know the "how," in proceedings for the "relief of insolvent debtors."

had absconded, leaving his laborers unpaid, and that they, (as too often happens in Ireland, the country which, in general, they had recently left), had taken the law into their own hands, were wantonly destroying the property of the company, because their employer had wronged them! They were between 200 and 300 strong, and, with pick axes, hammers and sledges, made a most furious attack on the rails, sills, &c. and whatever else they could destroy. The sheriff of the county, and his posse, was resisted by these ignorant or wicked men—and a requisition was made on brig. gen. Geo. H. Steuart for a detachment of the volunteers under his command—and, though it rained very heavily, a sufficient number of patriotic soldiers started in the cars from the depot at about 10 o'clock in the night of the 30th June, and reached the scene of violence before day-light next morning, fully prepared to put-down such outrageous proceedings: but those who had resisted the civil officers so rudely and violently, suffered themselves to be arrested by the military, without opposition, or precipitately fled—and none of them were personally injured. In the afternoon, about 40 of those reported to be principals, were brought into Baltimore and lodged in jail, and 18 or 20, arrested by a detachment which remained behind for the purpose, were sent in and committed next day, and so the riot and rum ended. The directors of the company have presented their thanks to gen. Steuart and the officers and men of the detachment, for the promptness and energy, and moderation, with which they acted.

The prisoners, being brought before judge Hanson on a subsequent day, were severally examined. But the judge discharged thirty-seven of them on their own recognizances, or without being bound to appear at all—having every wish, (in common with all the inhabitants of the city), to release those who had been led, or driven, into this monstrous outrage, by others—but the supposed leaders were remanded for trial, and will remain in prison till then.

In consequence of the flight of the contractor, the riots and arrest of the rioters—the wives and children of these laborers were in a very destitute condition. The rail road company immediately sent out liberal supplies of provisions under the charge of careful persons, and relieved them effectually.

We understand that the contractor was highly recommended—and that the agents of the company made every rightful effort to quiet the rioters, before even calling upon the sheriff to protect the road; and that there would have been no difficulty, but for the leadings of a few desperate men—who are now in a way to be taught, we trust, that there is LAW "in this land of LIBERTY."

The company, surely, ought to be very cautious in the employment of contractors—but it is a delicate and difficult business to interfere between them and their laborers, over whom it is indispensable that they should have an entire control. And we understand that a large part of the money lost by these poor men, was rather caused by their suffering it to accumulate in the hands of the contractor, than on account of his inability, or unwillingness, to make payment at the regular periods. We think that a plan might be easily contrived by which the company could be rendered responsible for all sums beyond the current weekly or monthly wages—whereby the working people would be secure in their earnings—and contractors, because of the smallness of the amount of money in their hands, have no sufficent inducement thus to prey upon the poor. But it is justice to add, that, with two or three exceptions, the contractors have faithfully performed their engagements—and are gentlemen of high respectability and great worth.

It is difficult to suppose persons so wrong-headed as to believe that such acts of violence could be tolerated and pass unpunished. The Irishman's heart generally is, and always would be, in the right place—but the oppression which he suffered at home has not yet ceased to have effect on his head—and, though his person has been transferred to America, it takes him some considerable time to shake off those prejudices and habits that belonged to and influenced him in the land of his birth*—trodden under foot by a conqueror for centuries, and impoverished and abused for the glory of the oppressor—who to secure the dependence of Ireland, long discouraged, if not absolutely prohibited the establishment of numerous manufactures, and checked the education of the people, on the principle that, in some other places, makes it an offence to teach persons to read! Let us then pass over as easily as we can, the doings of the great majority of these men, and charge them to account of British domination—but the principals, who knew better, should severely be made to feel the just weight of the law.

The damage done to the road is very extensive—and it will cost several thousand dollars to restore things to the condition in which they were.

* We have many and melancholy and disgraceful proofs of what is here stated, in the riotous contentions of natives of Ireland—(though naturalized citizens of the United States!) about religious creeds—that which every genuine American regards with the utmost detestation; for he will not allow any one to be violently questioned because of the faith which he professes if fulfilling those duties which every man owes to society. It was only the other day, at a celebration of the "battle of the Boyne," by the Gideonites or Orangemen, at Philadelphia, by a procession and dinner, &c. that a regular fight with swords, clubs, brickbats, &c. took place between them and the "Catholic party"—some of the peace-officers being knocked down, and a good many of the combattants strewed on the streets, nearly murdered. The mayor acted with great resolution and vigor; but there was a pelting of some houses with stones till the morning. Irishmen, in America, cannot be justified in that celebration which Englishmen contrived to keep the Irish in a state of hostility among themselves—nor can the other party be excused in violating the public peace on account of it. Several persons were arrested, and of both parties, to answer for this outrage.

The locomotive "York" is now making regular trips from Baltimore and Ellicott's mills—leaving the depot at half past 9 A. M. and 3 P. M. every day. The "York" is capable of transporting about twenty tons, or 150 passengers, including the weight of seven or eight cars in her train, at the desirable rate of velocity—varying from 10 to 20 miles in an hour. Thus laden, she ascended the last mile of the road to Ellicott's which is much curved and rises thirteen feet, in four minutes.

It is expected that this road will reach tide-water, in the city of Baltimore, about the 1st October, and be extended down Pratt street to the City Block, as soon as it shall appear necessary and expedient to do so.

The Baltimore and Susquehannah rail road was opened for public travel on the 4th of July—the rails, on one track, being laid for more than six miles—through the valley of Jones' falls (or creek), and forms an excursion not less interesting than the ascent of the Patapsco valley, by the Baltimore and Ohio rail road. It is intended that this road shall reach York and York Haven, Pennsylvania, if the legislature of that state will allow it.

About 150 persons sometimes proceed in the train of cars which departs at 4 o'clock P. M.

The "Chronicle" of the 8th inst has the following—

An experiment was tried yesterday, on the Susquehannah rail road, which though simple in itself is of the greatest importance, as affording security to the cars against the possibility of accident. It consists in placing the horses between two cars, where they are confined by means of shafts extending from one car to the other, resting at each end upon the pivot piece, so as to allow them free play in passing the curves. The shafts are made of strong timber, so that the horse or horses cannot possibly get off the road; and to guard against the horse stumbling, a broad belt of leather is passed from shaft to shaft underneath the animal, of sufficient strength to prevent his going down—for greater security, two bows of iron are made to pass from the shafts over the back of the horse. By all these means, the horse though entirely free in his action, is confined above, below and on each side, so that it is impossible for him to get off the track of the road.

By means of this simple contrivance, passengers travelling on this road may do so with the most perfect assurance of safety, from the many accidents and alarms arising from the horses' stumbling or flying the track. Mr. Isaac Knight, of this city, is the inventor; and we trust will receive due credit for this addition to the safety and comfort of his fellow citizens.

The three first sections of the New Castle and French Town rail road, or three miles, were travelled by large parties on the 4th July.

A valuable young man, son of the proprietor of the New York steam car, on the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, having left the car, (which was partially stopped) to place one of the slips at a turn-out, unfortunately stumbled, and was killed, by the car passing over him.

The proposed rail road from Winchester to the Potomac, will, in effect, be a branch of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, leading into one of the richest countries in the United States.

From the Winchester Republican of July 7.

We are at length enabled to lay before the friends of the proposed rail road from Winchester to the Potomac, a copy of the law in relation thereto. Its provisions will be seen to be highly favorable to the stockholders: we allude more particularly to that fixing the rate of tolls and that precluding the interference of the legislature hereafter. The latter provision is not in the Petersburg rail road charter, of which it was understood ours was a copy, and it consequently gives ours a decided advantage over that scheme, popular as it has proved among our lowland brethren.

It will be seen that 4 cents a ton per mile is allowed to be charged, equal to 12 cents on each barrel of flour from Winchester to Harper's Ferry. At the lowest calculation, 125,000 barrels will be carried upon the road each year, yielding a revenue of 15,000 dollars from this source alone, exceeding five per cent. on the cost of the work, ($300,000). In the report to the Winchester meeting in April last, the amount of flour to be transported was computed to be about one-fourth of the trade upon the road; so that, if the report be sustained throughout, (and all its calculations, we believe, were admitted to be below the mark), the revenue from investments in the road will be twenty per cent. on every dollar advanced.

We are aware that this result will be regarded as visionary, and that its serious presentation to the public is calculated to produce distrust in the whole enterprise. But such is the law, and we do believe that if the rate of tolls authorised by it shall be demanded by the company, the stock will yield this enormous interest—at the same time that the expense of transportation will be reduced three-fourths below its present cost. It is probable, however, that the company will fix a lower rate, one which will produce an interest of 10 or 12 per cent. and that this interest will be realized by every stockholder, will not admit of any doubt.

☞The following is a summary of the law alluded to in the preceding article:

The capital stock of the company is $300,000, but the company is declared to be incorporated when four thousand shares ($100,000) are subscribed.

The concerns of the company are to be under the control and management of a president and five directors, to be chosen annually by the stockholders in general meeting; but the president or directors may, at any time, be removed by a majority of the votes of the stockholders.

No court in the commonwealth shall have power to issue any injunction or process to stay the progress of the work.

As soon as ten miles of the road shall be completed, the president and directors are required to commence the transportation of produce, &c.

The tolls allowed are as follows, viz: on produce descending not exceeding 4 cents, per ton per mile—on return loads not exceeding 6 cents, per ton per mile; and on passengers not more than 3 cents per mile.

Each stockholder shall be allowed one vote for each share as far as ten shares, and one vote for every five shares above ten.

The dividends to be declared semi-annually as soon as the road is completed.

The road is to be commenced within two years, and completed within ten.

All parts of the act are declared to be under the control of any future legislature, and liable to be altered or modified thereby, except so much thereof as relates to the rate of tolls, which cannot be diminished.

Two thousand five hundred passengers, and four hundred tons of goods, have been transported on the rail road, between Liverpool and Manchester, in one day.

PRESIDENT JACKSON. The anniversary of independence was celebrated at Norfolk with more than usual ceremony; not only by a military parade, orations, &c. but also by a civic procession, consisting of the followers of the various branches of the mechanic arts, with banners and emblems, &c.

The president of the United States being at fortress Monroe, in the neighborhood of Norfolk, was, with Mr. Trist, invited to attend the public dinner on the occasion. The following is his reply to the invitation:

Rip Raps, July 1, 1831.

Gentlemen: Your polite invitation on behalf of the volunteer corps of Norfolk to their celebration of the 55th anniversary of the independence of our happy country, is received. A resolution, long since taken, not to partake of a public dinner during my continuance in office, prevents me from enjoying the pleasure of being your guest on this occasion.

The birth day of our independence and freedom will ever awaken, in every bosom worthy of the high privilege, sentiments of the most delightful character, and although not personally present, my soul will be with you in commemoration of an event that has afforded the first proof that man is capable of self-government.

Accept, gentlemen, for yourselves, and for the fellow citizens you represent, the assurance of my high respect and cordial regard. ANDREW JACKSON.

PRESIDENT'S COMB." We have already noticed a splendid shell comb, made at Mr. Willard's extensive manufactory at Boston, as a present to the president of the U. States, and by him to be presented to some lady of his household. The letter of Mr. John Jones (the maker of the comb) to the president, and his reply, have been published—we give the following extracts from Mr. Jones' letter, and add the reply of the president at full length:

"You will perceive that on each side of your own portrait are to be seen also the portraits of Washington and Lafayette. I was induced to place, as it were, the names of these great men in conjunction with your own conspicuously, upon the comb, because I believe the fame of the trio are inseparately connected, and fast bound up in the hearts of the American people. The eagle which surmounts the comb and who holds in his beak a scroll with the words 'New Orleans' inscribed upon it, I hope speak for themselves."

"This trifling present, sir, such, as it is, I now offer you, not as a practical illustration of the benefits flowing from the 'American System,' but as a token of my undiminished regard for the man who, in the cabinet and in the field, has shed an unfading lustre upon our national history, and who, in the memorable words of the illustrious Jefferson, 'has filled the measure of his country's glory.'"

Washington city, June 16th, 1831.

DEAR SIR: The beautiful shell comb which you have so kindly presented to me, and described in your letter of the 6th instant, has been received, and is most thankfully accepted. As a specimen of the success which is sure to attend American skill, wherever it meets on equal terms that of foreign competitors in the various departments of manufacture—this comb, sir, possesses a value far above that which it derives from its qualities as a mere product of mechanic labor—a value which is illustrative of national prosperity, and which, as such, cannot fail to have weight in confirming the wisdom of that policy which seeks to enlarge our home production of all the subjects of national wealth.

It shall be highly prized also, sir, as a token of your partial regard for my own character, and of the undeserved honor which you have paid me, by placing my likeness by the side of those of Washington and Lafayette.

It will be worn by my niece, Mrs. Donelson, who will take a pride in preserving it. Very respectfully, your obedient servant. ANDREW JACKSON.

"HORN GUN FLINTS." "Economy is great gain," said Franklin—but it is not by making "horn gun flints" that economical Yankees realize profits on their industry! Like the Indian's gun, "they cost more than they would come to." It is rather by the pursuit of "notions" like the following that they become rich.

One of the very large manufacturing villages in Massachusetts—having people enough and buildings sufficient to make at least half a dozen "county towns" in some parts of the United States, is without a place at which spirituous liquors are sold—either in large or small quantities. And we observe that a ship of 400 tons, called the Constellation, has lately been launched at Hallowell, Maine—which vessel was built, launched, and fitted, and has gone to sea, without ardent spirits.

THE POWER OF INTELLECT. It used to be a saying, that there were only two kinds of law in Baltimore—club-law and Pinkney-law, because of the great power of the late Mr. Pinkney before a court and jury. The "Nantucket Inquirer" has the following with reference to Mr. Webster:

Friendly advice. A gentleman meeting his friend, accosted him by saying, "I have wished to see you for some days, for I am in trouble, and wish your friendly advice." "What can it be," replied the other: "Why, I have a lawsuit, and Webster is opposed to me; what shall I do?"—His friend replied, "my advice is, your only chance of escape is to send to Smyrna, and import a young earthquake."

CALCULATION. A student of the Virginia university, lately made a calculation, founded on data derived from the most accurate tables of mortality, that the chances were more than 1,721 millions to one, that Jefferson and Adams would not both die on the day which they actually expired.

Now, what would be the number of chances against what has happened, that of the four ex-presidents of the United States deceased, three died on the 4th July?

[Since this query was in type, we have met with a curious and apparently learned and correct calculation in the New York Evening Post, the result of which is, that the chances against Adams, Jefferson and Monroe dying on the 4th of July, were in the inconceivable proportion of eighteen billions, two hundred and sixty-eight thousand, two hundred and seventy-three millions, nine hundred and eighty thousand, four hundred and thirty-two to one! or to state it in a more comprehensible way, a bet on this remarkable combination of events, to correspond with the chances, should have been 18,268 millions of a dollar to one mill! What ample ground then is there for the astonishment that is felt by the nation, on account of the wonderful coincidence in the deaths of these three distinguished men. 18,268,273,930,432 to 1!]

MR. N. D. COLEMAN, late a member of congress from Kentucky, has published an apology to his constituents for his vote to repeal the 25th section of the judiciary act. He says he was ruled to vote before he was ready; before he had read the bill, or reports, on the subject: that he is now satisfied the 25th section is not in violation of the constitution, but that the power which it confers on the supreme court is a proper one, and that he would have voted, finally, against expunging that section, if an opportunity had been allowed.

Mr. Wickliffe has also felt compelled to say that his vote was rather to amend than repeal the section—and Mr. Yancey's excuse is, that he was led into the difficulty by following Mr. Wickliffe, who, being a lawyer ought to have known all about it!

COMPUNCTION. The acting secretary of the treasury acknowledges the receipt by this day's mail, of one hundred dollars transmitted anonymously, from New York, with the following request: "The 100 dollars enclosed you will put into the treasury for balance due them."

Treasury department, July 7, 1831.

☞ If the British agents at New York were visited with a spirit of restitution, and had the ability to be honest, and would be so—we should make a great dash at the public debt in the present year—and pay off, perhaps, one half its whole amount!

CHARITY! The Nantucket Inquirer, in noticing the persecution of the Quakers by the "puritans" of Massachusetts in olden times, says, it "had its origin in the severe and popish spirit of excommunication." It certainly had not its origin in the mild and POPISH toleration which characterised the Roman Catholic colony of Maryland!! How prone are we all to refer our admitted errors to the evil examples of others—and to consider their virtues exceptions to the general rule of their corruption.

PUNCTUALITY. The general court of Virginia is now in session in Richmond. The Compiler says, judge Upshur has taken his seat. So, that there are nineteen judges present. Only one absent—and he detained by indisposition. The court is engaged in actively disposing of the commonwealth's cases.

DIED, at his residence in Talbot county, Maryland, on Monday last, at 3 o'clock, P. M. DANIEL MARTIN, esquire, governor of Maryland, after about three day's illness. His disease was the gout in the stomach.

Mr. Martin possessed a strong and nicely discriminating mind—a resolute honesty and fearlessness of consequences in the doing of what he thought right—and was yet more remarkable for the kindness of his heart. He was high-minded, generous and truly hospitable—zealous in the defence and support of the poor and the worthy, against the oppressions or dictations of the wealthy and presuming—always ready to resist mean and cruel actions. He was the delight of his private friends—and political opponents forgot all their enmities when associating with him as a man. But how great the loss of such a husband and father!

By the decease of Mr. Martin, George Howard, esq. of Anne Arundel county, being first named member of the executive council, has become, de jure, governor of Maryland.

INDIAN WAR. We see accounts from Rushville, Illinois, St. Louis, Missouri, and Niles, Michigan, concerning the state of affairs with the Sac and Fox indians, at Rock Island. The militia from Illinois, about 1,600 men in all, left Rushville on the 19th June, to join gen. Gaines. Many of the men are mounted—and the greater part are volunteers. From St. Louis we have a report that a party of 200 soldiers, sent out to repair certain fences which the Indians had destroyed, were driven back into the fort with considerable loss. From Niles it is reported that the Indians were holding councils and concentrating their forces, and that they had threatened Chicago. These hostile movements are ascribed to the intrigues of British emissaries among the Indians. Those in the vicinity of Niles were very peaceable.

THE 4TH OF JULY. A nullifier in the Beaufort Gazette, protested against the celebration of the late fourth of July, and urged the propriety "of refraining, on that day, from joyance and festivity of all kinds." He contended that "it should be a day, not of mutual congratulation, but of humiliation and regretful remembrance"—and closed the essay as follows: "let it be a day, not of exultation, but of fasting, humiliation and prayer!"

THE UNITED STATES BANK has declared a dividend of three and a half per cent. for the last six months, payable on the 14th inst.

GEN. BERNARD. We regret to learn that this valuable officer and excellent man has resigned his place as chief engineer in the service of the United States. He is about to return to his native country, and dedicate his talents to her service.

KING WILLIAM. The British papers have a long account of a project of col. Ogden, of the 1st New Jersey regiment, and which had the sanction of Washington, to capture the then young prince William and admiral Digby, &c in their quarters in the city of New York, in 1782—the execution of which, however, was not attempted, as it appeared that the British general commanding must have received some hint of the scheme, for he suddenly increased his sentries, &c. and so the prince escaped—being more fortunate than one of his younger brothers who was captured by a Vermontese tailor, and "beautifully" kicked after the sovereign manner of a republican, for his impudence to the tailor's wife.

VERMONT. An unsuccessful attempt has been made to elect a member of congress to fill the vacancy caused by the decease of Mr. MALLARY. There were three candidates, Mr. Slade, anti-mason, Williams, Clay, White, Jackson. The first nearly succeeded—the last had very few votes.

NEW HAMPSHIRE. In the house of representatives, 14th June, a resolution that the committee on military affairs be instructed to introduce a bill to abolish all militia musters, except the annual training in May, was negatived, 126 to 93. Mr. Bronson opposed it, (says the N. H. Patriot), with great vehemence; saying among other things, "Sir if I had forty boys I'd train them up to be tough and hardy and to stand for their country. They should not complain of sore fingers or sore toes to get rid of training, nor should their hands be so delicate and white as to shrink from a gun—or a battle—when occasion required them to fight."

☞A Vermont paper says—We hear that one of the militia companies paraded yesterday, mustered five or six men, one of whom not being able to procure a gun, carried a brick bat!

New Hampshire state prison. At the commencement of the last financial year there were 54 prisoners—at the end 82—average 68. The expense for food was $1,511 49—cost for each prisoner $22 33—expenses of bedding and clothing for the year $396 54. Total expenditures, including salaries, medicines, fuel, repairs, &c. $4,028 84 Income $5,667 77. Clear gain to the state $1,638 93 The nett gain at the stone shop was $2,477 6—smith's shop $1,257 30—shoe shop $1 124 99—cooper's shop $308 99—wheelwright shop $277 5. Fees from visiters $222 67.

NEW YORK. Exports for the first six months of 1831—328,992 bbls. wheat flour; 5,633 rye do. 6,427 bbls and 11,033 bbls. corn meal; 157,650 bushels wheat and 198,570 corn.

VIRGINIA WHEAT AND FLOUR. We are indebted to a friend, who keeps an accurate list of the arrivals of wheat and flour from Virginia, in this city, for the following receipt of crops, from 1823 to 1829, inclusive—namely:

Crop of	1823,	115,000 bbls. flour,	428,000	bush. wheat.
do	1824,	145,000 do	400,000	do
do	1825,	100,000 do	194,000	do

do	1829,	270,000 do	490,000	do
		1,129,000 barrels.	2.359,000	bushels.

The crop of 1830, is not yet all received, and therefore the returns are not made up—but from actual data, it will greatly exceed that of 1829. [N. Y. Mer. Adv.

[It is manifest, from the general amount of exports to foreign places from New York, that very large quantities of Virginia flour and grain must pass into the domestic consumption. They are spread along the coast farther east, for the supply of the manufacturing villages.]

SOUTH CAROLINA. It appears that, on clearing away the rubbish, the head of the statue of Washington has received but a slight injury, and that one arm and one leg are nearly perfect. The remaining portion has a tendency to crumble, and it is supposed cannot be made to adhere.

The state library was entirely lost—the old legislative journals, going back to the year 1715, are lost forever, as well as some of the literary curiosities.

MILITARY ACADEMY. By a regulation of the department of war, it is directed that the five cadets of each class who shall graduate with the highest honors, shall be attached to the next army register and published.—We have been politely furnished with the following, as the list of cadets to whom this honor was awarded at the late examination.

ANTHRACITE COAL. The Pottsville Miner's Journal says—"The following table exhibits with as much accuracy as our means will allow, the quantity of anthracite sent to market during the last ten years, with the annual increase of exportation, by which it appears that the aggregate amount in that period is equal to 525,825 tons. It will be observed also that the increase of exportation last year alone amounted to 75,000 tons:

	Quantity sent to market.	Annual increase.
In 1820	365 tons
1821	1,073	608 tons
1822	2,440	1,167
1823	5,823	3,383
1824	9,541	3,718
1825	33 393	23,852
1826	48,047	14 654
1827	61,665	13,618
1828	77 395	15,730
1829	105,083	27,688
1830	181,000	75,917

"It is not believed that the present year's exportation will far exceed that of the preceding year, although the increase in consumption must be in a two-fold proportion, if correct inferences may be drawn from well authenticated facts. The number of steam engines in the city of Philadelphia alone using anthracite coal, is represented to be between 60 and 80, to which must be added those of the city of New York, as well as several steamers.* The rapidly increasing consumption in private families and public offices, is also to be considered as a large and important item in the estimate of causes which tend to the support of our proposition. The surplus quantity remaining on hand last spring was about thirty thousand tons, which would leave an amount consumed of 151,000 tons, and an increase in consumption of 45 000 tons over and above the former year.

"Coal is now cheaper than any other fuel—its advantages combined with this circumstance will indubitably insure it a preference. The quantity of anthracite sent to market having increased from less than one thousand to one hundred and eighty-one thousand tons in ten years, we will hazard our reputation on the prediction, that at the expiration of ten years hence the demand will equal one million of tons.

"Liverpool coal is now selling in New York by the cargo at ten dollars per chaldron; which is at the rate of seven dollars per ton. Schuylkill coal by the cargo can be afforded at a less price, two tons of which are equal to three of the Liverpool coal."

[We understand the amounts given to include the whole supplies—Schuylkill, Lehigh, Lackawana, Susquehannah, &c.]

*What is meant by "steamers?" The pile of tin kettles which are fixed to cooking-stoves, to prepare potatoes and essbages for dinner? ED. REG.

WOOL. The following extract from the prices current of the Boston Courier, (which may be fully relied on)—shews the prices of all the kinds of wool in the Boston market, on the 27th June—

Fleece wool of the new clip begins to come into market, in limited quantities, and sales have been effected at quotations. About 300 bales Saxony and English wools arrived on the 19th inst. from London. We learn that the Saxony, about 40,000 lbs. has been sold, prices not known; 30,000 lbs. superfine and not pulled lambs, have been disposed of at prices, within the rage of quotations.

The New York Daily Advertiser says—The new clip begins to arrive freely, and some considerable parcels are understood to be on the way. As the manufacturers do not come willingly into market at present prices, no sales of consequence have been made, and the stocks as usual after shearing, begin to accumulate. The foreign importations consist of about 150 bales from London, and 2 or 3 small lots from Bremen, at this port, and upwards of 200 bales from London at Boston. The sale of Buenos Ayres on the 22d, disappointed the expectations of the owners, and only one lot of 29 bales was offered, which brought 12 cents at 9 months. At the sale of Buenos Ayres to-day, only one lot of 9 bales was offered, which brought 11½ cents at 6 months. The sale at Philadelphia last week of 285 bales Spanish and Portuguese drew the attention of the hatters, who bought spiritedly, and the market is represented to have been well sustained.

OUR "INFANT MANUFACTURES." The day before yesterday five male persons, including five generations, met together in this city and sat together down to dinner. The group consisted of a father, his son, his grandson, his great-grandson, and his great-great-grandson. And it is worthy of note that the patriarch of the family held the infant who was of the fifth generation, in his arms, and fed him at the table. [Troy Budget.

FORWARD! We copy the following from the United States Gazette. Mr. Wetherill's discovery of "feeding fire with water" is worth more in itself than all that all of the nullificatory philosophers, and state-rights' calculators of the value of the union, have yet produced, or ever will. If talk was worth any thing, what mountains of wealth would be found in Virginia, and South Carolina, &c.

From the United States Gazette.

It gives us great pleasure to state the perfect success which has attended an experiment, made in this city, on the improvement of locomotive steam engines, due to the science and ingenuity of lieut. col. Long. It is very much of the character of that gentleman to abstain from the too common practice of forcing himself upon the public attention, and we owe the present opportunity of announcing an improvement of the highest importance to rail road motion, to a scientific friend, in no manner connected with its author. As the merits of this engine, which is to be called the Pennsylvania Locomoter, are soon to be tested in public, we shall merely allude to some of its most obvious properties.

It weighs about three tons, has a power of six horses, and is surprisingly compact, occupying a comparative small space. The wheels have a diameter of 4 feet 3½ inches, and a circumference of 13½ feet. The quantity of water the boiler is capable of containing is sixty gallons; the fuel required is one bushel of anthracite coal with some charcoal. This fuel, when ignited, brought the water to the boiling point in thirty-five minutes. The gentleman from whom we have our information, states that with twenty pounds of steam to the inch, the wheels made two revolutions per second, which give a velocity of eighteen miles two-fifths per hour; but there is not the least doubt of her taking a pressure of sixty pounds with the most perfect safety. It is not unlikely, therefore, that she may upon trial, outstrip any of those surprising velocities which the British engineers have produced. She will also move with a pressure not exceeding eight pounds per square inch. Lieut. col. Long has applied, with the most perfect success, Mr. J. P. Wetherill's beautiful plan of feeding the fire with water:—it is clear, that henceforward it will be of more consequence, in rail road motion, to economize water than coal. The chimneys of this machine let down in a new and very neat manner, so that bridges of every description can be passed. One of the most striking properties of this locomoter, is the ease with which the engineer can change her velocities, and even give her a retrograde motion in thirty seconds of time. Many fatal accidents which have occurred, might have been spared, had the engines which occasioned them been provided with the mechanical improvements of the Pennsylvania Locomoter.

BRITISH NAVY. The experimental squadron, as it is termed, which is about to depart from Portsmouth under the command of vice-admiral sir Edward Codrington, G. C. B., is the first naval armament of similar magnitude which has left our shores since the occasion that preceded the gallant and successful attack made on Algiers by lord viscount Exmouth. The following is a list of the ships already commissioned, and, from the names of their respective commanders, many of whom are proudly connected with the annals of our maritime glory, we may easily calculate what the result will be should they have any real work to do:—Caledonia, 120 guns, vice admiral sir E. Codrington, captain Curzon; Prince Regent, 120, rear admiral Parker, capt. Dundas; Brittannia, 120, expected daily from the Mediterranean; Asia, 84, capt. Parker; Revenge, 76, capt. Hellyar; Wellesley, 74, capt. Rowley; Donegal, 76, capt. Dick; Talavera, 74, capt. Colby; Barham, 50, capt. Pigot; Alfred, 50, capt. Maunsel; Dublin, 50, capt. lord J. Townsend; Stag, 46, capt. sir T. Trowbridge; Curacoa, 30, capt. Dunn. With various smaller vessels not yet commissioned. [London paper.

FRENCH NAVY. The following is said to be the present state of the French navy:—Ready for sea, or in a state to be immediately fitted out, 2 ships of the third rate (76 or 80 guns), 4 of the fourth rate, (74 guns), 9 frigates of the first class (60 guns), 2 of the second class (54 and 50 guns), 7 of the third class (44 guns), 7 sloops, 13 twenty gun brigs, and 95 vessels of inferior rank, making a total of 141 ships of war.

POPULATION OF ROME. The Diario di Roma has published the following statement of the population of Rome during the twelve months which elapsed between Easter, 1829 and Easter, 1830:—Parish churches 54; families 34,805; bishops 30; priests 1,455; monks and friers 1,986; nuns 1,385; seminarists and collegians 560; hereticks, Turks, and infidels, exclusive of Jews 205; prepared for the sacrament 107,433; not prepared for the sacrament 39,852; marriages 1,068; male baptisms 2,339; female baptisms 2,351—total baptisms 4,680; male deaths 2,882; female deaths 2,113—total deaths 4,995; males of all ages 77,475; females of all ages 69,810; total population 147,385.

HAYTI. In consequence of intelligence received at the department of state, in relation to the existing state of things in Hayti, orders have been issued by the secretary of the navy, for part of our West India squadron to visit the principal ports in that island: and similar orders have been given in respect to the principal ports on the Maine. [Globe.

PRESIDENTS OF THE U. S. There have been (including the present) seven presidents. The names of four of them, ended in the letters ON. The names of three of them ended in the letters SON, but neither of them had a son. All of them were married; but three of them were childless. The son of the only one that had a son, was one of the seven. Four of the seven are dead;—and three of them died on the fourth of July! [U. S. Gaz.

THE SUFFERING INDIANS. Not long since we had the melancholy opportunity of witnessing the distress prevailing among the Creek Indians, which we have heretofore noticed in our paper, on information derived from others. A considerable part of that tribe is literally in a starving condition. Government could now succeed in sending off a large part of them, as they would doubtless consent to emigrate for the purpose of preserving life. Thus the policy of removing the Indians to the westward might be partially effected, while at the same time the cause of humanity would be subserved. This is the only way perhaps, in which the president would be authorised to afford them relief. To see a whole people almost destitute of food—the incessant cry of the emaciated creatures being bread! bread!—is beyond description distressing. The existence of many of the Indians is prolonged by eating roots and the bark of trees. The berries of the India or China tree of last year's growth, were ate by them as long as they lasted—nothing that can afford nourishment is rejected, however offensive it may be. Nor can there be, to the suffering of this wretched people, mitigation or limit short of death, or the humane intervention of our government. But few of them on the borders of this state have planted corn, because they had none to plant. The next year will, therefore, find most of those who, until then linger out a miserable existence, no better off than they are at present. In a country abounding in abundance, as ours in general does, humanity weeps at such scenes. [Milledgeville Rec.

INTERESTING SCRAPS.

Thirty new steam boats and more are building on the Ohio between Pittsburg and Louisville.

The Journal of Commerce says—We have seen very fair specimens of lead ore, obtained from a mine in Brookfield, Conn, which on being analyzed, are found to yield 65 parts lead, out of 100 ore. Specimens of zinc from the same mine, yield 64 parts of zinc out of 100 ore. Appearances indicate, we are told, that the mine is extensive, and the ore abundant. A specimen of the lead ore may be seen at this office.

Lexington, Kentucky, is in a state of rapid improvement—new buildings to the value of $100,000, will be erected in the present season, and many old ones are undergoing expensive repairs. It is proposed to Mc Adamise one of the principal streets.

The "Providence American" says The foundation for a steam cotton factory, 200 feet long, has been lain in Olneyville, and is progressing. In Fall river an immense factory, 275 feet long, and three stories high, is nearly completed, and has some of its machinery in operation, This establishment, we understand, will be larger than the Anawan factory, in the same busy and thriving village. The two are among the most extensive mills in the country.

The Augusta Chronicle gives the result of some examinations of specimens of wines made from the Burgundy and Madeira grape, and pronounces upon them a high eulogium, as "excellent sweet wines of fine rich body and flavor."

The streams in the Huron country, says the Rochester Advertiser, glide over pebbles of cornelian, topaz, jasper, agate, opal and quartz, and are as pure as crystal. They are cool enough for drinking in the hottest day in August.

The great lead mines are in the southern part of this district. They have been wrought but three years, by comparatively few persons, and under every possible disadvantage; yet nearly thirty million pounds of lead have been made there. Only about a mile square of surface has yet been opened, and from this thirty million pounds more might be extracted without opening a new mine. The whole of the lead district occupies a surface one hundred miles square, including, however, a district of copper ore about twenty miles long, and four or five broad. The climate is fine and pure, and the soil of the prairies is admirable for grain. Among the curiosities is a sort of vegetable compass, the "rosin weed," from the position of whose leaves it is said that the north and south points can be ascertained.

The Springfield (Mass.) Journal says—"If the Bostonians wish to retain the amount of trade which they possess from the valley of the Connecticut they must be "up and doing"—a few years will suffice to turn the entire trade of the valley to New York. Ten years since nine-tenths of the trade of this town went to Boston—now, probably, the same proportion of trade goes to New York. These facts are worthy of the consideration of the Bostonians."

Tobacco pipes are manufactured at Zanesville, O.

The following comparative statement of the amount of tolls received at West Troy, has been politely furnished us (says the Troy Sentinel) from the collector's office.

June 1827, $7,150 51—Total to 1st July $24,134 02.
June 1828, $8,326 09—Total to 1st July $34,980 82.
June 1829, $9,624 60—Total to 1st July $50,618 62.
June 1830, $12,547 31—Total to 1st July $41,677 55.
June 1831, $17,441 45—Total to 1st July $62,457 40.

Camden, opposite Philadelphia, as well because of the great prosperity of the last named place, as on account of the Camden and Amboy rail road now making, and soon to be completed, is very rapidly increasing—many new buildings are going up, and the place is excellently well fitted for many factories, for the supply of the Philadelphia market.

Steam boats now ply regularly between Charleston and Augusta, Georgia, stopping at Savannah. The Charleston and Hamburg rail way is going on handsomely; but the public works of the state do not appear to have been well managed.

A steam ferry boat has commenced running from the end of Penn street, Pittsburg, on the Monongahela, to Steel's landing on the Ohio—which is a great public accommodation.

Mr. Shields, of Cincinnati has built a steam carriage to run on a common turnpike road.

The Arkansas Gazette, published at Little Rock, notices the arrival of many steam boats at different points on the White river.

There are from ninety to one hundred steam engines in operation in Philadelphia and liberties, in sixty of which number anthracite coal is used for fuel.

The Western Monitor, published at Fayette, Mo. has the following:

"The annual spring caravan departed during the past and previous weeks, for Santa Fe. We have been unable to ascertain accurately the number of wagons from this and the adjacent counties, there not having been time to hear from the place of rendezvous. It is estimated, however, that about $200,000 worth of merchandize has been taken."

At a public sale of real estate, at Cincinnati, on the 20th ult. a store on Main street, the lot 51½ feet front by 117 feet deep, brought $19,200. It is rented at $1,500 per annum.

The Boston Centinel says—We are happy to hear that the growing and making of Indigo has been revived, and is extending in South Carolina, with great improvement in quality. We have been assured that some of it is nearly entitled to rank with that imported from Bengal.

One hundred and ninety miles of the great Ohio canal, commencing at Cleveland, on Lake Erie, and running south, are now navigable. There will be several side-cuts before the plan of this splendid project is finished.

The work of making a rail road from Paterson, N. J. to the landing on the Passaic river, has been commenced. The contracts are said to have been made on very favorable terms.

BRIEF NOTICES.

"A Rowland for an Oliver;" or a bull for your poney. We have had pleasant accounts of the performance of poneys on our canal, &c. Richard K. Mead esq. of Frederick county, without any direct allusion thereto, suggests, in the columns of the Winchester Republican, that his famous short horned bull may convey on a rail road from 200 to 500 barrels of flour, at the rate of four to five miles an hour. Mr. Mead's bull, 2 years 1 month and 11 days old, on the 6th of June last, weighed 1,741 pounds.

Large cargo. The ship Equator lately left Charleston for Liverpool, with 2,004 bales cotton, weighing 603,634 lbs. valued at $51,078—amount of freight, with exchange, $11,000.

Old documents. It is stated by one of the Washington letter-writers, that the secretary of the senate and clerk of the house of representatives, with all their deputies, are engaged in preparing for the press the legislative and executive documents authorised last session to be printed by Gales and Seaton. Many important documents have been found, relating to the early legislation of the United States, which were never printed. Among them is a volume of correspondence between gen. Washington and Mr. Jay, in relation to the treaty made by the latter with Great Britain. Also, a very able report of gen. Hamilton; and a great many communications relating to the campaigns of Harmar, St. Clair, and Wayne, against the Indians northwest of Ohio.

The pirates, Collinet and Gadett, were hung at Boston on the 1st inst. pursuant to sentence. A large number of persons in petticoats, said to have been women, were present to gratify their curiosity.

"Decline of Boston." The building on State street, owned and partly occupied by the Massachusetts Mutual Insurance company, has been sold to the Suffolk Banking company for $57,200—a fraction over $10 per square foot.

Speedy justice. An emigrant who arrived at New York on Sunday last, was arrested while on board the vessel, for an assault and battery of a violent character upon some of his fellow passengers, just as they were about to land at the wharf. He was taken to Bridewell the same day, and on Monday was tried and sentenced to three months imprisonment in the penitentiary.

Boston Courier. Mr. Edwin Buckingham, has become associated with his father J. T. Buckingham, esq. in the editorial conduct of the Boston Courier. The jun. Mr. B. has already acquired a high reputation as a writer for that Journal, and for the Boston Galaxy, of which he was formerly one of the conductors. His productions are distinguished for humor and pungency—qualities which he honestly came by—being in this case hereditary.

Crim con. In a late trial for crim. con. at Madrid, the offending parties were sentenced—the lady, to close confinement in prison for ten years—the gentleman to eight years hard labor on the coast of Africa—and both to the ensts of the trial. What consternation would a law of this kind occas on in London—and elsewhere!

Organ at St. Thomas' church. We had the satisfaction of seeing and hearing yesterday, (says a N. York paper) the largest, and one of the most elegantly mounted organs in the United States, constructed in this city by Mr. Henry Erben, under the superintendence of George Barrell, James Blackstock, and Benjamin Jackson, a committee appointed by the congregation. Its tones are unsurpassed by any in the city, and are peculiarly calculated for accompaniments. Its dimensions are as follows. The largest pipe is 22 feet long—21 by 18 inches, containing 57 cubic feet. The case is 18 feet 6 inches wide, 35 feet high, and 10 feet deep—it has 28 stops, 3 setts keys and pedals and contains 1,700 pipes.

A tessalated Roman pavement has recently been discovered in Leicester, England. It measures 22 feet by 17. The tessellæ are very small, and exhibit a regular pattern, divided into octagonal compartments, richly embroidered with wreaths, &c. within which are devices of great variety and beauty. It is supposed to have been 1,600 years in existence.

Murders. Within two or three weeks, no less than four women were murdered in New York and Brooklyn—believed by their husbands.

"The sea serpent." Some strange animal has again appeared off the eastern coast of the United States. Persons who are said to have been within 150 feet of the monster, thought that it was about 200 feet long—his head resembling that of a snake, and his motion undulating like that of a leech. No part appeared thicker than a common hogshead. He was brown on the back, and yellow brown under his belly. No fins were discovered. This animal is said to have been seen by many persons standing on a wharf in Boothbay, Maine.

Sheep. Mr. Enoch Johnson, of Galway, at the late shearing, took from 7 sheep, as follows: the 1st 8lb. 3 oz. 2nd 7, 8. 3d 5, 10. 4th 4, 3. 5th 4, 8. 6th 6, 10. 7th 6, 7, making in the whole forty-three pounds and two ounces. [Balston Spa Gaz.

A young lady, in Duplin county, N. Carolina, about 14 years old, while proceeding to pay a visit to a neighbor between 11 and 12 o'clock, noon, was violated and murdered close to the road, after an apparently severe struggle, the ground at the place being much trodden. The infernal, after accomplishing his first purpose, cut her throat! No clue had been discovered by which to trace the villain.

Dogs. The police of Paris has issued a rigid ordinance to prevent dogs from being in the streets, unless muzzled. The hydrophobia seems unusually to prevail in the present year. We hear of several new cases.

At Philadelphia, as well as in New York, there has been a general slaughter of all the dogs found running at large.

China. It is said that shoemakers form the most numerous class of operatives in Canton; the number is estimated at about 25,000; of weavers there are about 15,000; of lapidaries there are upwards of 7,000; the carpenters and cabinet makers are estimated at 16,000. There are above 18,000 trading boats of different sizes which pass along the river from Canton to Whampoa. The tanks, or small boats, in which people live, and which pay an annual fee to the police, are said to be upwards of 50,000.

Terrible death. Charles Lloyd, aged 24 years, lately came to his death near Philadelphia, by the giving way of an arch of a lime-kiln, on which he was standing, whereby he was embedded up to his breast in the burning matter and so perished—though great efforts were made to save him.

Brick house moved. The New Bedford Gazette states that Mr. Dudley Davenport has removed the large mansion of Mr, Abraham Russel, at the head of Union street, 400 feet, with its four stacks of chimneys and all the furniture. So gentle was the operation that the clock in the house kept and struck the hours regularly.

David L. Morrill, late governor of New Hampshire, is editor and proprietor of the New Hampshire Observer.

"Immortality." An Englishman by the name of Maze, of Bristol, has gained a great celebrity by his death, which was caused by falling from one of the pyramids of Egypt!

Gershom Powers, late a distinguished and useful member of congress from New York, died at Auburn, in that state, on the 25th ult. aged 42 years. He was one of the few business-men at Washington, who are, indeed, valuable because they are so scarce; not known to "the million," but worth the whole tribe of mere speech-makers.

POETRY FOR THE FOURTH OF JULY.

The following psalm and ode written for and used in celebration of the last anniversary, certainly deserve a grateful record.

Psalm written by John Quincy Adams, late president of the United States, and sung in the church at Quincy, previous to the delivery of his oration in honor of the day:

I.

Sing to the Lord, a song of praise
Assemble, ye who love his name;
Let congregated millions raise
Triumphant glory's loud acclaim.

From earth's remotest regions come;
Come greet your Maker and your King;
With harp, with timbrel, and with drum,
His praise let hill and valley sing.

II.

Your praise, the Lord will not disdain;
The humble soul is his delight;
Saints, on your couches, swell the strain;
Break the dull stillness of the night.
Rejoice in glory—bid the storm,
Bid thunder's voice his praise expand;
And while your lips the chorus form
Grasp for the fight, his vengeful brand.

III.

Go forth in arms! JEHUVAH reigns;
Their graves, let foul oppressors find;
Bind all their scepter'd kings in chains,
Their peers with iron fetters bind.
Then, to the Lord shall praise ascend;
Then all mankind, with one accord,
And freedom's voice till time shall end,
IN PEALING ANTHEMS—PRAISE THE LORD.

Ode sung by the choir in the church at Charleston, S. C. at the celebration by the "Union and states rights" party, and previous to the oration delivered by Mr. Drayton:

AIR—Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled.

I.

HAIL, our country's natal morn!
Hail, our spreading kindred born!
Hail thou banner not yet torn,
Waving o'er the free!
While, this day, in festal throng,
Millions swell the patriot song,
Shall not we thy notes prolong,
Hallow'd jubilee?

II.

Who would sever freedom's shrine?
Who would draw the invidious line?
Though by birth, one spot be mine,
Dear is all the rest:—
Dear to me the south's fair land.
Dear, the central mountain-band,
Dear, New England's rocky strand,
Dear the prairied west.

III.

By our altars, pure and free,
By our law's deep rooted tree,
By the past's dread memory,
By our WASHINGTON;
By our common parent tongue,
By our hopes, bright, buoyant, young,
By the tie of country strong—
We will still be ONE.

IV.

Fathers! have ye bled in vain?
Ages! must ye droop again?
MAKER! shall we rashly stain
Blessings sent by THEE?
No! receive our solemn vow,
While before thy throne we bow,
Ever to maintain, as now
"UNION—LIBERTY."

POLITICS OF THE DAY.

From the Globe.

Washington, June 23, 1831.

SIR: I received a letter of the 21st, at 9 o'clock, on the 22d, through the city post office, charging several officers of the government with a conspiracy to assassinate you. They were immediately furnished by me with a copy of your letter; and I herewith enclose, for your information, copies of the replies which they have given, denying the charges preferred against them by you. A copy of my letter is also enclosed. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) ANDREW JACKSON.

S. D. Ingham, esq.

P. S. I would have prefered that this matter should have been examined into, face to face, and for that purpose sent my messenger for you, but was informed you had left the city at 4 o'clock, A. M. A. J.

From the Philadelphia Sentinel.

The following letter has been sent to us for publication:

New Hope, June 30, 1831.

The president of the United States.

SIR: I had the honor to receive, by way of Doylestown, your letter of the 23d instant, with its enclosures, viz: copies of a circular letter from you to the acting secretary of war, treasurer of the United States, register and second auditor of the treasury, and of their respective answers—the copy of your circular being in print; the others I had also seen in the newspapers some days before your letter reached me.

In your letter to me above refered to, you speak of my having charged several officers of the government with a conspiracy, and state that they have denied the charges prefered against them by me. I must be permitted to say, that I have not charged those officers with any specific offence in the form suggested by you.

I have stated that the late secretary of war and acting secretary of war were lying in wait for the purpose of making an assault upon me, on my way to the office, as I believed with an intent to assassinate. I also stated that a groecry store between my lodgings and the office, and the rooms of the treasurer and register, were alternately occupied by them as places of rendezvous while so employed. I further stated that the treasurer, register, and second auditor, were in their company. I also stated that the principal persons thus engaged, viz. Eaton and Randolph, with a recruited force, threatened an assault on the dwelling I resided in the same night until a late hour; and I now state that this threatening was continued until a late hour on the following night. The officers who have denied the charge as framed by you, admit having been in company with Mr. Eaton during the time referred to; but they deny having been in his company the whole time; this was never intended to have been alleged by me.

The admissions, equivocations, and palpable reservations, in their letters, are abundant proof of all the material facts asserted by me, so far as they are concerned; but, if any doubt remains, it should be observed, that my letter of the 21st was addressed to you especially as chief magistrate of the District of Columbia, in which capacity your powers must be ample to direct the proper officer of the government, to institute a legal investigation of this transaction before a tribunal having power to examine and compel the attendance of witnesses. Whenever this shall be done, I will, without delay, return to the seat of government, and render all the aid in my power to such officer in the discharge of his duty. It must, however, be distinctly understood, that the investigation shall begin with the principals, and before I furnish a list of the witnesses, that an assurance of protection shall be given to those who hold offices, that they shall suffer no injury in consequence of giving testimony. This has become necessary by reason of the declaration of Mr. Evans, the brother-in-law of Mr. Eaton, that "the president would turn every clerk out of office who took my part in this business," and of other facts, which have since come to my knowledge. Although I do not assume that this declaration was authorised by you, yet it is indispensable to justice, that no apprehension of this nature should rest on the minds of witnesses.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, yours, &c.

S. D. INGHAM.

THE PRESIDENT'S REPLY

To Mr. Ingham's letter dated June 30th.

Washington, July 7, 1831.

SIR: The president, on his return to-day from the Rip Raps, has received your letter of the 30th ult. In reply to your renewed call upon him, "as chief magistrate of the District of Columbia," I am directed to inform you, that he does not consider the fact of certain officers "having been in company with major Eaton" during office hours, and in their offices, where it is their duty to be, and where every individual has a right to go, as supporting the charge that those offices were used "as places of rendezvous" by a party lying in wait to assassinate you; nor as constituting "probable cause" to justify the subjection of citizens of fair character, all solemly denying your imputations, to arraingment before a court of criminal jurisdiction. That if "a legal investigation of this transaction before a tribunal having power to examine and compel the attendance of witnesses," be, by you, deemed necessary, he assures you of adequate protection in the city of Washington, where you have the right, as prosecutor before the grand jury, to present the supposed offenders, or to summon them before any magistrate of the district: Also, that "an assurance of protection shall be given to those who hold offices that they shall suffer no injury in consequence of giving testimony"---an assurance, however, not to be construed as affording impunity for any misconduct which the investigation may unfold.

The president directs me to inform you, also, that, should any persons connected with the government be found implicated in having formed part of "a recruited force," to engage in hostilities of any kind within the precincts of the departments, or elsewhere within the District of Columbia; or having armed and associated together, to the disturbance and alarm of its peaceful citizens, he will feel it his duty, in addition to the penalties of the law, forthwith to dismiss the offenders from the public service. He directs me further, sir, and in conclusion, to state that, from the inquiry he has made, your charges to that effect against the acting secretary of war, and others, do not appear to be founded in fact; and that he cannot but ascribe them to a reliance on false statements or vague surmises, or to the workings of an over-excited imagination. I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

N. P. TRIST.

Sam. D. Ingham, esq. Doylestown, Bucks county, Pa.

From the Philadelphia Inquirer.

[Pennsylvania "Official."]

From a Washington Correspondent.

"The people are not entirely ignorant of the circumstances under which Messrs. Calhoun, Ingham and their partizans came into the support of gen. Jackson. It was after the people of the United States, (particularly of Pennsylvania) had decided against THEM, that they acquiesced in the nomination of "the hero." They preferred the latter, as they alledged, to either of the other candidates; but the truth is, they knew that Mr. Adams, had no prospects out of the New England states; they knew that they had no hopes from Mr. Crawford, whom they had shamefully reviled and persecuted, and their principles and interests were at variance with those of Mr. Clay: hence they yielded their support to general Jackson. By so doing, they calculated that, by their great zeal in his cause, they would insinuate themselves into his special favor, entangle him in their wiles, secure to themselves the high places and patronage of the government, and lay a sure foundation for the elevation of Mr. Calhoun to the presidency in four years! But, upon due reflection, difficulties presented themselves at every corner and turn. They knew that the support was given from selfish considerations: they knew that they were not justly entitled to the gratitude of Andrew Jackson, and that they were looked upon with an eye of suspicion. They knew, also, that Henry Baldwin was the favorite of general Jackson in Pennsylvania, in consequence of his former and disinterested friendship, his splendid talents, and his great acquirements; that the president had invited him to take a seat in his cabinet, and that he had come on for that purpose. It was at this crisis of affairs, and at a festive club of the Calhoun members of congress from Pennsylvania, that the infamous project was conceived of thwarting the views of the president, and of bullying him into the appointment of Samuel D. Ingham! It was a bold and desperate attempt; but upon the issue depended their momentary triumph, or their total overthrow. While the intoxicating juice of the grape was still burning in their veins, these, "eleven Calhoun members from Pennsylvania" posted off to the president, demanded the appointment of Mr. Ingham, and the rejection of Mr. Baldwin! Their demand was not acceded to: they retired to their quarters, collected five members from other states, returned to the president, passed themselves off as the majority of the Pennsylvania delegation in congress, and made a second demand, which was again not acceded to. At length they declared, that if Mr. Ingham was not appointed, their friends in the senate would reject the nomination of Mr. Baldwin! Believing that they stated nothing but facts, and being anxious to conform to what he was erroneously led to believe were the wishes of the people of Pennsylvania, he yielded to their entreaties! This false step, however, has occasioned all the bickerings, and dissensions, and heartburnings, which have agitated the cabinet, and which have distracted society in this city.

"Mr. Ingham being thus placed in the treasury department, under circumstances which no honorable or high-minded man would consent to receive office, and being neither qualified by education nor talent to discharge the duties of his station, he naturally felt in an awkward predicament."

From the American Sentinel.

[Late Pennsylvania "Official."]

"In a few days we will give a full and conclusive refutation to the version of Lewis, Kendall & Co. in relation to the manner in which Mr. Ingham came to the office of secretary of the treasury. We are prepared, on the instant, to expose their falsehoods, and which the authors of the letter know to be false; but we shall wait till the president returns to the seat of government, that he may see and read our answer. In the mean time we shall cut out the letter from the Inquirer, and try to make it reach the president at Old Point Comfort. If it should ever find its way to him, his native nobleness of soul will denounce it as a most profligate, odious, and unqualified falsehood."

From the Washington Globe of June 11.

["Official."]

"It will be remembered that we some time ago denied that "any member of congress was authorised by the president to inform Messrs. Ingham, Berrien and Branch "that it was his determination to remove them from office if they refused to compel their families to associate with that of major Eaton." This was pronounced an equivocal denial, and col. Johnson, from Kentucky, was pointed out, in letters, as the member of congress making the communication to those gentlemen, and upon his character the story was propagated as entitled to credence, although emphatically contradicted in the Globe.

We now declare, without qualification, that colonel Johnson never did make such communication to Messrs. Ingham, Berrien and Branch, as that imputed to him. *He assured those gentlemen, on the contrary, that the president did not require social intercourse between the families of the members of the cabinet, and that he expressly disclaimed any such pretension."

Letter to the editors, dated Old Point Comfort, July 1, 1831—

"Since the president's arrival at the Rip Raps, I have, among other subjects, conversed with him on the late occurrences at Washington. In relation to major Eaton's first letter to Mr. Ingham, I expressed my regret that he should have put himself in the wrong at the outset, by so expressing himself as to admit of a doubt as to the purport of his communication. There was every probability that major E's. demand related to the publication, and not to any thing in the course which Mrs. Ingham might have seen fit to pursue in the selection of her society: this, however, had not been made to appear so clearly as it might have been. The president replied, that a careful perusal of major Eaton's letter would, he thought, show it to have one meaning only: but that even admitting its expression to be ambiguous, the ambiguity was utterly insufficient to support a doubt on the subject. The right of every member of society to the most perfect freedom in the choice of his associates was so no-

*This article, and that which follows, put an important point at issue, between the contending parties: the one having said that attempts were made, by the president, to force Mrs. Eaton into the families of Messrs. Ingham, &c. ED. REG.

torious—so familiar to every mind—that no man could, except upon the meanest grounds, be supposed guilty of the flagrant absurdity of calling it in question.

"This sentiment, uttered with the impressive earnestness and energetic sincerity, characteristic of the man, could not but impress me, even more strongly than I had before been, with the reckless profligacy of the falsehood, so often reiterated by the coalition press and its new coadjutors, that the new cabinet had taken their seats under certain "conditions" as to their social intercourse."

["Official."]

THE LAST DEMONSTRATION OF MR. INGHAM.

This gentleman has published another letter written to the president. He does not give the note to which it purports to be a response. Nor does he wait to receive an answer, so anxious is he to make something of his conspiracy. He publishes his letter at once, that the public may see his willingness to return, "without delay to the seat of government, to have a legal investigation of this transaction before a tribunal having power to examine and compel the attendance of witnesses." He could not wait the arrival of the mail which would bring him intelligence of the president's return to the city because he knew that it would also bring him the reply which was in fact, on the way to him when he ushered his letter to the public. Whether his letter had been received or not by the president —whether the response required by it would make immediate publication proper or not, he did not wait to consider. Mr. Ingham's first letter was, we understand, published before it reached the hands of the president—so it appears from the beginning that this private correspondence was meant as an attack upon the president by Mr. Ingham, and was designed as an address altogether to the public. The president has, therefore, we think, very properly given him the information he seemed to ask, through his private secretary, Mr. Trist, declining any further correspondence with him.

The course which Mr. Ingham has pursued towards the president, is one, which, we think, will not meet the approbation of the public to which he appeals. The president gave him one of the most distinguished places in his administration, because it was supposed to be the wish of Pennsylvania. Mr. Ingham accepted the appointment, with the full knowledge that major Eaton was to be his colleague. No sooner is his commission safely in his pocket, than he joins Mr. Calhoun's friends in the effort to drive major Eaton out of the cabinet. He, in effect, tells the president, that he has associated in his counsels an individual who is a blot upon his administration. Why did not Mr. Ingham think of this before he took office in conjunction with such an individual?

The president, with an elevation honorable to his character, thought fit to overlook the implied insult offered to himself and sought only to reconcile the difficulty in his cabinet. It was made ostensibly, by those originating it, altogether an affair of the females of their families. It was said, that with regard to major Eaton, they entertained the best feelings, and could unite in perfect harmony. This was all the president required. He was willing to trust to such protestations, but declared his determination to have, union, and mutual confidence among the members of his cabinet; this was at the threshold of the difficulty.

At the succeeding session of congress, meetings of the friends of Mr. Calhoun took place, with a view of addressing the president to remove maj. Eaton from his counsels. Mr. Van Buren was next embraced in the denunciation. Arrangements were made in congress to embarrass the measures of the administration in that body. The Calhoun Telegraph and the Ingham Sentinel evinced their disaffection. The appointment of Mr. Baldwin was denounced in advance. Remote editors, as has been proved, where sounded, in the hope of bringing them out in opposition to the re-election of the president. And, finally, Mr. Calhoun came out with a horrible plot. When this issue was made with himself, personally, the president found his cabinet divided. And an entire re-organization was determined on.

Notwithstanding, the president could not but believe that Mr. Ingham had taken sides with his adversary, he treated him with kindness to the last. He gave him credit for his official capacity and fidelity. He was the representative of Pennsylvania, and was entitled to respect. Penetrated with grateful feeling towards Pennsylvania, as the first state that had invited him to the chief magistracy, he was unwilling that she should suffer any mortification, by supposing that he wished to put any mark of disgrace on Mr. Ingham, by desiring him to retire from the cabinet. He therefore offered him a position of dignity and trust, quite equal to his deserts. Mr. Ingham seems to have thought that his interest and ambition would be promoted by a warfare on the president, and he has sought seduously some pretext on which to found it.

Whilst thus on the look out for some offence, the president addressed Mr. Ingham a note on some business, as "acting secretary of the treasury." He took exception to this, and wrote a letter, signifying the ground of his dissatisfaction. To this the president replied in a brief note as follows:

"The president, with his respects to Mr. Ingham, acknowledges the receipt of his note of the 7th, which he has this moment received. Its contents he has read with surprise. Surely at no time has he in any way intended an indignity, or any thing that could wear such appearance to any gentleman, who has been connected with him in the government. It ought not, nor can it be conceived, that a note hastily written, addressed "acting," when it should have been "secretary of the treasury," should be considered an indignity offered, or that it could diminish or alter the authority under which he was transacting the duties of the department.

This attempt failing, Mr. Ingham sought in another quarter, some ground of quarrel to carry with him to Pennsylvania, as a justification of the hostility he meant to wage against the administration. He writes to Mr. Barry an angry letter, telling him that "rumor" reported that the postmaster general, or one of his assistants, had said the department possessed a certain bond of his, which would be held up in terrorem to keep him quiet. The postmaster general, after objecting to rumor as rather a vagrant witness, politely assures Mr. Ingham, that, so far as he was concerned, it was without foundation, and intimated his disbelief as to either of his assistants having given any ground for it. Mr. Ingham again replies, and insists that Mr. Barry should answer for his assistants. Mr. Barry again, with great politeness, informed Mr. Ingham, that for the official acts of his assistants he admitted himself responsible, but as to acts which had no connection with the public service, his assistants were themselves answerable; and furthermore, as they stood upon perfect equality with Mr. Ingham and himself, it was proper that Mr. Ingham, who complained, should make the call upon them. Not being able to make any thing out of this correspondence, Mr. Ingham gave it up. He remained at Washington, however, and kept up such an intercourse with the editor of the Telegraph, that major Eaton felt assured he was the prompter of the scurrilous attacks made on his wife. And when the names of Mr. Ingham and Mr. Berrien were vouched in the Telegraph, major Eaton felt it due to himself to make the enquiry of each whether the statements of that print were authorised by them. Mr. Berrien responded decorously, and as it regarded the indignity offered in the Telegraph, disavowed it as having been made on his authority. The public know the rest. Mr. Ingham refused to disavow, but added insult to that of the Telegraph. He refused to give honorable satisfaction, and when threatened with corporeal chastisement, instead of appealing to the civil authority to punish the individual who menaced him, he called in col. Towson, with a squad of volunteers, and thus himself became a threatener of the peace.

Mr. Ingham had now accomplished his purpose. He had made a pretext, out of which he could work something like a justification for the opposition which he meditated against the president on his return to Pennsylvania. Like Mr. Calhoun, he made an outcry about a conspiracy, and sought to involve the friends of the president in its accessaries. The acting secretary of war, the treasurer, the register, the second auditor, the fourth auditor, the city postmaster, Mr. Van Kleeck, a member of the Presbyterian church—Mr. Evans, a member of the Methodist church,* the venerable judge Overton, who had gone some days before to the Rip Raps, and his nephew, all, all were involved in it, either directly by Mr. Ingham or his friends. This gentleman had seen the effects of the Morgan excitement, and he fancied that if the public indignation could be excited by the killing of a poor man like Morgan, that to conspire against and alarm to extremity an ex-secretary of the treasury, was a much more heinous offence, and would create an excitement incalculably greater. Mr. Ingham seems, however, to have forgotten one thing. The conspiracy against Morgan was no fiction. We shall see what proof Mr. Ingham will be able to bring in support of his abduction. We suspect, like Mr. Calhoun's plot, of which it may be considered an act, that it will be susceptible of no proof, and that the public must take denial for confession.

☞ On re-publishing the preceding article, the National Intelligencer has the following remarks:

The long article which we copy from the Globe of yesterday, appears in that paper under circumstances which warrant us, if not to impute it to the executive, at least to consider it as authorised by him. It should therefore be attentively read.

The dissolution of the late cabinet it is now officially avowed, was, from the beginning, the act of the president, and did not take place in consequence of the letter of Mr. Van Buren to the president, resigning his office, or of that of Mr. Eaton, but in consequence of the deliberate determination of the president himself. It was no wonder that Mr. Van Buren's letter was an enigma to the public, or that Mr. Ingham was slow to comprehend how the reasons alleged for the secretary of state's resignation could affect him. The writer of the Globe says---"When this issue was made [by Mr. Calhoun's appeal] with himself personally, the president found his cabinet divided; and an entire re-organization was determined upon." This determination, therefore, must have been made about the time that congress adjourned, and of course long before the date of the resignation of Mr. Van Buren as the alternative to a "self-disfranchisement." The determination of the president does not appear to us an unreasonable one. But it must be confessed that the machinery contrived for its execution has unfortunately operated upon its inventor, whoever he may have been.

It can hardly be but we shall hear from Mr. Ingham again; for the letter published to-day, being signed by Mr. Trist, instead of the president himself, does not on that account lose the character of being the act of the president. A letter written by his direction, must, of course, be considered as his own.

In relation to the preceding article from the Globe, the Washington Telegraph says:

"We rose from a sick bed, and assumed our pen simply to say, that the article in the Globe is a tissue of misrepresentation, intended to bolster up the malign influence, which we will, at an early day, expose; and, in the mean time, to ask our readers, whom we never seek to mislead, to await the expose which the statement in the Globe seems to require of Messrs. Ingham, Branch and Berrien, and of col. Johnson. When their several statements, and the correspondence referred to in the Globe, come to be published, as we conceive they must be, all doubt will be dissipated, and all that we have said will be confirmed. It will then appear why the Globe is now so anxious to impair the credibility of Mr. Ingham."

Concerning the same article, the American Sentinel of yesterday observes:

"The 'Washington Globe' contains what we consider an official expose of some of the facts and incidents connected with the original organization and recent dissolution of the late cabinet. We will publish it with the answers which it seems inevitable it must evolve. On a view of the whole ground, our readers will be the better enabled to form an advised opinion.

SIR: In the absence of the governor from the seat of government, your paper has been brought to me from the post office, directed to the executive department of Virginia. As the head of that department at this time, I have to say to you that I am aware of no legal or regular warrant for the transmission of your paper to the executive of this state. The council of state having never advised in relation to the subject, I think proper to request that no further numbers of your paper be forwarded to the executive, as, under existing circumstances, you can have no claim upon the state for any of them. Your's, &c. PETER V. DANIEL, lieutenant governor of Virginia.

Washington, July 7, 1831.

SIR: Upon my return home, after an absence of four days, I found your note of the 30th ult. The copy of the Telegraph to which it refers is intended for the governor, and not the lieutenant governor of Virginia. "Under existing circumstances," you will please to return such copies as may have come to your possession during his absence, to the post office in your city, to be placed with his private papers. If he has not brought the subject of his subscription to the United States Telegraph before the "council of state," I presume it was because he considered it a subject on which he was not required to ask their advice; or it may be that he intends hereafter to do so. It will be in time for you, as one of his advisers, to refuse your consent when it is asked. Yours, &c. DUFF GREEN.

Hon. Peter V. Daniel, lieutenant governor of Va. Richmond, Virginia.

[We have heard a good joke in explanation of lieutenant governor Daniel's proceeding, and shewing it to be a retaliation on gov. Floyd, because that the latter, a short time previous to his surrender of a "brief authority" to Mr. Daniel, had ordered the discontinuance of the Maryland "official."]

Late "whole" Jackson—now nullifying "official."

"In our paper of this morning will be found a most extraordinary correspondence between Messrs. Eaton and Ingham, who were still acting at the time in the distinguished stations of secretaries of the war and treasury departments of the United States. No parallel can be found to it in any civilized country. We copy it with feelings of the deepest reluctance, and only under a conviction that it is our duty to lay it before our readers, as a genuine exhibition of the true state of things at Washington, and as furnishing a very probable explanation of the real causes of the late explosion of the cabinet. We have heretofore seen an abundance of matter in relation to the subject of this correspondence, in other papers, which we regretted to perceive, having always regarded it as a topic which should not have been made a subject of public agitation or discussion. But now that it has taken, as it were, an official shape, and has become identified with the character of our government, we place it upon record as a part—a melancholy and revolting part—of the history of our country. We make no comment upon the dispute itself. We only feel, as every American must feel, that scenes like these, whilst they humble every lover of our country, cannot fail to cause it to be despised abroad; nor have we words to express our regret that such occurrences should have taken place under an administration which we ardently desired and zealously labored to elevate to power, and under whose auspices we had fondly and confidently trusted, that our country would have assumed an honorable and enviable name among the nations of the earth."

* It would appear then, that "the acting secretary of war, the treasurer, the register, the second auditor, the fourth auditor, and the city postmaster, in high and responsible places, not described as "members" of any church, should have less weight than the highly honored clerks, Messrs. Van Kleeck and Evans! It is a queer parade of religious associations, as to the two last.

We intimated an intention of publishing Mr. Ingham's speech at the dinner given him by his friends of Buck's county, on his return from Washington. But we have changed our purpose. It is not worth the expense of putting it in type. It divulges nothing that was not known before; and every word of censure or reproach that it casts, directly or indirectly, upon the president, should have blistered the tongue of the speaker. General Jackson owes his elevation to the efforts of Mr. Ingham and his political associates; and moral as well as political justice demands that he should be made the victim of his own folly.

From the United States Telegraph.

We make no pretensions to prophecy; but, judging from the facts within our knowledge, we incline to the opinion that Mr. Van Buren's nomination will be rejected by the senate. Certain we are that it will be, if the part which he has acted since he came to Washington is fully examined. His rejection, under such circumstances, can excite no sympathy, and will consign him to lasting retirement. Indeed, we have our doubts whether he will not yet affirm his own condemnation by declining the mission, and thus escape the severe ordeal."

A Virginia correspondent of this paper says—"General Jackson is pursuing the very course that his enemies would choose for him if they had their choice; for it is a fact that his friends, those too who would have done any thing fairly to have advanced his cause, are fast losing their confidence, and unless he speedily sees his error, and changes his course, I think he will have to retire to the hermitage.

[The following communication was received several days ago, but deferred until the writer disclosed his name. We have ourselves no personal knowledge of the fact which it suggests.]

Has not the president received within a few weeks, or months past, from the men who originally nominated him for the office in 1823, a paper in the nature of a protest against his standing for a RE-ELECTION, on the principle laid down by himself—that a president should be elected but for ONE TERM, in order to preclude the abuse of the patronage of his office to secure a re-election? We say, has not such a paper been received from HIS FRIENDS IN PHILADELPHIA? If such a protest exists, we hope the gentlemen who transmitted it to the president will also give it to the public, that they may see and judge of the ground upon which his retreat to Tennessee is urged. Removals from office. In the fifth volume, page 83, of Bignon's History of France, from November, 1799, to the treaty of Tilsit, he thus explains the doctrine of Bonaparte in this respect:

"The most rigid justice regulated his conduct towards individuals. He never determined on a removal without a formal inquiry, and a preliminary report; and rarely ever without having heard the accused functionary in his defence."

It may be added, that a removal for difference of opinion never took place by Bonaparte's direction, during the fifteen years of his government.

[Late Pennsylvania "official."]

We recently charged major Lewis with having used his exertions to defeat the election of the late Mr. Miller to congress, in the northern district of Philadelphia county. When we made this charge, we acted after a full consideration of the importance of the case we were about to lay before the freemen of America. Having submitted the facts and arguments in support of our allegation, it was our intention to leave the subject to the unbiased judgment of the fountain of all power, the people. They seldom pronounce an incorrect decision when they have the matter properly elucidated. For ourselves, we are as well satisfied of the fact, that major Lewis did interfere improperly in the election adverted to, as we are of our own existence. It is this sincere conviction of the truth of the charge, that induced us to ask the attention of the president to the subject. In support of our proofs, we now call the attention of our readers to the subjoined extract. It comes from the state of Mississippi, and shows that major Lewis has also been intermeddling in the elections in that section of the United States. That there may be no misapprehension we give the article:

Extract of a letter dated Rodney, Mississippi, 3d June, 1831.

"Having seen an extract from the Telegraph in relation to the agency sought to be established by Kendall, Lewis & Co. I was forcibly reminded of a fact in relation to Lewis. In the session of our legislature, at which the late T. B. Reed was elected U. S. senator, Lewis wrote a letter to a gentleman (Mr. Walker) of this state, deprecating the election of the former, and stating that gen. Jackson did not consider him a friend."

The proverb that "where there is so much smoke there must be some fire," will apply very well here. We think major Lewis, by this time, begins to feel the force and influence of the press. He will find that "truth is mighty and must prevail."

A New York paper publishes the following copy of a letter from Martin Van Buren, to Mr. Henry Meigs.

MY DEAR SIR: Our sufferings, owing to the rascality of deputy postmasters, is intolerable, and cries aloud for relief. We find it absolutely impossible to penetrate the interior with our papers, and unless we can attain them by two or three prompt removals, there is no limiting the injurious consequences that may result from it; let me therefore entreat the postmaster general to do an act of justice, and render us a partial service, by the removal of Holt, in Herkimer, and the appointment of Jabez Fox, esq. also of Howell, of Bath, and the appointment of an excellent friend, W. B. Rochester, esq. a young man of the first respectability and worth in the state; and the removal of Smith, at Little Falls, and the appointment of Hollister; and the removal of Chamberlin, in Oxford, and the appointment of Lot Clark, esq. I am in extreme haste, and can, therefore, add no more; use the enclosed papers according to your discretion, if any thing is done, let it be quickly done, and you may rely upon it much good will result from it.

The fourth of July was celebrated in Charleston, by the two parties into which the community of that city is divided by separate dinners, orations, &c. Col. Wm. Drayton, addressed the "friends of union" and gen. R. Y. Hayne the threatners of disunion.

From the published proceedings, of the union party we copy the following correspondence, which was read at the dinner:

Charleston (S. C.) June 5.

His excellency Andrew Jackson, president of the U. S.

SIR: The undersigned, on behalf of their fellow citizens of "the union and state rights' party," have the honor to invite you to a dinner to be given on the approaching fourth of July, in celebration of the anniversary of American Independence.

Had we regarded this return of the birth-day of our nation, as an era of merely ordinary import, we should not perhaps have taken the liberty to present ourselves to you. But the case is far otherwise.

As a native of the state of South Carolina, and one whom she has always delighted to honor, we do not doubt, sir, that you have felt such interest in the expression of sentiment and opinion, which have been elicited during the progress of affairs among us, as to be fully aware of the great lines of distinction drawn between the several parties in the state, as well as of the portentous omens which threaten us with civil convulsion. It is well known to you and to the world, that the late political discussions and events have tended to loosen those bonds of fraternal affection which once united the remotest parts of our great empire. Geographical limits are familiarly referred to as connected with separate and disjointed interests, and too many of our youth are growing up, as we fear, and deeply lament, in the dangerous belief that these interests are incompatible and contrasted.

We conceive it, sir, to be a matter of infinite importance to our country, that these fatal errors should be promptly corrected, and the feelings which they engender thoroughly eradicated, that the ancient ties of friendship may once more knit closely together the several members of our happy confederacy. It is our special aim to revive in its full force, the benign spirit of union —to renew the mutual confidence in each other's good will and patriotism, without which the laws and statutes, and forms of government of these states, will exist in vain. We disclaim from the bottom of our hearts, all political or party purposes of local nature or circumscribed extent. We esteem as brethren and associates all who cordially unite with us in devotion to our common country, and in the firm resolution to defend her institutions, and transmit them unimpaired to the generations that shall succeed us. Your sentiments in relation to this subject are well known, and have been repeatedly announced, and we are proud to regard you, sir, as one of our fathers and leaders.

In this spirit, and with these views, we request the honor of your presence on the approaching occasion. The citizens of Charleston have flattered themselves with the hope that you would be able without inconvenience, to comply with their invitation, urged some time since through the municipal authorities. May we be permitted to indicate the period of your visit, so far as that it shall include the anniversary of the declaration of independence. With the most respectful consideration, sir, we have the honor to be your excelleney's obedient servants,

The letter from gen. Andrew Jackson, in reply to the above, was read, after the 4th toast, from the centre right by col. Cross, from the left by captain E. P. Starr, and, from the great extent of the bower and assemblage, it not having been heard at the extreme ends,* it was there read severally, by the hon. Thomas Lee, and the hon. Thomas S. Grimke.

"Washington city, June 14th, 1831.

"GENTLEMEN: It would afford me much pleasure, could I at the same time accept your invitation of the 5th inst. and that which I was before honored by the municipal authorities of Charleston. A necessary attention to the duties of my office, must deprive me of the gratification I should have had in paying, under such circumstances, a visit to the state of which I feel a pride in calling myself a citizen by birth.

"Could I accept your invitation, it would be with the hope that all parties—all the men of talent, exalted patriotism, and private worth, who have been divided in the manner you describe, might be found united before the alter of their country, on the day set apart for the solemn celebration of its independence—independence which cannot exist without union, and with it is eternal,

"Every enlightened citizen must know, that a separation, could it be effected, would begin with civil discord, and end in colonial dependence on a foreign power, and obliteration from the list of nations. But he should also see that high and sacred duties which must and will, at all hazards, be performed, present an insurmountable barrier to the success of any plan of disorganization, by whatever patriotic name it may be decorated, or whatever high teelings may be arrayed for its support. The force of these evident truths, the effect they must ultimately have upon the minds of those who seem for a moment to have disregarded them, make me cherish the belief I have expressed, that could I have been present at your celebration, I should have found all parties concurring to promote the object of your association. You have distinctly expressed that object—"to revive in its full force the benign spirit of union, and to renew the mutual confidence in each other's good will and patriotism." Such endeavors, calmly and firmly persevered in, cannot fail of success. Such sentiments are appropiate to the celebration of that high festival, which commemorates the stimultaneous declaration of union and independence —and when on the return of that day, we annually renew the pledge that our heroic fathers made, of life, of fortune, and of sacred honor, let us never forget that it was given to sustain us as a united, not less than an independent people.

"Knowing as I do, the private worth and public virtues of distinguished citizens to whom declarations inconsistent with an attachment to the union have been ascribed, I cannot but hope, that if acturately reported, they were the effect of momentary excitement, not deliberate design; and that such men can never have formed the project of pursuing a course of redress through any other than constitutional means; but if I am mistaken in this charitable hope, then in the language of the father of our country, I would conjure them to estimate properly "the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness;" to cherish "a cordial, habitual, and immoveable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity, watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts."

"Your patriotic endeavors, gentlemen, to lessen the violence of party dissention, cannot be forwarded more effectually than by inculcating a reliance on the justice of our national councils, and pointing to the fast approaching extinction of the public debt, as an event which must necessarily produce modifications in the revenue system, by which all interests, under a spirit of mutual accommodation and concession, will be probably protected.

"The grave subjects introduced in your letter of invitation, have drawn from me the frank exposition of opinions, which I have neither interest nor inclination to conceal.

"Grateful for the kindness you have personally expressed, I renew my expressions of regret that it is not in my power to accept your kind invitation, and have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient and humble servant,

(Signed) ANDREW JACKSON.

LETTER FROM MR. MADISON.

From the American Sentinel of July 13.

The recent letter of the venerable and illustrious patriot, James Madison, found in our paper of to-day, will be read with pleasure, even by those who may heretofore have been inclined to differ in sentiment from that great, and good man. The opinions of such men, given with all the calmness and sober reflection resulting from total abstraction from the political excitements of the day, should be received in the spirit in which they are imparted, and weighed with a due regard to the intelligence, integrity and independence of the source from which they are derived.

The subjoined letter from Mr. Madison to C. J. Ingersoll, esq. has been sent to us by the latter for publication:

Montpelier, June 25, 1831.

Dear sir—I have received your friendly letter of the 18th inst. The few lines which answered your former one of the 21st of January last, were written in haste and in bad health: but they expressed, though without the attention in some respects due to the occasion, a dissent from the views of the president, as to a bank of the United States and a substitute for it; to which I cannot but adhere. The objections to the latter have appeared to me to preponderate greatly over the advantages expected from it, and the constitutionality of the former I still regard as sustained by the considerations to which I yielded in giving my assent to the existing bank.

The charge of inconsistency between my objection to the constitutionality of such a bank in 1791, and my assent in 1817, turns on the question, how far legislative precedents, expounding the constitution, ought to guide succeeding legislatures, and to overrule individual opinions.

Some obscurity has been thrown over the question, by confounding it with the respect due from one legislature to laws passed by preceding legislatures. But the two cases are essentially different. A constitution being derived from a superior authority, is to be expounded and obeyed, not controled or varied by the subordinate authority of a legislature. A law on the other hand, resting on no higher authority than that possessed by every successive legislature, its expediency as well as its meaning is within the scope of the latter.

The case in question has its true analogy in the obligation arising from judicial expositions of the law on succeeding judges; the constitution being a law to the legislator, as the law is a rule of decision to the judge.

And why are judicial precedents, when formed on due discussion and consideration, and deliberately sanctioned by reviews and repetitions, regarded as of binding influence, or rather of authoritative force, in settling the meaning of a law? It must be answered, 1st. because it is a reasonable and established axiom, that the good of society requires that the rules of conduct of its members should be certain and known, which would not be the case if any judge, disregarding the decisions of his predecessors, should vary the rule of law according to his individual interpretation of it. Misera est servitus ubi jus est aut vagum aut incognitum. 2d. because an exposition of the law publicly made, and repeatedly confirmed by the constituted authority, carries with it, by fair inference, the sanction of those who, having made the law through their legislative organ, appear under such circumstances to have determined its meaning through their judiciary organ.

Can it be of less consequence that the meaning of a constitution should be fixed and known, than that the meaning of a law should be so? Can indeed a law be fixed in its meaning and operation, unless the constitution be so? On the contrary, if a particular legislature, differing in the construction of the constitution, from a series of preceding constructions, proceed to act on that difference, they not only introduce uncertainty and instability in the constitution, but in the laws themselves; inasmuch as all laws preceding the new construction and inconsistent with it, are not only annulled for the future, but virtually pronounced nullities from the beginning.

But it is said that the legislator having sworn to support the constitution, must support it in his own construction of it, however different from that put on it by his predecessors, or whatever be the consequences of the construction. And is not the judge under the same oath to support the law? yet has it ever been supposed that he was required, or at liberty to disregard all precedents, however solemnly repeated and regularly observed; and by giving effect to his own abstract and individual opinions, to disturb the established course of practice in the business of the community? Has the wisest and most conscientious judge ever scrupled to acquiesce in decisions in which he has been overruled by the mature opinions of the majority of his colleagues; and subsequently to conform himself thereto, as to authoritative expositions of the law? And is it not reasonable that the same view of the official oath should be taken by a legislator, acting under the constitution, which is his guide, as is taken by a judge, acting under the law, which is his?

There is in fact and in common understanding, a necessity of regarding a course of practice, as above characterised, in the light of a legal rule of interpreting a law: and there is a like necessity of considering it a constitutional rule of interpreting a constitution.

That there may be extraordinary and peculiar circumstances controlling the rule in both cases, may be admitted: but with such exceptions, the rule will force itself on the practical judgment of the most ardent theorist. He will find it impossible to adhere to, and act officially upon, his solitary opinions as to the meaning of the law or constitution, in opposition to a construction reduced to practice, during a reasonable period of time; more especially where no prospect existed of a change of construction by the public or its agents. And if a reasonable period of time, marked with the usual sanctions, would not bar the individual prerogative, there could be no limitation to its exercise, although the danger of error must increase with the increasing oblivion of explanatory circumstances, and with the continual changes in the import of words and phrases.

Let it then be left to the decision of every intelligent and candid judge, which, on the whole, is most to be relied on for the true and safe construction of a constitution, that which has the uniform sanction of successive legislative bodies through a period of years, and under the varied ascendancy of parties; or that which depends upon the opinions of every new legislature, heated as it may be by the spirit of party, eager in the pursuit of some favorite object, or led astray by the eloquence and address of popular statesmen, themselves, perhaps, under the influence of the same misleading causes.

It was in conformity with the view here taken, of the respect due to deliberate and reiterated precedents, that the bank of the United States, though on the original question held to be unconstitutional, received the executive signature in the year 1817. The act originally establishing a bank had undergone ample discussions in its passage through the several branches of the government. It had been carried into execution throughout a period of twenty years with annual legislative recognitions; in one instance indeed, with a positive ramification of it into a new state; and with the entire acquiescence of all the local authorities, as well as of the nation at large, to all of which may be added, a decreasing prospect of any change in the public opinion adverse to the constitutionality of such an institution. A veto from the executive under these circumstances, with an admission of the expediency and almost necessity of the measure, would have been a defiance of all the obligations derived from a course of precedents amounting to the requisite evidence of the national judgment and intention.

It has been contended that the authority of precedents was in that case invalidated by the consideration, that they proved only a respect for the stipulated duration of the bank, with a toleration of it until the law should expire, and by the casting vote given in the senate by the vice president in the year 1811, against a bill for establishing a national bank, the vote being expressly given on the ground of unconstitutionality. But if the law itself was unconstitutional, the stipulation was void, and could not be constitutionally fulfilled or tolerated. And as to the negative of the senate by the casting vote of the presiding officer, it is a fact well understood at the time, that it resulted not from an equality of opinions in that assembly on the power of congress to establish a bank, but from a junction of those who admitted the power, but disapproved the plan, with those who denied the power. On a simple question of constitutionality, there was a decided majority in favor of it.

Mrs. Madison joins me in hoping that you will not fail to make the intended visit to Virginia, which promises us the pleasure of welcoming you to our domicil, and in a sincere return of all the good wishes you kindly express for us.

JAMES MADISON.

Mr. Ingersoll.

EDITORIAL AND MISCELLANEOUS.

Sunday is, by many millions of persons in France, Italy, Germany, &c. professors of Christianity, set aside for dancing parties in the afternoon and evening attendance at the theatres, &c. In other countries it is the favorite season for cock-fighting, horse-racing and other like "sports." In England and the United States the day is preferred by many hundreds of thousands for excessive eating and drinking, with much sleeping, and not a little wrangling and fighting—and we see that in Chili it is appointed for holding the elections—to hurrah for the ins, or hurrah for the outs.

Mormonism. Most of our readers must recollect that certain knaves, pretending to have found some holy writings hidden under a stone in Ontario county, New York, started a new religion! The leaders make bold pretensions and assert a gift to work miracles. The members of this sect are now said to amount to 1,000 souls!—some of whom, very honestly, no doubt, believe in all things that are told them, and yet have borne the character of worthy men. Their great prophet Jo, has selected a part of Geauga county, Ohio, and pronounced it to be "the promised land," and thither the deluded people are flocking, chiefly from New York. As a few men of property have been induced to cast their funds into a common stock, there is no want of recruits from among the lazy and the worthless classes of society. They say that a miracle was worked in their behalf, by clearing a passage through the ice at Buffalo—some of them affect a power even to raise the dead, and perchance, (such is the weakness of human nature), really believe that they can do it! The chiefs of those people appear to exempt themselves from labor, and herein is, probably, the grand object for which they have established this new religion.

The society of Friends—and reform in England. The London Courier of the latest date received, contains something of a novelty, in the shape of an address to the electors of Northampton, by the principal members of the society of Friends, residing in that county. The subjoined is an extract from this address:

"Unaccustomed to take an active part in political struggles, but deeply interested for our country's welfare, and considering the present a very important crisis—we, the undersigned of the society of Friends, think it right to give our support to those candidates who have pledged themselves to the great cause of parliamentary reform: at the same time we are anxious distinctly to state that we do so, not from a factious and party spirit, or vindictive feelings towards any, but from a firm and deliberate conviction that the bill brought forward by the present ministry, and sanctioned by our sovereign, so far from having a tendency to produce revolution and anarchy, is a measure fraught with the most beneficial consequences, not only to the country, but to the world at large—a measure which would lead to numerous and salutary important alterations in our laws—bring about a speedy and effectual abolition of negro slavery—and such an alteration in our criminal code as would render it more consistent with the spirit of Christianity."

Wool. The Ontario, New York, Repository says—The quantity of this article purchased by our merchants this season, we are informed, exceeds 100,000 lbs. for which cash and high prices have been paid. We shall hereafter endeavor to procure a statement of the quantity bought in this place, and the amount paid for the same, for publication. A single load was brought in by a farmer one day last week, weighing 2,979 lbs. for which he received $2,175.

Timber lands. The U. S. schooners Sylph and Spark have proceeded to Florida, for the protection of the United States' live oak lands, on which great depredations have been latterly committed.

Post office law. It has been recently decided in the district court of the United States, for the district of Maine, that, under the prohibitory clause of the post office law, packages of various descriptions, such as packages of merchandise, or of bank notes, can be carried by mail carriers without incurring the penalty, but not packages of letters.

New Hampshire. At a convention of the republican members of the legislature of this state, Ichabod Bartlett, John B. H. Odiorne, William A. Kent, Charles Barrette, James Wilson, jun. Leonard Jarvis, Joseph Sawyer and John Willson, were appointed delegates to the national republican convention to be held in Baltimore, in December next.

Massachusetts. The fourth fruitless attempt has been made to elect members of congress for Essex North and Bristol districts, in Massachusetts. There are three parties, Jackson, and Anti-Jackson and Anti-Masonic.

Bunker Hill boys. On the 17th of June last, a few of the citizens of Ipswich celebrated the anniversary of the battle of Bunker Hill, by firing salutes and partaking of a collation—mainly for the purpose of honoring the survivors of that battle—together with the other veterans of the revolution now living in that town. The whole number of that class now alive amounts to between twenty and thirty; present on this occasion, sixteen.

Colombia. The persons lately exiled from Colombia are—one general, four colonels, ten commandants, eight captains, and six lieutenants. This looks well, and affords a hope of better times in this land of military desperadoes. Modern days have only brought forth one Washington.

The British consul, Mr. Watts, has been grossly abused, because of his exertions to protect the property of British subjects at Carthagena—and it is said that certain Englishmen, resident at Santa Fe, had been murdered. So has Mr. Myer, a German brewer, at Maracaybo—and by soldiers. But the Colombians are most enraged at the English, and commit great excesses against them. These people are yet preparing to kill still more of their own countrymen—one military revolution only paving the way for another. A general Castelli has been shot—and his surviving friends will probably shoot some other general. Generals appear to be "as plenty, as blackberries," in Colombia.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR OF THE REGISTER.

Extract from a letter from a very respectable gentleman of North Carolina, dated June 24.

"I hope sir, you will succeed in your laudable undertaking (the American System). It is gaining ground in the south. Although we have our anti-tariffites, our nullifyers, and those who are ready to advocate rebellion, (yes, sir, and members of congress too!)—these treasonable theorists and sophists will speedily be silenced by the good sense of the people. They must and will see what is their interest. The facts which are daily developing and being spread before the people, will dispel the mists by which their visions have been blinded—conviction must follow—and, in its train, the prostration of the power of those who have struggled to depress the energy and industry of our own people.

"There is no sound reason why manufactories should not succeed as well in the south, as in the north—on the contrary, I think there are some reasons, and good and substantial ones too, why they would do better. We have, from the middle of our states to the foot of the mountains, an abundance of water power, and as fine a climate as man could ask for. We have an abundance of grain, and could raise much more if we had a demand for it. We grow the cotton, and could have it at the very doors of the manufacturers—we have an abundance of land well adapted to the raising of sheep, and consequent supply of wool: and as to labor, we have slaves that we could employ in the factories. But should free white laborers be prefered, we could obtain them here as cheap as in the north. If these things be true, (and there are none but the most wilfully stupid who would deny that they are so), what prevents us from becoming a manufacturing people, as well as being the principal growers of the raw materials? Why do we oppose the AMERICAN SYSTEM? Forsooth it is said—"we do not wish government to direct our business, or to force us into a system contrary to our will." Now, if government were to attempt thus to control the private business of individuals, it would be wrong; but where government adopts a policy which is calculated to benefit all at home, while it renders us independent of capricious supplies from abroad, then I affirm it is the duty of all to acquiesce in its decision. Those, therefore, who, from pride of opinion, or some other kindred spirit, do not think proper to conform to the business and improvements of the age and policy of the country, should certainly not blame that policy for sufferings which their obstinacy have brought upon themselves.

"This, I presume was the situation of the southern people when the tariff was adopted as the policy of the country:—We were profitably engaged in growing the raw material, and, therefore, disinclined to change our business; and now when cotton has fallen in price, and we planters find it difficult to acquire money, we are unwilling to charge any portion of the depression in the price of the article to the chief cause—over supply; but lay all our misfortunes to the "abominable tariff," and make it the scape-goat to cover our own acts of folly and weakness, in omitting to direct a portion of our capital and means to the fabrication of home supplies. It is now time that we had assumed the moral resolution to confess our errors, and do better for the future. We see the north full of money, and England overflowing with it—and the southern states almost drained. What is the reason of this condition of things? To me the cause is obvious. The south abounds in gold mines; and, according to some of our politicians, exports thirty millions of cotton annually—and yet money is scarce! How is this? England is a manufacturing people, and we send our cotton there to be manufactured, and pay them three times as much for the manufactured article as they paid us for the raw material—the people of the north in our own country, are also a manufacturing people, and the remark which I made relative to England holds good as to them. Here is the explanation of the whole mystery. This is the true reason why money is plenty with them and scarce with us. All the cotton we raise, and all the gold we dig, are consumed, and still there is a balance of trade against us, arising out of the increased appreciation given to the articles we purchase by the labor bestowed upon them by the manufacturers of England and the north.

"Now sir, would not we of the south have acted wisely—would we not now have been much better off, had we, years ago, entered into the manufacturing business? Had we converted a part of our population into manufacturers, we should, of course, have raised less cotton; but the price would have been better, for excess of quantity invariably decreases price; and we should have had at our own doors a market for our surplus bread stuffs, cotton, &c. and would have been the gainers of the whole amount of labor employed in the fabrication of the manufactures, and might, in our turn, have been competitors in the same markets with our brethren of the north and with the manufacturers of England.

"But, sir, after all our misfortunes, though many things have been said and done calculated to alienate the people of the south from their brethren of the north and east, believe me, there is no people in the United States more firmly attached to the constitution of the union than the people of the south. Some of us may have been deluded by the passionate harangues, false reasoning, and mistaken facts of those heated zealots who have attempted to stir up a spirit of disaffection amongst us; but, my dear sir, you may rest assured, that the people in general have no idea of a separation."

Extract from a letter from another in Indiana, dated Terre Haute, 26th June.

"Your Register deserves all care and support from the people of the west, and for ten years or thereabouts of reading, I can pronounce it the most valuable, to me, of all papers.

"Our country has undergone magical changes within the last twelve years. In 1820 there were but few families on the Wabash river, north of Fort Harrison, in the vicinity of which our town is situated. There is now, within ninety miles north along the river, several counties with an aggregate populaton of one hundred thousand, and still rapidly increasing. In 1824 the first steamboat landed at Terre Haute, during the past season we have had between sixty and seventy arrivals and departures. Within the same period, from a village of two or three small cabins, we have grown to a handsome and flourishing town, enjoying a large trade in salted provisions and other products of the country, and an extensive trade in merchandise with the surrounding counties. To continue prosperous, we only need a demand for our breadstuffs, &c. and this can only be secured by fostering our manufactures, and thus create profitable divisions of labor among ourselves, of a permanent character. A war in Europe, (which some seem to look for as a season of profit to us), might for a time lead us a cheerful dance; but ultimately would not fail to bring disappointment to all, and to many, ruin. Peace in Europe, the industry of our country divided into proper channels, each section relying reciprocally on the others, our policy adjusted to a state of universal quiet, would prepare us to reap advantage from change in any quarter. Thus armed, kings might squabble and powers come in hostile collision, and we could not fail to profit by their calamities: how absurd then would it be for us to depend on the caprice of Europe for the necessaries and comforts of life?"

Extract from a letter from a gentleman in Rhode Island, July 1, 1831.

"I recollect hearing you remark, in New York, in May last, that you should be pleased to receive, any information of recent improvements or inventions, found useful, in any branch of AMERICAN INDUSTRY, particularly in labor-saving machines:—Having lately had occasion to be in Connecticut, I visited the cotton establishment at Leesville, in Middlesex county, belonging to Messrs. H. & S. Lee, who are the patent-right proprietors of a newly invented machine for making cotton ROVEN—which bids fair to rival any thing of the kind, in Europe or America. This machine is called the "American speeder," and is designed as a substitute for the belted and double geered speeder. Its peculiar advantages over the latter consist in its first cost, being less than one half—and requiring less than one half the power and room of a double geered speeder. It makes the roven equally good; with an even uniform twist. I saw a twelve spindle belted American speeder, running in the Messrs. Lees mill, which turns out daily from one hundred and eighty to two hundred pounds of roven, being something over fifty per cent. more work than is produced upon a double geered speeder of twenty spindles.

"This machine is so constructed, that the flyers can be belted or geered at pleasure. Its motions are remarkably perfect and true, its velocity very great. I saw both belted and geered running at Leesville, and at the neighboring factories, and eight of these geered machines are now in successful operation in the East Greenwich Manufacturing company's steam mill, in this state.

"I was so much pleased with this improvement, in a very important part of cotton manufacturing, that it give me pleasure, (as I know it will you), in giving you the facts above.

"As your invaluable Register is deservedly the highest authority for correct information on every subject touching American industry and the arts, I hope you will give the substance of this letter a passing notice—for the benefit of American manufacturers.

A FRIEND TO THE AMERICAN SYSTEM."

FROM A GENTLEMAN OF ALABAMA.

"I am aware that the laborer is worthy of his hire, and particularly one who breasts so strong a torrent of opposition as yourself, and other advocates of the American System and internal improvements. That your labors may not be in vain, is the earnest wish of many, though probably not a majority, of the citizens of Alabama."

[This letter contained a remittance—but is inserted because that it came from Alabama.]

FROM A VALUED FRIEND IN NEW HAMPSHIRE.

"I have taken the Register for many years, and shall continue to take it while it supports the leading interests of the country, agriculture and manufactures. My opinions on these points, for the most part accord with yours, with the exception of the duty on coarse wool; for I am satisfied, though that duty was generally supposed to bear hard upon the manufacturer without being advantageous to the farmer, yet the latter interest has been greatly benefited by it. The third and fourth quality, i. e. half blood merino and common wool, which could not be sold two years since for 25 and 20 cents, now find a ready sale at 55 and 45, while the first and second qualities, viz. seven eighths and full blood merino, are not so readily sought for at the same advance. By far the greater quantity of wool now grown in New Hampshire and Vermont, is of the 3rd and 4th qualities. I find in the Register of the 11th instant, [June] that a good deal of wool is grown in North Carolina, which is probably of the 3rd and 4th qualities; and that at a shearing at Elk Ridge, 15 yearling sheep gave 99 lbs. after cleaning, and that one lamb's fleece weighed 11 lbs. This, surely, must be of that quality—for we seldom obtain more than two and a half pounds of the first quality, and three and a half of the second quality, per head, under the best management in this part of the country, which is admirably adapted to the constitution of the animal generally, whether it be the bearer of fine or of coarse wool. It is idle to say that coarse wool cannot be profitably grown in this country. The coarse wool sheep are far more prolific, are less liable to disease, are less dainty in their feeding, require much less care, produce a far greater quantity of wool in proportion to the nourishment consumed, and, being a size suitable for the shambles, are in greater request by the butchers. There is no man more firmly attached to the American System than myself, but I have ever considered that the great object of directly encouraging manufactures was, indirectly, to encourage agriculture, a leading interest. I have no idea of a tariff that will allow the importation of a raw material which can be abundantly grown at home. I am aware that England formerly pursued this policy, but it was at a time when there was no manufacturing enterprise or capital in the kingdom, and her woollen manufacturers were for the most part foreigners. With us the case is different. We have great enterprise and immense capital; and with the present tariff system, PROVIDED THE REVENUE LAWS ARE RIGIDLY ENFORCED, the woollen manufacture will eventually prosper. But I hope the agricultural interest of New England will not rest content with merely supplying the operatives with pork and potatoes, and suffer a raw material, upon the production of which its prosperity depends, to be imported from foreign countries. You will please to understand that I am not a grower of coarse but of fine wool, having never had, for the last twenty years, less than a thousand sheep bearing wool of the first quality, and at this time more than 2,000; yet I am satisfied that, taking into view the advantages before enumerated, together with the difference in the capital invested, that the production of the 3rd and 4th descriptions of wool is as profitable as that of the finer qualities."

THE TREATY OF VERONA.

Among the papers lately introduced into the discussions in France, is the treaty of Verona, which having laid our hands upon a copy of, it may not be amiss at the present time to bring to the recollection of our readers. With that view we offer them the following translation of the treaty, the authenticity of which cannot be doubted, as it is recognized by Chateaubriand, one of the signers to it, in a book recently published in his own defence: [Nat. Int.

TRANSLATION.

From the Journal du Havre of the 17th March, 1831.

Diplomatists pretend that France is bound by all the treaties, without exception, that have been concluded between the late expelled government and the other powers. Is it also bound by the following treaty, translated from an English journal or paper, published in 1823?

SECRET TREATY OF VERONA. The undersigned, specially authorised to make some additions to the treaty of the holy alliance, after having exchanged their respective credentials, have agreed as follows:

Art. 1. The high contracting powers being convinced that the system of representative government is equally as incompatible with the monarchial principles as the maxim of the sovereignty of the people with the divine right, engage mutually, in the most solemn manner, to use all their efforts to put an end to the system of representative governments, in whatever country it may exist in Europe, and to prevent its being introduced in those countries where it is not yet known.

Art. 2. As it cannot be doubted that the liberty of the press is the most powerful means used by the pretended supporters of the rights of nations, to the detriment of those of princes, the high contracting parties promise reciprocally to adopt all proper measures to suppress it, not only in their own states, but also in the rest of Europe.

Art. 3. Convinced that the principles of religion contribute most powerfully to keep nations in the state of passive obedience which they owe to their princes, the high contracting parties declare it to be their intention to sustain, in their respective states, those measures which the clergy may adopt, with the aim of ameliorating their own interests, so intimately connected with the preservation of the authority of princes; and the contracting powers join in offering their thanks to the pope, for what he has already done for them, and solicit his constant co-operation in their views of submitting the nations.

Art. 4. The situation of Spain and Portugal unite unhappily all the circumstances to which this treaty has, particularly, reference. The high contracting parties, in confiding to France the care of putting an end to them, engage to assist her in the manner which may the least compromit them with their own people and the people of France, by means of a subsidy on the part of the two empires, of twenty millions of francs every year, from the date of the signature of this treaty to the end of the war.

Art. 5. In order to establish in the Peninsula the order of things which existed before the revolution of Cadiz, and to insure the entire execution of the articles of the present treaty, the high contracting parties give to each other the reciprocal assurance, that as long as their views are not fulfilled, rejecting all other ideas of utility, or other measures to be taken, they will address themselves with the shortest possible delay, to all the authorities existing in their states, and to all their agents in foreign countries, with the view to establish connections tending towards the accomplishment of the objects proposed by this treaty.

Art. 6. This treaty shall be renewed with such changes as new circumstances may give occasion for, either at a new congress, or at the court of one of the contracting parties, as soon as the war with Spain shall be terminated.

Art. 7. The present treaty shall be ratified, and the ratifications exchanged at Paris within the space of six months.

Made at Verona, 22d Nov. 1822.

SPANISH LIBERTY!

[COPY.]

Translation of a note from the principal secretary of state of H. C. M. to the minister of the U. States.

SIR: It having been observed, for some time past, that the masters and commanders of vessels of different nations which arrive at Cadiz, are in the habit of bringing privately a considerable number of letters, newspapers and pamphlets, to the great prejudice of his majesty's service, inasmuch as they deliver them to the persons to whom they are addressed without the intervention of any of the authorities, the king my august master, has directed me to inform your excellency, as I have now the honor of doing, in order that you may communicate the same to the consul of the U. States at Cadiz: That the masters and commanders of vessels will not be permitted to violate the laws of the country, by conveying correspondence to be delivered by themselv s, or even to throw the same into the post office through the aperture for the reception of letters; but that they are to deliver such correspondence to the officers of the post office of the above port of Cadiz, and that any contravention to this rule, will subject them to payment of a fine of $500, which is the penalty imposed by the ordinances of maritime couriers, on the masters of Spanish vessels that are found fraudulently conveying correspondence to private persons.

I avail myself of this opportunity of renewing to your excellency, the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

God preserve your excellency many years.

(Signed) MANUEL GONZALEZ SALMON.

Aranjuez, April 8, 1831.

[TRANSLATION.]

SIR: The king my august master, having been pleased to approve several measures which have been submitted to his royal cognizance, and the object of which is to secure in future the tranquility and good order of the peace of Cadiz, one of the said measures is, that no individual whatever be allowed to land in the said port, without previously presenting a responsible surety as to his conduct in political matters.

I have the honor to communicate the aforesaid for your own information, and that you may be enabled to impart it to the subjects of your government.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurance of my high consideration.

(Signed) MANUEL GONZALEZ SALMON.

"STATE RIGHTS"—AND WRONGS.

From the Newport. (R. I.) Mercury, June 25.

The general assembly of this state convened in this town on Tuesday morning last, and immediately proceeded to business.

The speaker presented the following letter, which was read and laid on the table:

Newport, June 20th, 1831.

Hon. Mr. Tillinghast, speaker house of representatives.

Dear sir: I take leave to inform you, and through you, the house of representatives, that the supreme court of the United States in a case now pending before them for trial on the merits, between the state of New Jersey, plaintiff, and the state of New York, defendant, have decided, that they have, and may exercise jurisdiction as to controversies between state and state, and without the aid of any statute to provide and authourise the process for bringing the suit. In consequence of this decision, the bill renewed in the senate of the United States at their last session, for providing and authorising such process; and which was referred to the judiciary committee, was not reported by that committee; it having become, in their opinion, unnecessary; nor was a report pressed by me, as I had the pledge of the honorable senator from Massachusetts, who was a member of that committee, that if the state of Rhode Island thought proper to prefer a bill to the supreme court against the state of Massachusetts that the state of Massachusetts would, upon summons, take notice, and become a party to the bill.

It remains, therefore, only for the general assembly to decide whether they will have such a bill prepared and preferred on the part of this state against the state of Massachusetts, for the decision and final settlement of the controversy, relative to our northern boundary line, which has been so long subsisting between this state and that.

If this measure is to be resorted to for settlement, (and it is the only one we can have, for Massachusetts has refused every other), I beg leave to submit, that it ought to be adopted without loss of time; as the evidence in the case, so far as depends on the testimony of living witnesses and other helps, may be lost by delay. I have only to add, that I have, and it is at the service of the general assembly, a copy of the bill above alluded to, viz: of the state of New Jersey vs. state of New York; and also a tender of any information in my power to give, or of any other service in my power to render.

I have the honor to be, and remain your and the general assembly's much obliged and faithful servant,

ASHER ROBBINS.

THE CHEROKEES.

Cedar Creek, Cherokee nation, 6th June, 1831.

Mr. Boudinott, editor of the Cherokee Phœnix.

Sir: The circuit court of Chattooga district being in session during the last week of the month of May, I availed myself of an opportunity to attend it, and there enjoy the agreeable society and conversation of my friends from various portions of our country, whose business concentrated them there. The few days spent in this manner, afforded me relishing alleviations of the troubles and heart afflicting trials I often endure, from the effects of the Georgia laws which have so long disturbed the repose of our people. I returned the 27th to rest in the peaceable circle of my family, and to resume the agreeable occupation of superintending my agricultural affairs. The 28th dawned upon my farm with usual sweetness—I walked over my plantation, saw my growing corn, and the green verdant portions of my place, covered with luxuriant crops of rye and oats. Delighted with the anticipations of an abundant harvest, I returned to my stables to see my horses and other domestic objects. Contemplating the improvements I had made with my hands, my houses, my fields, my orchards and garden, rejoicing to know I had accumulated the means of supporting my wife and child; for the time my domestic pleasures superseded the thoughts of gloom which fill my heart on account of our national afflictions.

My attention was drawn to the noise of the tramping of horses, and I saw approach, with glittering muskets and bayonets, the Georgia guard, riding to the gate of my enclosure before my house. I walked up into their midst, and was by them declared a prisoner, and ordered to go to the officer commanding, who had stopped at Mr. Hemphill's, five miles off, to whom I was accordingly conducted. There I saw one of my neighbors, a young gentleman, Mr. John West, an Indian like myself, chained by the leg. Of col. Nelson I asked for what charges they had arrested Mr. West. He said, it was a thing never told prisoners until they had arrived at head quarters. Col. Nelson allowed me the benefit of returning to repose with my family the ensuing night, and granted me other privileges during a long and tedious journey to head quarters, which I was told was owing to the kind treatment I had manifested to a detachment of the guard, on a former occasion, which had tarried over night at my house. As for Mr. West, when they started with us, in their line of march, they put a chain of iron around his neck, and fastened him to another prisoner, a white man and citizen by marriage, who was arrested for living in the nation contrary to the Georgia law, which requires of such the oath of allegiance. I requested the officer to suffer Mr. West to ride his own horse, but he refused.

We were conducted to, and crossed Mr. Ross's ferry, at the head of Coosa, and passed in sight of the residence of our respected principal chief. A detachment was ordered off at Running Waters, in which I was ordered to go, to Mr. Thomas Woodwards, a respectable Cherokee of that neighborhood, whom they also arrested at his house. He was subsequently released, as he told me, after two days, at New Echota, and was there, for the first time, told it was for acting as chairman to a meeting of Cherokees, which passed resolutions expressing their views of the policy of the nation, its sufferings from Georgia, and the mode of it, and calling upon the people of the United States to commisserate their condition, and to respect treaties, which were published in the Cherokee Phœnix.

As the guard charged up to Mr. Woodward's house, they discovered a negro boy belonging to Mrs. Brown approaching in haste from the opposite direction. Him they threatened to whip and ordered forward. On the way two of the guard halted and whipped him, as they themselves told me afterwards, for coming to notify Mr. Woodward that the guard were in the neighborhood. On that we, in the evening, arrived at Oougillogee, where I was allowed to lodge with my friend Nicholson, but the guard advanced and staid all night at Mr. Hick's, where they once in a while beat the drum and played on the fife. Next morning I came up with them, and saw the rev. Mr. Trott, a methodist minister of the gospel, ironed and fastened with locks about the leg. Mr. Trott was arrested for living in the nation without taking the oath of allegiance to the state of Georgia—the penalty is not less than four years hard labor in the penitentiary. At this place, Mr. West was suffered to return, and he afterwards told me that he was so treated because he had defended his father from aspersions cast upon his character by this armed band, which they termed, using insolent language to the guard.

Col. Nelson pursued his march towards the capital of the nation, but suffered me, which was a great kindness, to be more expeditiously conducted to head quarters by two men armed with muskets and bayonets. On the 2d evening after leaving Oougillogee we reached it, which is in the nation, near Scudder's, on the federal road, and first built by the United States troops, under the orders of J. H. Eaton, late secretary of war. Here colonel Sanford is quartered as the principal chief commanding the state standing military, and to him I was escorted and introduced. He asked me for what I was arrested?

Answer. "I suppose for sowing rye in a field abandoned by Arkansas emigrants."

"You must," said he, "give possession to the man who has rented it from the state."

"Send a company of guards and put the man in possion according to your laws," was my reply. He said it was unnecessary, there was the law. "Then give me a written order to yield possession." He refused. I told him my design was to have recourse to the United States laws for redress, and to try titles to the rye field before the federal courts and avoid those of Georgia. But he did not, he said, choose to do either of what I had demanded, and said he had no further business with me.

When I mentioned to Sanford of redress from the United States courts, he said they, the Georgians, would have disregarded a writ of injunction if it had been granted to the Cherokee nation by the supreme court, that the state had gone so far that it would not recede, and would at all hazards take the lands from the Cherokees. Col. Nelson also told me, if the injunction had been granted, Georgia would have sent into this nation 10,000 men.

On my return homewards, at Mr. Moses Downing's, I saw a Cherokee man, named Henry, who had been whipped by a detachment of the guard, because he was found digging snake root near the gold mine at Six's. He was told not to dig for gold because it belonged to the governor of Georgia. Henry said, "these fellows were very troublesome."

On the subject of the rye field, I was detained from my business about 8 days, conducted 80 or 90 miles from home, and detained at head quarters, in regard to it, about ten minutes.

In the year 1828 an Arkansas delegation entered into a treaty at Washington, in which the United States granted inducements to our citizens, who were disposed to runaway from the Georgians, to emigrate to that country, with a promise that the property they may abandon should be paid for to them by the United States. The lands of the nation being held in common and belonging to the Cherokees in the agggregate character of a state or nation, the legislature of our country granted to all those who came into possession, being citizens of the nation, of these improvements so abandoned, to be their rightful property. By virtue of this law I became possessed of a field, on which I sowed rye. Under a forced construction by general Jackson and the state of Georgia, these places were declared to be for the use of Georgia, the titles of which were rightfully extinguished, according to the compact of 1802, from individuals under a treaty not made with our nation, but with a party altogether disconnected with it. In this arbitrary manner were many of our citizens ejected from these places by the state of Georgia, by renting them to such people contrary to the laws of the Cherokee nation and the United States. Because I refused to yield possession of the rye field to one of these renters, I have suffered in the manner above stated. If the state and its officers executed their laws, even according to thier formalities of justice, a prosecution would have been the consequence. But the rye field is a subject which would be a good one to be discussed in the supreme court, and as it individually concerns me and my rights, the award of that august tribunal could not be doubted to result in my favor. But it is better for the policy of the state to wrest the rye field in as summary a manner as that of Naboth's vineyard. I ask pardon in advance of the state of Georgia in particular, and its officers in general, for making these remarks, as I do not wish to be arrested for using "insolent language."

A word to you, citizens of the United States, on the trials my nation experiences. They must occasion to some of you, perhaps, sympathetic feelings. We do remember the peace and tranquility we enjoyed before the present chief magistrate came into power. Since that, darkness and clouds have rested upon our country. "The good neighborhood" promised in treaties by his predecessors have vanished with the withdrawal of his protection, and we now experience the chilling and cold rebukes of our neighbor, the state of Georgia. Yet our treaties are declared to be in force by the supreme court, and we know they have been obtained by valuable considerations surrendered on our part. We do not wish to treat on compulsion by gen. Jackson's policy, and if we have mental courage enough, we shall never treat away our lands so ignominiously extorted. The deed must be done. The last drop of water, and the last particle of our earth must be forced from our hands, if they will have it in that manner. We are denounced as savages, and ignorance is ingrafted upon our name. May not our national and individual forbearance in these persecutions redeem us from these terms? But we would be less anxious for the consequences of these slanders if our women and children could once enjoy peace and safety undisturbed—could we see our children going to school and preparing for usefulness in the world. We are your friends, but we are not in the attitude of granting favors, but of asking for those rights which we once thought would be protected. Will you suffer the golden days of peace, once enjoyed, to sink behind the mountains of state necessity?

"Oh Thou! by whose Almighty nod the scale
Of empire rises, or alternate falls,
Send forth thy saving virtue round this land."

DELAWARE.

From the Delaware Journal.

The following communication has been received from governor Hazzard, by the committee appointed to wait upon him and lay before him the petitions of the citizens of this county, praying him to call a special session of the legislature. The communication is now submitted for public information:

Milton, June 30th, 1831.

Messrs. James Canby, Wm. Seal, and Wm. P. Brobson,

Gentlemen: The petitions of the citizens of New-Castle county for a special session of the legislature, to give them an opportunity of applying for a law to authorise them to make a rail-way, I have duly considered. The first difficulty that presented itself was a doubt whether the present was one of those extraordinary cases contemplated by the constitution; to remove that difficulty it was urged by the committee that the great object of the framers of the constitution was to guard the state from expense from frequent calls of the legislature. To meet the expense the committee present the following proposition, (to wit) that the legislature reserve a right for the state to subscribe for six hundred shares, and upon the transfer of the six hundred shares, I am presented with the names of several very responsible persons who have agreed to pay six hundred dollars, the sum that an extra session is estimated would cost the state. I doubt the propriety of taxing internal improvements; and from the consideration that I have given the subject it does appear that it would be improper to permit the petitioners to pay the expense of a special session of the legislature in any manner whatever. The fear of the improper influence such a measure might have on the members, and the honor of the state appear to forbid it. I am of the opinion, if the legislature is convened, the expense ought to be paid by the state. In conclusion, I would say that at present, the application for a special session of the legislature, does not in my opinion, present one of those extraordinary cases contemplated by the constitution. I hope the citizens of New Castle county will sustain no injury by delay.

I am gentlemen, with great regard, your obedient servant,
DAVID HAZZARD.

CAMDEN AND AMBOY RAIL WAY.

From the U. S. Gazette.

We have been plied of late with queries as to the state of the work on this important route—as to the probable time of its completion—the price of its stock, &c. With regard to the latter, we must refer our querists to the weekly statements which we give of such matters. As to the other parts of the interrogatories, as they interest the public more, we have made diligent inquires, with a view of satisfying the public, who have generally, perhaps individually, an interest in the completion of the work.

The following information is furnished from one of the engineers of the route. We give without regard to classification—it appears to be sufficiently minute to gratify curiosity so extensively felt here and elsewere.

"From Camden to South Amboy, the two present extreme points of the line, the length of the rail road is 61 miles, viz: from Camden to Bordentown 27 miles and from Bordentown to Amboy 34 miles--being a variation of only ¾ of a mile in the whole distance from a straight line.

"In order to make the stock productive at the earliest possible period, the attention of the engineers has been chiefly directed to the section of the road directly across the state. Of this route of 34 miles, 24 miles will be ready for the rails the present week, and a part of the permament rails are now being laid between Amboy and South river. There are three temporary sections of rails in use within 4 miles from Bordentown; at one of which, there are five tracts for the sake of greater expedition in excavating.

"The month of June will complete the whole distance from the Delaware to Amboy bay, with the exception of the Amboy cut, which will be finished in July. The bridge across Black creek, near Bordentown, will be finished in the course of the present month. At Croswick's the two piers have been sunk for some months, and the frame work nearly completed: and the other bridges in a state of forwardness, so as to cause not an hour's delay. Nothing will then remain but to lay down an uninterrupted line of rails, and this will be done as speedily as possible, consistent with the fixed determination of the company to open the communication with a guarantie to the state of New Jersey, which is largely interested in the road, and the public, whose confidence will not be jeoparded by premature haste, only when it can be done with entire safety and after testing with the locomotive engines every section of the rails. This, as well as all other arrangements connected with the preparation of the road for travelling, is under the immediate supervision of the two Messrs Stevens, whose personal attention is exclusively and laboriously devoted to urging on this work to rapid completion, under all the advantages of their long and tried experience and well known energy of character. The locomotive will run from Bordentown in about 6 weeks to Croswick's and the entire line through, will be ready for use from October to November.

"The contracts have been done so far without defalcation, and to the entire satisfaction of the contractors with a single exception, where a small gratuity of about 3,000 dollars is asked. No advance has, in any instance, been given or demanded during the progress of the sections, which were divided into 3-4 of a mile each; and every contract was let within the estimates of the accomplished engineer, maj. Wilson, who surveyed the route, and who, on presenting his surveys, offered to contract for the whole at the several rates of his report.

"As soon as a single track is ready for use, the steam boats of the present lines are to be taken at a valuation, by disinterested persons, mutually chosen, and the profits of the transportation immediately pass into the hands of the company, and dividends made, if thought expedient, at once.

"Between Camden and Bordentown, a distance of twenty-seven miles, the labor is comparatively trifling, and for sixteen miles of this section the permanent rails may be laid without delay, so singularly level is the route. Major Wilson's estimate for the grading of this twenty-seven miles, was $3,000 per mile. With a few trifling exceptions, the embankment and excavations on this part are within a few days of completion to about 4½ miles from Camden; and the whole force from the upper section will be soon at liberty to give an undivided attention to this portion of the work.

"The legislature of New Jersey, in order to promote the two great objects of the rail road and canal companies now amalgamated, the execution of which will reflect honor on the state by the magnitude of these noble works, while it will give to its treasury a large and increasing revenue from the taxes to be assessed, has guarantied by charter, the following important privileges:—

"That the companies may not be harassed by speculative and stock jobbing attempts during the time allowed in their respective charters, for completion, say 8 to 9 years, no rail road can be made from three miles below Camden, or within three miles of any part of its line terminating at Amboy, on the one side, to a distance of five miles from any point of the canal in its whole course on the other.

"If any rail road is granted for 30 years within three miles of the line of the Camden and Amboy rail road, the state relinquishes all the tax now assessed.

"If any rail road is ever allowed to be made within five miles of the Delaware and Raritan canal company, that company has the first option to construct it.

"The state of New Jersey relinquishes its whole interest in the Camden and Amboy rail-road company, all its dividends and stock amounting at present to $140,000, if it grants or allows any other road across the state for the "transportation of passengers between Philadelphia and New York."

"The motive and reason of these grants will be seen at once, from the fact that the state of New Jersey can increase its interest two thousand five hundred shares more in these companies, and on the expiration of the charters, the whole may become the property of the state, by paying an amount not exceeding the cost and expenses of construction."

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL.

For the following summary of the report of the president and directors of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, we are indebted to the industrious editor of the "Winchester Republican."

"The great length of the annual report of the president and directors of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, submitted at their late meeting, compels us reluctantly to omit its insertion in our paper. It contains many interesting details, and presents to the friends of this great work much encouragement, not only from what has been done, but from the inducements and hopes which past experience and a growing confidence inspire, respecting its future progress and advantages. A brief view of some of the principal matters contained in the report may not be unacceptable to the reader.

The receipts of the company from every source, since the organization of the board, amount to $1,740,205 46. Out of these, there have been disbursed for the construction, improvement and repairs of the canal, the sum of $1,539,521 38, and the further sum of $190,295 78 for all other purposes connected with the canal, for the last three years, leaving a balance of $10,388 35, which sum, together with the 2½ per cent. on each share recently called for; (making in all 50 per cent. of the capital stock)—and the outstanding balances, will constitute a fund for the prosecution of those sections of the canal now under contract.

At the close of the preceding year there were 6,000 laborers, and 700 horses employed on the canal. These numbers, as the last returns show, have been reduced to 1,326 of the former, and 276 of the latter, and these are still subject to further reductions, every week, as the work advances to completion.

The canal between Seneca and the Point of Rocks, now under contract, and embracing a distance of about 26 miles, is in a state of forwardness, and would be completed at an early day, were it not for the difficulties encountered in the construction of the aqueduct across the Monocacy. This work has been placed three time under contract, and by the present contract it is stipulated to be completed by next November.—The contractor has found it necessary to construct a railway upwards of two miles long for the transportation of the stone to it. The opinion is expressed, however, that, should the autumn prove as unhealthy as the last, this aqueduct will not be ready for the admission of the water until the close of the next spring, when its completion is confidently expected.

The canal being then finished to the Point of Rocks, the inquiry will arise whence the water to fill it is to be obtained in the absence of any final decision of the controversy with the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company. This part of the canal is designed to be filled with water from the river at Harper's Ferry; but being prevented, by the litigation alluded to, from attaining that point in a convenient time, it will be left without the intended supply. In the mean time several modes have been suggested and partially considered for filling it with water temporarily.

To obviate this inconvenience arising from the injunction obtained by the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, a tender of a compromise was made to the latter company to construct both works jointly to Harper's Ferry, and a survey was instituted with that view along the contested points; but this at length resulted in the refusal of the rail road company to compromise for a less extent than that to Cumberland—a proposition to which the canal company would not accede from various considerations affecting their interest and the utility of their work. In this situation they were left to the necessity of prosecuting, along with the other company, the survey to Cumberland, agreeably to an order of the chancellor, when it was perceived that the survey thus directed would consume many years, and be accomplished at great cost, and it was determined to obtain a decision, if possible, of the merits of the case, on the facts manifested by the joint survey to Harper's Ferry. In this attempt the board were not disappointed, but had the pleasure to be informed by their counsel that the chancellor of Maryland had directed a return of the evidence taken, and had notified both companies that he would be ready to hear and decide their case upon its merits on the 15th day of the present month, provided both parties were ready for trial. In case of an appeal to the higher tribunals, a hope is entertained of a speedy ultimate decision. Until that time it is proposed to commence the construction of the dam below Harper's Ferry, and to prepare the materials for the requisite locks between that place and the Point of Rocks. Should the decision be unfavorable to the canal company, and the work be consequently driven across the river, the dam would still be required on the other side, while the materials prepared for the locks could be easily removed. The intimation is given that the canal being thus compelled to seek the Virginia shore, will re-cross the river, but at what point no allusion is made. From the character of the canal already completed, the assurance is given, that the entire eastern section of the canal would have been completed in three years from its commencement, had no legal impediment interfered, and the adequate funds been provided.

From the actual cost of the canal already made, and an estimated cost of that part extending to Harper's Ferry, the whole cost of the sixty miles of the canal from Washington, exclusive of contingencies, it is shown will not exceed $30,000 per mile.

A minute comparison is instituted between the work, done and to be done on these sixty miles, and the work as estimated by the United States, engineers, and between the respective costs, actual and estimated, of the two works. Let it be borne in mind that the breadth of the canal has been increased from 40 to 60 feet at top, from 34 to 42 at bottom, and from 5 to 6 feet in depth. Notwithstanding the increased dimensions of the canal, it will have cost, for the sixty miles, $677,184 (in an expenditure of $1,848,941) less than the cost as estimated for the canal, of less dimensions, by the U. States engineers. This view, so favourable to the present canal, is more particulary verified by a comparison of the actual cost of the 10th subdivision, embracing about 11 miles, and which has been in actual use several months, and the estimated cost of the same subdivision, as made by the engineers already refered to. This portion of the canal presented the greatest difficulties of any on the route, and which will not be surpassed by any that are to occur in its future progress. Notwithstanding the actual cost has fallen below the estimates by $20,000 per mile.

From past experience the board are confirmed in the opinion hitherto entertained and expressed, that if the canal be permitted to pursue the Maryland shore, it can be completed from Harper's Ferry to Cumberland for $3,150,000, which added to its cost to the former place, will bring the whole expenditures for the eastern section to about $5,000,000, the estimated cost presented by the board in a former annual report. The present funds of the company, it is said, will certainly carry the work twenty miles beyond the point necessary to preserve the charter of the company, which by reference to the charter, is the termination of 100 miles of the canal:

The report adverts to the interesting experiments on the canals of Scotland, where a velocity of from 10 to 15 miles per hour has been attained without any surge injurious to the banks, and where, by those experiments, the principle has been established that the greater the velocity attained, the less injury is effected to the banks by the agitation of the water—a principle which not only removes the objections against, but actually invites, the application of steam as the propelling power in canal navigation, and which will place canals, in point of attainable speed, on an equal looting with rail-roads.

A very severe criticism is instituted upon the letter of Mr. Knight, the chief engineer of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, communicated to the last legislature of Maryland, by resolution of that body, in which canals are disadvantageously compared with railways in point of expense and general utility. The criticism chiefly combats the positions of Mr. Knight respecting the comparative costs of the two species of improvement, and with much spirit and strength of views points out their fallacy, and rescues the canal from the unfavorable light in which the letter might have a tendency to place it, in the estimation of the legislature and the public.

To the report are appended tables showing the amount of revenue of the company for the last three years. The receipts of tolls for the last year amounted to $26,151 35. The receipts for the two previous years—arising from the rights of the old Potomac company to which the canal company have succeeded—amounted to upwards of $10,000 and $12,000 respectively. The expense of maintaining the canal, for the same period, including the pay of lock keepers and collectors, and repairs done on the old canal, has amounted to $7,061 34—and the repairs on the new canal up to the 1st June 1831, have cost $8,077 51.

We have thus given a summary of such parts of the report as may be deemed most important—and we cannot conclude without recommending the whole production to the candid and attentive perusal of every one who feels an interest in the success of this scheme of improvement, or who may desire to arrive at information respecting cannals in general which is deemed highly interesting and important.

[The following are the chief articles that descended this canal, in the year ending 1st June: 25 hhds. tobacco, 171,558 bbls. flour, 1,948 bbls. whiskey, 11,581 bushels wheat, 3,968 rye, 185 tons iron, pig, bar, &c. 149,078 lbs. bacon, 8,421 lbs. lard and butter, 13,000 hemp and flax, 2,300 leather, and 5,240 pounds of hogs. The ascending tolls amounted to only $313 50 in the year.]

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 21—VOL. IV. BALTIMORE, JULY 23, 1831. [VOL. XL. WHOLE No. 1,035

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

☞ A few days relaxation from labor at the desk, now quite as necessary to the editor as sleep, and which promptly recruits his ability to remain "nailed" to his seat during high ranges of the thermometer, has had some effect on the contents of the present sheet, in the want of that which obtains the honored name of "original matter"—but the interest in the articles selected will, probably, diminish any want of general gratification on that account—and whatever business has been postponed, will be speedily attended to.

But the chief object of this note is to apprize the editor's private correspondents and personal friends, that, as brief absences from home may often occur during the warm weather, they will be pleased to make allowances for any apparent neglect that shall happen, and attribute them to the true cause.

☞ The present volume of the REGISTER, which commences with the "Calhoun correspondence," is by far the most curious and important to politicians that we ever published, and so it appears to be esteemed by the public—for very few, if any, surplus copies remain on hand that we wish to dispose of,* though they will be furnished to new subscribers, if demanded; the practice in this establishment being to place the commencement and discontinuance of a subscription entirely at the will of the subscriber—payment being made for not less than one year.

We have used our best exertions to publish and preserve the highly-spiced political articles which have lately appeared in the belligerent newspapers, with strict impartiality, so far as they have reached us—but intend to reduce the space hitherto allowed for the out-pourings of editors so far as we can, without neglecting the facts presented by them.

☞ We have an admirable address of our valued friend, "HAMILTON," to the people of South Carolina, being the third number of a new series of essays—which is already "given-out," for our next paper. This series is uncommonly valuable, because of the facts stated—but, with our limited means and the present current of matter, we cannot undertake the publication of any series of essays—be their subject ever so interesting.

POLITICAL MOVEMENTS, &c. It now appears certain that Mr. Randolph has resigned his mission for St. Petersburg, and also declined being a candidate for congress. Mr. Boulden, the late member from the district, will be opposed by Dr. Crump.

Under the head of "French claims," extracted from the "Richmond Enquirer," it seems that Mr. Van Buren will probably proceed from London to Paris—and become entitled to a second out-fit, and in-fit, &c.

The United States Gazette says—We have it, in not quite so much confidence as to keep the fact from our readers, nor so much of freedom as to enter into details, that, before the summer closes, an exposition may be looked for from a distinguished individual recently dismissed from an important office, and almost hunted from Washington, which will go far towards clearing the deck of the splinters that now encumber it.

[It is thought that the preceding paragraph has reference to Mr. Berrien—a pretty significant letter from whom is published in our collection of the "Politics of the day,"—under which head we have gathered a large quantity of curious articles. The charge of an attempt to "bully" gen. Jackson into the appointment of Mr. Ingham as secretary of the treasury, as preferred by the "Globe," and which, if that paper is to be believed, succeeded, with the counter representation of that matter in the Philadelphia "Sentinel," will attract the attention of serious men.]

Mr. Taney has entered upon the duties of his office as attorney general, and will also take charge of the war department until the arrival of gen. Cass.

THE INDIAN DISTURBANCES. The St. Louis Beacon of the 7th inst. says—We are happy to announce that generals Gaines and Atkinson, with the regular troops, have arrived from the upper Mississippi, having accomplished, with the aid of the Illinois mounted men commanded by general Duncan and accompanied by gov. Reynolds, the peaceable removal of the Indians, and dispersed a confederacy which has been forming for two years with incredible secrecy, under the famous Sac chief, Black Hawk, and the Winnebago prophet, who have been endeavoring to revive the designs of the famous Shawnee prophet and Tecumseh.

MR. CALHOUN. It appears from the following that we are soon to hear from the vice president on the subject of nullification. It is taken from the Pendleton (S. C.) Messenger.

"We observe that the opinions of the vice president, in reference to what is called "nullification," are a subject of much speculation, and that some of the public journals have called on him to state what they are. We are satisfied that there has been, on his part, no attempt to conceal or disguise his sentiments on this, or any other subject interesting to the public: and that whatever doubts may be felt in relation to them in any quarter, have not originated in any act of his, but may be traced to the fact that his station affords him no opportunity of making his opinions officially known; and that he has been restrained from communicating them informally to the public by a feeling of delicacy, and the apprehension that it might be considered an improper intrusion, and not from the desire to leave his sentiments doubtful.

"We respect such feelings, but believe that there are occasions on which they ought to yield to higher consideration, and that such is the present. We are gratified to learn from a quarter entitled to credit, that this is probably the impression of the vice president himself; and that, yielding to what appears to be the wish of the public, and the candor due to his own character, he will place his sentiments before the public without reserve, in reference to the subject which has caused these remarks."

FIRE AT FAYETTEVILLE.—The North Carolina Journal of the 7th instant, says: we re-enter upon our editorial career, with our confidence of success rather increased than diminished—our troubles have disclosed to us may warm friends, the existence of whose good will towards us was before even unknown, and would probably ever have remained so. The ordinary character of the world's friendship, it has been said, is to court the sunshine, and avoid the storm. But the friends we speak of have kept aloof, while they thought us independent of their kind offices—but have extended their hand in the day of our necessity.—"Kind gentlemen, their pains are registered where every day we turn the leaf to read them." But again, we trust we never were misanthropes, but we have never, since the innocent days of childhood, thought so highly of our species as of late, and consequently never loved it so well. The boundless liberality every where manifested towards suffering Fayetteville, has produced an expansive glow of philanthropy in our hearts which, we must think, will not be without its influence on our heads.

In our childhood we heard of the 'human family,' a simple expression; but one, which, with a talismanic power places before the intellectual vision a moral picture of exquisite beauty and unrivalled grandeur. In our riper years, we began to fear it was an expression originating with a poet in the delirium of his fancy, or invented by some artful and designing monster to lull into security, or cheat into confidence the victim of his selfish purposes. Its magic influence on our hearts was fast fading away, and we were becoming more and more convinced that it was a beautiful deception. The cloud of misanthropy was stealing over our souls, and we were beginning to look upon our species so far from being one great domestic circle of love and harmony, as engaged in a great mellee, in which, whatever courtesies might be exchanged in the intervals of the fight, the settled purpose of each individual was to secure to himself, honor and wealth, and pleasure and happiness, utterly regardless of the prostrated hopes and bleeding hearts of others, which might be scattered around him in the conflict. But we thank Providence, that although the flames have devoured our substance, we have been enabled to snatch from their fury some choice letters of experience, at once delightful and improving. We again perceive in its full force the beautiful truth that all mankind are brothers—that there is a pervading sympathy throughout the species, by which the sufferings of each are felt by all, and that this sympathy ever prompts to relief—

> The quality of mercy is not strained
> But droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven
> Upon the place beneath; it is twice blessed,
> It blesses him that gives, and him that takes.

In days of comparative ease and prosperity, like children we wrangle and strive for the honors and possessions of this world, and really suffer malignant passions to usurp for a time the dominion of our hearts. We talk of north and south, and this and that portion of the globe, and speak as if the limits of a state were the termini beyond which the kindly affections of the heart could never pass. But let adversity come, let real affliction light upon any inhabitant of this wide earth, and all distinctions are at once annihilated.

The claim of brotherhood is at once felt and recognized, and its catholic spirit spurns all knowledge of the artificial limits of states and empires, and the north, the south, the east, the west, all render up their treasures for his relief. But whither are we wandering? The theme is one on which the heart loves to expatiate, but we must not indulge ourselves at present. We would, if we could, for ourselves and the other inhabitants of Fayetteville, express our gratitude to the many and great benefactors of our town, but we cannot.—In conclusion we say with the good Duncan—

> Would thou hadst less deserved
> That the proportion both of thanks and payment
> Might have been mine; only I have left to say
> More is thy due, than more than all can pay.

STEAM BOAT EXPLOSIONS. "Mr. E. B. Rathbone, of New York, has died of his wounds, making 13 deaths from the explosion of the General Jackson; which is now believed to have been caused by carelessness. A legal investigation is commenced."

The "Vermont Chronicle" re-publishes the above paragraph with this commentary:

"Indeed! It 'is now believed,' is it? Does not every body, whose judgment is worth any thing, know, that explosions never take place but from censurable carelessness somewhere?—for we would not suppose a worse cause possible. Let every explosion be followed by a 'legal investigation,' and let the captain be hanged if lives were lost, and imprisoned for life if the passengers were all saved, and explosions would cease. No insufficient machinery would be used, and no good machinery spoilt by bad management. However, the truth may bear on the feelings of some, and the pockets of others, it is time to speak out—those who trifle with men's lives, whether from avarice or vanity, should be visited with the public indignation which they deserve. The press, if it will dare to speak plainly, can put an end to this wanton destruction of human life. There is no safer mechanical power than a steam engine, made and managed as it should be."

CLOSING SCENES OF LIFE. The last words of Thomas Jefferson were, "I resign my soul to my God, and my daughter to my country" John Adams, near his end, roused by the firing of cannon, and being told the people were rejoicing for the 4th of July, said, "it is a great and glorious day"—and expired with the words "Independence forever!" on his lips. The Commercial Advertiser states that when the noise of the firing began at midnight, the dying Monroe "opened his eyes inquiringly; and when the cause was communicated to him, a look of intelligence indicated that he understood what the occasion was." We know not if there be upon record more striking instances than these, of the "ruling passion strong in death." [Petersburg Int.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAIL ROAD—from the Gazette. From the 1st day of January, to the 30th June 1831, 44,435 persons who paid, travelled on the Baltimore and Ohio rail road; and 2,918 tons of various articles were transported to and from different places, between Baltimore and Ellicott's mills, exclusive of the necessary transportation for the use of the company.

The average number of travellers in June, as in May exceeded 400 per day. The average transportation in April, May and June was twenty-six tons per day.

THE FRENCH CLAIMS. Later accounts have been received from France. It is now said, that the French government offers the claimants $3,000,000. We should think this compensation was inadequate to their just demands! It is also said, that a final effort will be made by our government for the adjustment of the claims; and that Mr. Van Buren may go over to Paris, with powers plenipotentiary. This on dit, it is to be understood, is neither from Washington nor the state of New York; nor from any official source. The reader will please, therefore, to take it for what it is worth. The claimants in most of our cities are said to have given the president a carte blanche for the adjustment of their demands. It is sincerely hoped, for the sake of both countries, that an arrangement may be made, which may prove honorable to France, and satisfactory to the United States. But there are unexpected difficulties in the case, which will require no little perseverance, coolness and judgment, on the part of our negotiators, and no little conciliatory spirit on both sides, ultimately to remove. [Richmond Enq.

CHOLERA MORBUS. The New York Mercantile suggests that it might not be altogether unworthy of the notice of our government, to devise prudent means to prevent its being imported among us. "Certain diseases travel in a mysterious manner, defying all human calculation—neither mountain nor ocean arrest their progress—and however improbable it may seem to some that this cholera will cross the Atlantic, there is no certainty that it will not, and therefore it behoves us to use all salutary means to prevent its importation. Should this epidemic—for such we account it—spread in England or Holland, there will be more danger than now of its reaching us; yet, as it is raging only in the north of Europe, it is by no means impossible that it may find footing in our land."

HYDROPHOBIA—extraordinary case. A painful and singular event has lately taken place in a commune near Pithiviers. A lad about 15 years old; of the name of Lesourd, born at Meung, near Orleans, was bitten a year ago, by a mad dog, and immediately afterwards symptoms of hydrophobia were perceptible. He was taken to the hospital at Orleans, where he was attended by Dr. Leveque, and in a short time, sent away, as was supposed perfectly cured. Last Sunday, Lesourd came to Marsainvilliers, where he commenced begging with his brother. Either want, or the fatigue of a long journey had opened his wounds afresh, or his cure was not complete, for all on a sudden the unfortunate boy was seized with a violent paroxysm of madness, and attacked his brother, who frightened as he was, managed to beat him off with a stick. He then threw himself on a cow and calf which were passing, and lacerated both in an extraordinary manner. The cries of his brother and the roar of the animals, compelled him to let go his victims; and he crept along the road till he came to a quickset hedge, the roots of which he gnawed with the greatest avidity; and next, getting up, he ran into a neighboring wood.

The national guard being called out in consequence of information given by his brother, went in search of him and he was found near a tree, his eyes inflamed, his mouth covered with foam and with blood, his features changed and haggard, biting deliriously at the branches within his reach. Every one was afraid to go near him, and some new accident was apprehended; but whilst those in pursuit of him, were consulting as to the best method of securing him, the expression of his countenance changed, he wept bitterly and went up to his brother, asking him for bread. To avoid further danger, he was tied down in a wagon, which took him to Pithiviers.

Here he was placed in an airy room, and every attention shown to him, that his situation required. He related to Dr. Auge, all that he had suffered during this paroxym of madness, and was extremely distressed in mind. He asked to be taken back to the hospital at Orleans, where he said M. Leveque would cure him again. Notwithstanding he now appears so much better, there is reason to fear that he will eventually sink under a disorder of which the seeds are evidently in his blood, The prefect of Pithiviers has ordered that the cow and calf bitten by Lesourd, should be kept separate from other animals, and taken care of. FOREIGN NEWS.

By arrivals at New York, Liverpool papers to the 2d of June, inclusive, have been received.

FRANCE.

The king of the French had returned to Paris,—and designed making another tour in June, when he would visit the eastern part of his dominions.

France, according to the opinion of the celebrated O. P. Q. correspondent of the London Morning Chronicle, seems to be dissatisfied with the course pursued by the government in relation to Poland, Belgium and Italy. Its conduct towards the two latter powers particularly, is esteemed cowardly and cruel, and Perrier's popularity was in consequence on the wane.

ENGLAND.

In the estimates of the reform force, it was assumed that Scotland would return a majority of 11 against the bill; Scotland however has disappointed those who made the calculation and have given for the bill an actual majority of 5.

All the ships in the British navy, in future, are to have their bow ports so disposed as to admit of a gun being fired in a fore and aft direction.

The Bible society's income last year was near £100,000.

Expectation of the settlement of the Belgian question was daily increasing in London, which had caused considerable advance in the price of stocks.

The demand for power-loom calicoes was so great that many looms are standing still for want of hands.

Wool appears to keep its price, 14 and 15d. were given for wool which, 2 years ago, only brought 7½d.

BELGIUM.

Prince Leopold had been officially announced as a candidate for the vacant crown.

The harshness of the terms of diplomacy of other powers has been considerably mitigated, and the expected ascendancy of Leopold had suppressed the hopes of those who were looking forward to an union with France.

POLAND.

The Russian accounts of the affairs between the Russian army under general Kreutz and that under the Polish general Chrzanowski, which so gallantly cut its way through the former force and penetrated as far as Zamosc, are received. They state the loss of the Poles to be about three thousand, while they set down that of the Russians at but 400.

The Russians were practising every species of cruelty and outrage against the revolting inhabitants of Angustowain in Lithuania. The inhabitants of the district of Marianpo attacked a body of Russians on the 21st of April, but were defeated. Several officers and citizens, who took part in the revolution, were shot after their defeat, the villages were sacked and burned, houses pillaged and their proprietors imprisoned.

ITALY AND AUSTRIA.

The Austrians were making immense preparations for war, and never had so formidable an army in Italy as at present. Manufacturers of every kind were in despair. Austria was increasing her military force, and had ordered an additional levy of 12 000 men in Lombardy and Venice. The pope was disposed to grant a general amnesty to the revolted; but was restrained by cardinal Bernetti from doing so. The fortifications of Ancona were in a great state of forwardness. The Austrians at Bologna, and other towns of Romagna, had made some unsuccessful attempts at revolt; but as they were received as mere tricks to inveigle the Italians, they had not been sustained by the real friends of liberty.

PORTUGAL.

Private letters from Lisbon of the 14th May, say that the duke de Cadaval has appointed a commission to ascertain the losses sustained by the Americans from the blockade of Terceira. Don Miguel is said to be very much alarmed for fear of American corsairs, but is much relieved from his apprehensions of the arrival of a French fleet in the Tagus, having been informed that that government had agreed to adjust their differences by negotiation. His relief, if report be true, was but short lived, as it was stated that the advance of the dreaded squadron had already been seen in the Tagus.

TURKEY.

After the battle of the 23rd of April, the troops of the grand vizier retreated towards Monaster, but were not pursued by the insurgents. The town of Perlipe, which is the mart of Macedonia, was destroyed by fire, and large magazines of goods were taken by the insurgents.

Since the above was received an arrival at Boston brings intelligence from London to the evening of the 3d June, inclusive.

POLAND.

It has been rumored in London that the Poles had gained a signal victory over the Russians, and although nothing had been received absolutely authenticating this rumor, no doubt was entertained that great and important advantages had been obtained by the former. The editor of the London Sun had been informed that the official account had been received by the Polish legation, and that the Russian imperial guard, commanded by general Pahlen, had been almost annihilated on the 19th and 20th May. The brave Polish commander in chief Skryznecki, had completely out-manœuvred the Russian general Diebitsch. While a Polish corps was amusing the Russians at Minsk, Skryznecki united all the corps on his left, crossed the Bug, and, taking Ostrolenka by assault, proceeded to Lomza, defeated the Russian guards at Tychosin, and in fact occupied the whole country between the Bug and Narew.

Accounts from Warsaw of the 26th May, left Deibitsch at Zocolow, apparently in the route for Ostrolenka or for Bilsk or Bialistock, with no resource but to throw himself on the protection of Prussia, as Dwernicki threw himself on the protection of the Austrians. He has to cross the Bug and the Narew, surrounded by Polish corps.

By this masterly movement, the Polish general has placed himself in contact with the Samogitians, Lithuanians, and other revolted districts, by whose population his army will be indefinitely augmented, so as to leave to Deibitsch no prospect of escape but within the Russian frontiers.

The march of Skryznecki is without parallel in modern warfare. From Warsaw to Ostrolenka is 80 miles, thence to Lomza 30, and from there to Tychosin 20 more, the last 50 being in the rear of the Russians. He was joined by numerous volunteers from Prussian and Austrian Poland.

At Ostrolenka, the Polish general obtained a large sum of money, the baggage of the enemy and 1,700 prisoners.

During the advance of the corps of Dwernicki in Volhynia, insurrections had broken out at the instigation of several of the noblity in Tolczyn and Battany in Podolia, and the insurgents had even formed a provisional government. The failure of Dwernicki, however, left these brave fellows unsupported, and they were afterwards subdued by the Russian troops under general Roth.

The decision of the Austrians relative to Dwernicki and his corps, has been received. The general and his officers are to be sent to Laybach, and the privates to Transylvania. All the arms found in their possession, belonging to Russia, are to be delivered to the Russians, those proved to be Polish property are to remain in trust with the Austrians. The officers to retain their horses as private property.

The whole of Gallicia has been placed under military law and a cordon formed, in consequence of the spreading of the cholera.

FRANCE.

The king of the French issued an ordinance on the 31st of May, dissolving the chambers, and convoking the electoral colleges on the 5th of July, in order to elect each a deputy. The chambers of peers and deputies are convoked for the 9th of August next.

BELGIUM.

In the Belgium assembly a letter had been read from lord Ponsonby, in relation to the settlement of the affairs of Belgium. It produced great excitement.

The congress of nations finds the boundaries of Holland settled by former treaties, and therefore not to be altered. It desires that Belgium should place itself in the ordinary circle of European states, recognising the common obligations of treaties, taking part in the burdens and benefits resulting from the received policy of the other nations. If Belgium should place itself in such relation, the congress would aid it in an endeavor to obtain the dutchy of Luxemburg by treaty, and will prevent all military interference by the German states pending such negotiation.

The congress declares it is animated by a feeling of good will towards Belgium, its object being peace now and in future, founded on the security and independence of that country. It would see with pleasure the election of his royal highness prince Leopold as king, who would not accept the crown unless he could wear it with honor to Belgium and himself.

It was reported in London on the 3d of June, that an express had arrived there with the nomination of prince Leopold, who had been chosen by a great majority.

RUSSIA.

Capt. Dwyer, arrived at Boston from Cronstadt, reports that very little was published at St. Petersburg relative to the Polish war, but that it was generally acknowledged that the Russians had lost 80,000 men since the commencement of the campaign, and that the emperor calculated to sustain a loss of 200,000 men in the final subjugation of Poland.

SOUTH AMERICA.

In Brazil, there has been some small battles between the natives of the country and those of Portugal—the latter were defeated, with the loss of many lives. All the old Portuguese were ordered to leave the country in thirty days! Brazil is more quiet than it was, but still much disturbed.

The president of Peru was near the frontier of Bolivia, with 6,000 men. He ordered the deposition of gen. Fuenta, vice president, and who commanded at Lima, but he resisted the order. The wife of the president then ordered out two regiments to arrest the vice president, who made his escape and took refuge on board the U. S. ship St. Louis, capt. Sloat, where he would remain until regular passports were given him, or he should be demanded by the congress.

From the provinces of La Plata we hear much of military matters and the loss of many lives—but a general Paz, who commanded one of the parties, was made a prisoner, and brought to the camp of general Lopez. Col. de la Madrid has assumed the command at Cordova, in place of gen. Paz.

BRIEF NOTICES.

Fire. An extensive floor cloth manufactory in New York, with many neighboring buildings on Eldredge and Rivington streets, were recently destroyed by fire, in the night—and so sudden was the spreading of the flames, that three persons, two women and an interesting youth, all perished—the mother, her daughter and grandson. An effort to save the first caused the death of the two last.

Flour at New Orleans, June 16, $4¼; at Montreal same date $6.

Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, laid the corner stone of St Charles' college, (a Roman Catholic seminary) on Doughoragen manor, on the 11th inst. It is a well endowed institution.

Arch street prison, Philadelphia. There were four thousand and seventy-three committals at this institution during the last year: and the keeper, in a letter to Roberts Vaux, states, that at least three thousand were persons of intemperate habits.

The late floods are supposed to have caused damages to the amount of $40,000 in Franklin county, Pennsylvania. The wheat crop, however, has been much less injured by the late rains than had been expected.

Smith and Murray, the robbers of the City bank of New York, have been sent to the penitentiary. There was no present hope of recovering the yet missing money.

The Philadelphia butchers refused to attend at their stalls, with supplies of meat, on Saturday last—and yet have not returned to their usual order of business. Much inconvenience has been suffered on account of this proceeding, and one man, the only one, who refused to unite in it, seems to have attended his stall under the protection of the police. The cause of this singular state of things—which makes the market house a desolate place, is, the complaint of the regular butchers that the farmers, and other persons whom they call "shinners," are allowed to cut-up and retail meat in the street, (in parcels less than a quarter), free of charge, while they are paying heavy rents to the city for their stalls. The question of right thus raised, is not easily settled—"much may be said on both sides."

Samuel Snowden, esq. who has been for thirty years past the proprietor and publisher of the Alexandria (Phœnix) Gazette, and probably the founder of that paper, deceased on the 14th inst. His son, Edgar Snowden, became, on the death of his parent, the sole publisher and editor of the Gazette.

The last abode of the Bourbons. It is settled that Hungary is to be the country to which Charles X. and his family retire on leaving Holyrood house. The duchess of Angouleme possesses in that country estates valued at 600,000 francs a year, which were left her by her aunt. There will be thus, in the Austrian dominions, the members of an ex-imperial and ex-royal family of France.

INTERESTING OR AMUSING SCRAPS.

An aged prisoner. A paragraph is going the round of the papers, stating that, not long since, a Spanish nobleman was sentenced to imprisonment for one hundred years and a day. It is a curious fact, that Francisco Salazar, a native of Galicia, born in 1660, was, at the age of nineteen, sentenced to transportation for the same term; he was accordingly conveyed to Ceuta, in Africa, where he continued to reside until 1786, having outlived his sentence five years.

English-Irish. "The 'ancient Irish' invariably denominate the more recent settlers, 'Cromelians.' A whimsical illustration of this fact occurred within my own knowledge. The following conversation took place a few months ago, in the streets of Cork, between an English housekeeper and an Irish market-woman: 'Good morrow, ma'am. I hope ye want a basket this fine morning, ma'am?' 'I believe I shall.' 'Why, then, long life to you, ma'am, I hope you'll take me. I b'lieve you're English, ma'am?' 'Yes,' 'I thought so, ma'am; I'm English, too.' 'Indeed! when did you come over to Ireland?' 'Oh, ma'am, I came over wid Oliver Cromwell, ma'am.'" [Sketches of Irish characters.

Mineral forest. A subterranean forest has been discovered in the coal formation near Glasgow. The trees are numerous, they occur many feet below the surface, and are vertically imbedded in the sandstone. The trunks of the trees are abruptly cut off by the superincumbent shale. The bark is converted into coal, but the woody structure, for a considerable space downwards, is of a shaly nature. A naturalist, struck with the extraordinary appearance presented by this deposite, actually asserts that these trees are in situ!

Tanning. An apothecary in the neighborhood of Narbonne has published a treatise, extolling the husks of grapes which have been deprived of their alcohol by distillation, as an excellent substitute for tanning leather. After having prepared the skins in the usual way, he places them in the pits, and covers them with the grape-husks. From five-and-thirty to five-and-forty days are sufficient to complete the tanning. This method, according to the author of it, offers the following advantages:—The operation is much more rapid; it is much more economical; the leather has an agreeable odour instead of that of tan; and it is twice as durable as leather tanned by bark.

Duke of Norfolk and Henry the 8th. The following letter was written by the duke of Norfolk to king Henry VIII. upon the committal of his near relations to the tower for their part in the affair of Ann Boleyn. We extract it as a curiosity from vol. I. of British state papers, just published by Murry, of London:—

"Most noble and gracious soverayne lord. Yesterday came to my knowledge, that myn ungracious mother in lawe, myn unhappy brothir, and his wiff, with my lewde suster off Brydgewater, wer committed to the Towre; wich, by long experience, knowyng your accoustomed etiquette and justice, used to all your subjects, am sewer is not done, but for som their fals and traytorous proceedynges agaynst your royall majestie. Which, revolvyng in my mynd, with also the most abhominable dedes done by 2 of my niesys agaynst your highness, hath broght me in to the grettest perplexite, that ever poure wretch was in; fearyng that your majestie, havyng so oftene, and by so many of my kyn, bene thus falsly and traytorously handled, myght not only conseyve a displesure in your hert agaynst me, and all other of that kyn, but also, in manner, abhorre to here speke of any off the same. Sales of British ships of war by auction. On the 14th April, pursuant to an order of the commissioners of the navy, seven vessels of war were put up for sale at the navy office, by what is termed "Dutch auction," in the hall of the navy office, Somerset-house. The prices obtained were—the Hecla, put up at £3,000, knocked down for £1,990; the Infernal, put up at £3,000 sold for £1,910; the Camilla, set up at £1,200, brought £1,100; the Pandora put up £1,500, sold for £900. The other ships were not sold—they were thus put up and disposed of. The Sampson, put up at 3,500; stopped at £2,500; the Camel, put up at £5,000, stopped at £3,000, and the Prothee, put up at £2,500, set aside at £1,500. The whole sale did not occupy half an hour.

Capital punishment in England. The following is a summary of the number of persons who have received sentence of death, and of those whose sentences have been carried into execution, during the last seven years. It shows the impolicy of loading the statute book with capital punishments since it proves that the chances of escape are almost twenty-two to one in favor of the great majority of criminals.

A giant. The Pawtucket Journal of a late date says—We yesterday witnessed the disinterment of the hon. Joseph Jenks, one of the first governors of the colony of Rhode Island, who died on the 15th June, 1740, ninety-one years ago. The skeleton was nearly entire, and in a better state of preservation than could have been expected. Governor Jenks was probably the tallest man that ever lived in the state, standing, when living, seven feet and two inches, without his shoes. His thigh bones, when taken up, measured eighteen inches.

An apology. When John Clark, (lord Eldon) was at the bar, he was remarked for the sang froid with which he treated the judges. On one occasion, a junior counsel, on hearing their lordships give judgment against his client, exclaimed that "he was surprised at such a decision!" This was construed into contempt of court and he was ordered to attend at the bar the next morning. Fearful of the consequences, he consulted his friend John Clark, who told him to be perfectly at ease, for he would apologise for him in a way that would avert any unpleasant result. Accordingly, when the name of the delinquent was called, John rose and coolly addressed the assembled tribunal. "I am very sorry, my lords, that my young friend has so far forgot himself as to treat your bench with disrespect; he is extremely penitent, and you will kindly ascribe his unintentional insult to his ignorance. You must see at once that it did originate in that. He said he was surprised at the decision of your lordships! Now, if he had not been very ignorant of what takes place in this court every day—had he known you but half so long as I have done, curse me if he would be surprised at any thing you did." Accidents. A man named Nathan D. Pool, aged 25 years, was lately killed on the Lehigh above Mauch Chunk, under the following circumstances. A number of hands were getting out lumber, and a tree having been felled, and the limbs and bark stripped from it, was started down the mountain and lodged on its way; the person killed, with two others, was at work below; some persons above cut away the obstructions to the descending tree;—it came down with great rapidity, and was not perceived until very near them, by those at the foot of the hill. They ran up the river to escape the threatened danger. The man in advance was fortunate enough to succeed—but the second was struck on the head, and died in about twenty minutes afterwards. The person in the rear perceiving he could not pass with safety, wheeled to retreat, and narrowly escaped—the log passing within a few inches of him. The body of the unfortunate sufferer was brought to Mauch Chunk, and decently interred on the day following.

The Washington, (Pa.) Reporter mentions the death of a young man of that vicinity named James Mustard, on Saturday last, under the following circumstances: He was proceeding along the national road on foot, and overtaking a man who was driving a yoke of oxen, he, with the permission of the owner, mounted one of the oxen sideways. After riding thus some distance, a dog from a neighboring house ran into the road, and began to bark at the oxen; upon which the animal that Mr. M. was seated on, made a pitch at the dog, and thereby threw the rider forward on his horns, which were large and sharp pointed. One of the horns entered Mr. M's left groin and came out at his right. In this dreadful position the ox made several attempts to disengage himself, and throw the unfortunate man off, before he succeeded.

Mr. M. at length regained his feet, but fell down immediately and expired in half an hour, from pain and loss of blood.

Mr. Webster. The June number of the American Quarterly Review has been published. The most spirited article is a biography of Mr. Webster. Of him it is said, with a compliment alike to himself and his country—

"He is the child of our free institutions. None other could have produced or reared him; none other can now sustain or advance him. From the days when, amidst the fastnesses of nature, his young feet with difficulty sought the rude school house, where his earliest aspirations were nurtured, up to the moment when he came forth in triumph from the senate chamber, conscious that he had overthrown the doctrines of nullification, and contended successfully for the union of the states, he must have felt that his extraordinary powers have constantly depended for their developement, and their exercise on the peculiar institutions of our free governments."

American discoveries. The schooner Pacific, Brown, has returned to Portsmouth from a sealing voyage. In lat. 56 18 S. long. 28 25 W. an island was discovered. It may be seen in clear weather thirty miles, is two miles in circumference, resembling at a distance a high round lump. Captain Brown named it Potter's island.

A second island was discovered in lat. 55 55 S. long. 27 53, W. It is a mountain 800 feet high in its centre, smoke constantly issuing from it in several places, is covered with ice and snow. On the level part of the island is a stratum of lava, of a light brown color, porous and fragile, and so light as to float. There are good landing places. The island is 5 miles long from N. W. to S. E. It was named Prince's island.

A third island was discovered in 56 25 S. 27 43 W. 6 miles long. It has a burning mountain, and may be seen 50 miles. Has no landing place—was named Willey's island.

A fourth island was discovered in 57 49 S. long. 27 38 W. about midway between Candlemas and Montague islands, but further westerly than either. It was named Christmas island.

Curious coincidence. It is exactly 150 years since, in the reign of Charles the second, during the ferment in the public mind occasioned by the struggle for privilege between the lords and commons, in the celebrated impeachment case of Fitzharris, that the parliament was unexpectedly dissolved by the king in person. The history of England relates the circumstance in the following remarkable words:—The secret was so well kept that the commons had no intimation of it until the black rod came to the doors, and summoned them to attend the king at the house of peers. The extraordinary black book. We have lately fallen in with a sable-bound volume of considerable size; under the above extraordinary title. It comes from London and professes to contain an exposition of the expenditures, patronage, influence and abuses of government, in church, state, law and representation: together with a list of the numerous placemen and sinecurists, who drain so much of the life-blood of "Old England."

On the first page of this publication is a caricature representing John Bull fastened down to the ground like Gulliver, by the hairs of his head. His face exhibits a most ludicrous expression of distress, while a number of clergymen are trampling on his lean exteriors and fleecing him of his moneys. His sides are miserably fallen away, and his cheeks have lost their ancient rotundity. In the back ground, a party of horsemen are advancing over his degenerate paunch, two of them in military costume are bearing standards, on one of which is inscribed "might makes right!" and on the other, "cunning is power." In front, a parson in his gown and a hooked-nosed gentleman in a surtout, are performing the "whigs' march" to the tune of "loaves and fishes." The whole is a laughable caricature and a severe satire on the present administration of Great Britain,

In the list of placemen and sinecurists, we find affixed to each name, the annual amount that is paid them. The author adds to these occasional strictures of his own, some of which for bitter sarcasm and fearless comment, we have rarely seen surpassed. We subjoin a few, taken at random. "Anne, countess dowager of Mornington, pension on civil list £600.

"By the powers! here is the prince of Waterloo's aged mother, Anne Hill, among the state paupers. This is too bad at any rate. We always knew the duke was fond of money, but we did think he would provide for his parent. It is no less a reproach to his brothers, Wellesley, Maryborough, Powley and Gerard-Valerian, the prebendary of Durham, all of whom have been receiving not less than £40,000 a year, and yet to suffer their venerable progenitor to be maintained out of the public taxes, is infamy past endurance. What a griping set they must be! Arthur was always thrifty and provident, but we did not think it would come to this."

"Leopold, prince of Saxe-Cobourg, £50,000 per annum."

"Well, this is a revolution! Who could have thought of passing from the guidance of the prince of Waterloo to the prince of critics! If we live, we will have a spy at St. Stephen's on this prime feather of the Edinburgh Review. Jeffrey made a noble speech on the triumph of the THREE DAYS, and, we trust, he will not back out—he can write too, as fine poetry in prose as Lalla Rookh. He is an uncommonly fine fellow."

Congreve rockets. The secret of the preparation of the congreve rocket, which was thought to have been locked up among the arcana of war belonging to the British government, has been lately revealed to Ibraham Pacha, the viceroy of Egypt. The English papers are charging the late minister of war (Bathurst), with great negligence, in not better treasuring a secret which must have cost the British government a large sum of money. The destructive fires which have taken place throughout the agricultural districts in England, have been attributed to a knowledge of the materials of which that destructive engine, the congreve rocket, is composed. Oriental fables. Two brothers amuse themselves by imagining, if they had a piece of ground, what they would do with it. In one half, one brother would make a flower garden; in his, the other would keep cows and buffaloes. This the former brother would not permit, because the cattle would destroy his flowers; whereupon they began to quarrel, and ultimately to fight. The bystanders observed—"why this is the very proverb. The thread before it be cotton is gone to fisty-cuffs with the weaver."

A logician and a swimmer were embarked in the same vessel. The logician said to his companion—"what do you know of logic?" It appeared that he did not know even the name of it. "Alas! alas!" exclaimed the reasoner, "you have sunk one half of your life in an ocean of ignorance." A storm arose—the swimmer said to the logician—"Have you learned to swim?" "No," answered the reasoner. "Alas! alas!" said the swimmer, "you have thrown away your whole life upon the winds.

Many of the eastern stories turn upon evidence, and the ingenuity of the judge in discovering the side of justice. The judgment of Solomon between the two women claiming a child, is here told of some Oriental kazee. The following story is of the same nature.

A young man going a journey, entrusted a hundred deenars to an old man; when he came back the old man denied having had any money deposited with him, and he was had up before the kazee. "Where were you young man, when you delivered this money?" "Under a tree." "Take my seal and summon that tree," said the judge. "Go, young man, and tell the tree to come hither, and the tree will obey, when you show it my seal." The young man went in wonder. After he had been gone some time, the kazee said to the old man, "he is long—do you think he has got there yet?" "No," said the old man: "it is at some distance: he has not got there yet." "How knowest thou old man," cried the kazee, "where that tree is?" The young man returned, and said the tree would not come. "He has been here, young man, and given his evidence—the money is thine."

Another case of evidence turns upon a ruby which two false witnesses swear had been given in their presence to a third party. "Here is some bread," said the kazee, "make it in the form of the ruby." The witnesses made imitations of the ruby utterly different from each other.

A lazy servant made his wit serve him instead of his strength. His master and he were sleeping together in one house. "Get up" said the master, "and see whether it rains." "It does rain," said the man. "How do you know that?" replied the master, "for you do not stir." "No—the cat came in, I felt her, she was wet." "Put out the lamp." "Sleep with the cloak over your head, and it will be dark enough," said the attendant. "Shut the door," said the master. "I have done two things for you—do the third for yourself," said the servant.

Great grape vine. At Oxford, Md. in the yard of Mr. John Willis, is a grape vine of enormous extent and fruitfulness. The owner and some of his neighbors recently counted the clusters as well as they could. From the American Farmer we learn, that they counted twenty-five thousand one hundred and ten bunches, one-third or nearly half of them are double. The vine is commencing on its seventh year's growth, and the stem is only from nine to ten inches in circumference. One limb was up a fruit tree so high that it could not be counted. The vine covers a large part of the yard in an espalier form, and has run up four fruit trees.

Bartram's botanic garden near Philadelphia, is described as the sanctum sanctorum of birds. The National Gazette adds—

"The birds have learnt that they are safe within its precincts; all sorts—not excepting the crows of Wilson—congregate here, and rear their young in confidence and security. Some of them build their nests even in the houses amongst the plants; and others close to the doors; they take possession of every coigne of vintage. It is the favorite resort of the humming bird, which returned in the commencement of this month, to make its "cunning bed and procreant cradle." Certainly, of this exquisite creature, we might repeat the observation of Shakspeare concerning the martlet, that where they most breed and haunt, the air is delicate, and heaven's breath smells most woomgly. It happened to us to be present in the garden, when one of the most celebrated and ardent of the European botanists and naturalists saw, for the first time, the diminutive beauties glittering in a swarm around a large shrub in flower. We cannot describe his glow of surprise and delight; he declared that at least half the naturalists of Paris would embark for America, if they could be sure of witnessing the same spectacle at once.

"It is early in the morning that the birds—'great natures happy commoners'—seem to make their general thanksgiving for the asylum which they enjoy, and the sweets which they rifle.

Remarkable circumstance. A Swiss male servant who lived in one of our most respectable families in Broadway, had for some time been laboring under an attack of intermittent fever, shewed symptoms of insanity last week and was consequently narrowly watched by the family—however, he disappeared between Thursday night and Friday morning, and notwithstanding diligent inquiry, no trace could be found of him, till yesterday morning, when a fellow servant hearing a faint noise in the sink, which is thirty feet deep, search was instantly made, and in it the maniac Swiss was discovered and taken out. It appeared that he had attempted to commit suicide; he had made a gash in his throat, and also one in either arm, but the wounds were not deep enough to prove fatal; however, from loss of blood, and the effects of disease he was reduced very low. It is remarkable that he should have fallen so far, and remained so long as three days, without food, amid the noxious vapour of the sink, and have been taken out alive. He was immediately conveyed to the hospital, and hopes are entertained of his recovery. [N. Y. Mer.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

From the Philadelphia Sentinel.

The following letters from the late secretary of the treasury, with which we have been furnished, will explain, in the most satisfactory manner, the cause of Mr. Ingham's detention in the office so long after the president had signified his determination to make a thorough change in his cabinet; and will also serve to show that his withdrawal, when it did take place, was in no degree influenced by the affair of major Eaton, as has been insinuated in some of the eastern newspapers. The fact is, that whilst the ex-secretary at war and his relatives were meditating a wanton and malignant attack on him, Mr. Ingham was sedulously employed in the discharge of a laborious, but highly useful duty, which had been devolved on him by the representatives of the people.

Treasury department, June 18, 1831.

SIR: Having heretofore determined to adopt the mean of the British standard scale established in 1821, of 82 inches for the basis of the measure of length, viz: the 36 inches mean of the scale of 82 inches to be made the unit called the yard, and the troy pound of the mint the basis for determining the unit of weight, I have now to add, that your elaborate comparison of the measures of capacity has resulted in the determination to establish the British Winchester bushel of 2 150.4 cubic inches, which being reduced to weight, according to the best principles and the mode now generally adopted, will weigh 77.6274 pounds avoirdupois of distilled water, at the maximum density, exclusive of the influence of the expansion of the vessel, as the unit for dry measure; and the British wine gallon of 231 cubic inches, which, reduced to weight by the same principle as the bushel, will weigh 8.339 pounds avoirdupois of distilled water as the maximum density, exclusive of the influence of the expansion of the vessel, for the unit or liquid measure. These terms correspond so nearly with the mean of those measures in use at the principal custom houses, as to render any departure from them unnecessary as a guide to greater accuracy in conforming the standards to be made, with the measures which are purported to be now used. You will therefore proceed to cause the number of standards, heretofore proposed, to be constructed with the greatest possible accuracy, to be disposed of as may have been or may hereafter be directed by the secretary of the treasury. You will also continue the experiments on the effect of temperature on water and metals, in which you are engaged, and cause the most minute observations to be made of the expansion of the metal of the standards to be deposited in the treasury department, and report the facts to be placed on record. I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. D. INGHAM, sec. of the treasury.

Treasury department, June 20, 1831.

SIR: I had the honor to inform you, at the interview to which you invited me on the 19th of April last, that I would continue to discharge the duties of the treasury department until the work which I had engaged in, under a resolution of the senate, directing a comparison of the weights and measures used at the principal custom houses should be so far completed as to enable me to determine the several units proper to be adopted, when the manufacture of the respective standards for the supply of the custom houses could progress without interruption by the change in the department. This work has taken more time than I expected, notwithstanding the most assiduous and persevering efforts by Mr. Hassler to complete that part of it with which he was charged. But it is now so far accomplished as to have enabled me to make the necessary determinations, and to direct the construction of the standards. My protracted detention in the department has not been without some pain and violence to my feelings, under the circumstances in which I have been placed; and I have only been reconciled to it from the consideration that the undertaking which had cost the government some expense, and myself much labor, promised to be of great value to the country, in rendering the import duties, so far as they depended on weights and measures, uniform throughout the United States. The material for the report to the senate is nearly all collected and embodied, and the government will be greatly indebted to Mr. Hassler for the scientific skill, minuteness, and accuracy, with which he has made the numerous elaborate and comprehensive investigations, comparisons, and experiments, certainly not surpassed by those of the European philosophers, who have heretofore kept so far in advance of us in this department of science. The units for the yard, the pounds avoirdupois and troy, the bushel and gallon, have been established very nearly upon the mean of those in most common use in the United States, which mean, notwithstanding the great variances of the respective weights and measures within themselves, is found to correspond in terms so nearly with those of Great Britain, from which they were originally established, that I have considered the terms as indicating the point of coincidence, neglecting the mean which is necessarily somewhat vague, and have established the units accordingly. The manufacture of the standards will therefore proceed under the immediate direction of Mr. Hassler, who will specially attend to their verification and comparison, until the contemplated supply, as well of standards for preservation at the seat of government as those to be used at the custom houses, is finished. I therefore have the honor to inform you that my official relation to the government terminates this day. I am, respectfully, your obedient servant. S. D. INGHAM, secretary of the treasury.

ANTI-TARIFF CONVENTION.

We publish the following articles without comment—though we make no calculation on a "return of the compliment" from our opponents, who always act as if they were afraid to let their readers see more than one side of the question. We have no such fears—if reason be on the side of the anti-tarriffites, and we should have the good luck to discover it—we shall join them.

From the Richmond Enquirer of July 12.

We have published the proposition for holding an anti-tariff convention on the 30th of September—and also a paper explaining the advantages of such a meeting—it appears from the following resolutions, that both parties in Charleston have adopted the measure.—May we not respectfully recommend it to the citizens of Virginia? It is a peaceful and constitutional measure for uniting the friends of free trade against this "bill of abominations." It will bring together the facts—It will concentrate the arguments in one point of view. It will produce a co-operation, "a pull, and a strong pull, and a pull all together," among the enemies of the tariff—not confined to one section of the country but extending from Maine to Georgia. It avoids submission. It avoids nullification! It will call into action, the mind, and strength of the people against the measure—It will organize a plan of opposition, which is best calculated to effect the object without mischief. It will bring all the lights on this great subject to one focus; and pour the full force of them upon the next congress of the U. S.—This too is the very moment for such an united effort. And this is the proof of it.

Amidst the mass of trash which Mr. Ingham poured forth at the dinner in Bucks county, there was one passage which presents the most serious considerations—considerations, which cannot be too early or too seriously weighed by the whole American people—whether friends or foes of the tariff:

"It ought not to be disguised, that the final extinguishment of the public debt, which is very near at hand, will present a new crisis in the affairs of our country. The public mind should therefore be familiarized to it and preparation made in advance for the event. To continue permanently upon the people, taxes equal to ten million of dollars, the amount of the present sinking fund, more than will be required for the current expenses of the government, will, I most conscientiously believe, hazard the existence of this union, and the more we disregard the complaints of those who think themselves aggrieved, the more rapidly will that great evil be hastened. What can compensate for the breaking up of a confederation, which is the highest and may be the last hope of liberty? On the other hand, suddenly and indiscriminately to reduce the impost duties to the scale of revenue for current expenditure, would cause a scene of ruin which cannot be described. I have no doubt but all these evils may be averted; and instead of multiplying antagonist interests and exciting animosity and hatred throughout the nation, marked by geographical boundaries the most dangerous of all, that measures might be adopted which would preserve every interest of the country, in the operation of which, every section would be reconciled; and which would in fact, draw together the different parts with bonds of affection founded in mutual, personal, as well as political interests."

"Let it not be disguised," that this important problem ought to be, we may add, must be, taken up by the next congress—for time presses—the public debt will soon be extinguished, if no extravagant schemes for diverting the public funds from their legitimate objects, be forced upon the people.—Preparations, therefore, ought to be immediately made—they are recommended not merely by the condition of the oppressed consumers, but of the manufacturers themselves—for the gradual, certain reduction of the tariff, down to the point which the republican convention of New Hampshire calls a revenue "not more than is necessary to defray the ordinary expenses of the government.

Now, then, is the time to act—now is the time to throw upon the subject all the lights which can be collected from every quarter, and rally together the friends of free trade—not to passionate exertions, but to a peaceful, constitutional, and united effort. What! shall the manufacturers combine, and shall we not associate? Shall they hold their conventions; and not we? Shall they appeal to interests, and we not to principles?—They employ sophistry and delusion—and shall we not resort to argument? Shall we not oppose fact to fact—and appeal to appeal?

We would recommend it, therefore, to the citizens of Virginia, at their respective courthouses, in the month of July or August—perhaps on the great election day, in the latter month—to assemble in their primary capacities, and appoint delegates to represent them in the anti-tariff convention. The moment one meeting is held in Virginia, the spirit will move over the land—and the example will be followed elsewhere. So mote it be!

PROCEEDINGS AT CHARLESTON.

State rights and union party meeting.

At a large and respectable meeting held on Saturday forenoon, in the City Hall, of the state rights and union party, to determine on the expediency of sending delegates to the anti-tariff meeting, to be held at Philadelphia, on the 30th of September next, gen. Daniel E. Huger was called to the chair, and Henry C. Flagg esq. appointed to act as secretary. Gen. Huger explained the object of the meeting, and Benj. F. Hunt, esq. after a few remarks, proposed the following preamble and resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:—

"The state rights and union party of South Carolina would willingly have united with all their fellow citizens in sending delegates to a national convention which is to assemble for the purpose of united action in re-adjusting the tariff of duties so that the burden of the public expenditure may fall equally on all the citizens of our whole country. They have witnessed with deep concern the excitement which an ill-adjusted tariff has produced—they feel, especially, that the rights and interests of the agricultural states of the south should be fully represented in any general convention of the friends of free trade.

They will not willingly abandon all confidence in that American feeling which hitherto, in every exigency in our history as a nation, has adjusted every subject of difference by mutual forbearance, and a rivalry in a generous regard for the permanency of the union, and has so far conducted these United States in a long career of honor and prosperity.

Inspired by those principles which linked together these states when feeble colonies, and enabled them to conquer that liberty which now constitutes our proud inheritance, the state rights and union party trusts the friends of commerce and agriculture in the south, will be joined by the enlightened patriots of every quarter of the union in an effort to re-adjust the tariff of duties, so as to equalize the public burdens; pay off the national debt, and, by promoting a wise and prudent administration of the public funds, diffuse through all quarters of the republic a just proportion of public benefits.

We rely on the justice, the magnanimity, the national feeling of the great body of the people—we rely on the common interest which unites all the citizens of the union concerned in commerce and agriculture, with us in our endeavor to bring back our national legislation to those principles of free trade and strict construction, which we believe essential to our wealth, and power and liberty,

The ocean which washed our extended coast is the proper home of our skilful and intrepid seamen and we will most cordially co-operate with the advocates of free trade in other parts of the country, in every constitutional effort to procure a repeal of those laws which so unjustly restrict and embarrass our commerce.

A decided party called by another portion of our fellow-citizens, has rendered it indispensable for the state rights and union party of South Carolina thus separately to execute a design, which merits the concurrence of all parties in the state, and thus publicly to vindicate our own principles, and prove by our own conduct that a just and moderate tariff and free trade, are no less the objects of our political struggles than state rights and union; and we eagerly unite with the friends of a liberal and just tariff, and unshackled commerce, in a peaceful, constitutional, and general struggle to accomplish our objects, on which we believe materially depend the tranquillity and permanency of the union. Therefore.

Resolved, That delegates be appointed to represent the state rights and union party of these parishes, at a general national convention of the advocates of free trade, to assemble in Philadelphia, or such other place as may be fixed upon. That these delegates be instructed to urge upon the convention the peculiar interests which the agricultural states of the south have in relieving foreign commerce from every unnecessary embarrassment, and especially to lay before congress such facts and reasons as are calculated to lead to such a modification of the tariff as will be consistent with the interests of agriculture and commerce, and the discharge of the public debt.

Resolved, That the chairman be requested to associate with himself four others to act as delegates from the state rights and union party, to carry into effect the purposes of this meeting.

Col. Memminger then moved the following resolutions, which were adopted unanimously:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to correspond with the friends of state rights and union throughout the various districts and parishes of the state of South Carolina, and to request their immediate co-operation in nominating delegates to attend the anti-tariff convention at Philadelphia.

Resolved, That the foregoing preamble and resolutions be published in all the Charleston papers.

DAN'L E. HUGER, chairman.

HENRY C. FLAGG, secretary.

The state rights and free trade party.

At a numerous and respectable meeting of the state rights and free trade party, held at the bank coffee house, on Saturday evening, 2d inst., for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of appointing delegates to attend the free trade convention, proposed to be held at Philadelphia, on the 30th September next, the hon. Elias Horry was called to the chair, and Mathurin G. Gibbs appointed secretary. After the chairman had stated the object of this call of the state rights and free trade party, Henry L. Pinckney, esquire, addressed the meeting on the necessity of their adopting the measures proposed, and submitted for their consideration, the following preamble and resolutions, which were also advocated by the hon. Robert Y. Hayne, and unanimously adopted by the meeting:

Whereas, the state rights and free trade party are sincerely desirous that public opinion should be enlightened as to the extent and injustice of the American System, and are of opinion that every practicable expedient should be resorted to by the friends of free trade throughout the union, to effect a just and satisfactory reduction of the tariff. And whereas, for the purpose of producing concert and co-operation amongst the advocates of free trade in effecting this desirable object it has been proposed that a free trade convention should be appointed to meet in Philadelphia.

Therefore be it resolved, That it is expedient to send delegates to the free trade convention, to be held in Philadelphia on the 30th September next.

And be it further resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the chair, to select suitable persons as delegates, to be reported to an adjourned meeting of the party; and that the committee be also authorised and empowered to consider and report upon such other measures as may, in their opinion, be best calculated to promote the objects of the free trade party.

The chairman appointed the following gentlemen members of the committee created by the second resolution:—Henry L. Pinckney, Barnard E. Bee, Henry Wm. Peronnean, Sedgwick Lewis Simons, and Jacob F. Mintzing, esquires.

On motion of Mr. Pinckney, it was resolved, That the chairman of this meeting be added to said committee.

On motion of Myer M. Cohen, esquire, it was resolved, that the proceedings of this meeting be published. The meeting then adjourned.

M. G. GIBBS, secretary.

DEATH OF JAMES MONROE.

FIFTH PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,

At the house of his son-in-law, Samuel L. Gouverneur, esq. New York, at half past 3 o'clock, P. M. July 4, 1831.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

"JAMES MONROE was born on Monroe's creek, Westmoreland county, Virginia, in September, 1758, the precise day we have been unable to ascertain. He was descended from a respectable Scotch family, distinguished for its loyalty and patriotism. His ancestor, who came to this country in 1652, was a captain in the army of Charles I. and was rewarded for his fidelity with a grant of land by Charles II. His father was Spence Monroe, a farmer in the county of Westmoreland. His mother was a sister of the late judge Jones, of Virginia.

James Monroe was educated at the college of William and Mary, and subsequently studied law in the office of Mr. Jefferson. On the first breaking out of the revolution he entered the army as a volunteer, and before he was eighteen years old had encountered all the rigors and privations of the camp. He accompanied gen. Washington in his celebrated retreat through New Jersey, and volunteered to join the attack on the Hessians at Trenton. He was at that period a lieutenant in the company of captain Washington, and in the fall of his superior was called upon to assume the command. He was subsequently wounded in the engagement while charging two pieces of the enemy's artillery. In col. Trumbull's painting of the "capture of the Hessians," lieut. Monroe appears prostrate and bleeding on the field. On his recovery he became attached to the staff of gen. lord Stirling, with the rank of major; and afterwards fought beside Lafayette, when the latter was wounded in the battle of Brandywine.

Washington, confiding in his ability to organise an additional corps for the army, recommended his appointment to the command of a regiment of the Virginia line. He was accordingly promoted to the rank of colonel, but before the regiment was completed the war ceased. On his retirement from the service he resumed the study and practice of his profession; and was shortly afterwards elected to represent his district in congress, and from thence was selected by Washington for a diplomatic appointment abroad. His services in various and important civil stations are well known. He was twice governor of his native state; was the associate of Pinckney in a foreign mission; and at another period, in conjunction with the late chancellor Livingston, negociated the important treaty with France which added Louisiana to the territory of the United States. On this event of his life, the venerable ex-president peculiarly loved to dwell; and in the full length likeness of him, which adorns the walls of the governor's room in the city hall, he is represented with the map of Florida and the Louisiana treaty lying before him.

He filled the department of state under Madison; was a warm advocate for the late war, and, upon the resignation of gen. Armstrong and Mr. Campbell, was appointed to discharge the duties of the war and treasury departments. On the restoration of peace, he returned to the department of state, from whence he was elevated by the people to the presidential office, which he filled for two terms to the satisfaction of the country, which, under his administration, was highly prosperous. After his retirement from this distinguished station, he filled the humble office of justice of the peace in the county of Loudoun; was associated with Jefferson and Madison in the founding of the university of Virginia; and subsequently was chosen a member of the convention for amending the constitution of his native state, by which body he was elected to preside over their deliberations. This was the last public office that he filled, and soon after the adjournment of the convention, he came to this city [New York,] where he died on the fourth of July, 1831.

HONORS TO HIS MEMORY.

New York society of the Cincinnati.

GENERAL ORDER.

New York, July 5, 1831.

The president with deep and sincere regret announces to the members of the society, that the venerable James Monroe, late president of the United States, and a member of the Virginia society of the Cincinnati, died at his residence in this city, yesterday, at half past three o'clock, P. M. (being the 55th anniversary of our national independence.)

Mr. Monroe joined the army of the revolution in the fall or winter of 1776 as a volunteer, and brought with him from Virginia a company of artillery which he raised and commanded, and of which the late William Washington was captain. Captain, (afterwards colonel) Monroe sought the post of danger at the battle of Trenton on the 26th December, 1776, and greatly distinguished himself as an officer in that action, in which he was severely wounded, having been shot through the breast, and by which he was disabled for nearly a year. After his recovery he was appointed aid-de-camp to maj. general lord Sterling, and continued in his staff for some time. He was subsequently elected a member of the continental congress, and was a member in 1783, when gen. Washington resigned his commission to that body.

After the war col. Monroe was appointed by general Washington, minister plenipotentiary to the court of France, and was subsequently appointed secretary of state under Mr. Madison, and held the last office from 1811 to 1814, when in consequence of the war with Great Britain in which the United States were then engaged, and to give greater vigor to the operations of the war department, he was appointed secretary of war, and held that office until the peace of 1815, when he was again placed by Mr. Madison at the head of the department of state.

Mr. Monroe was installed president of the United States on the 4th March, 1817, and held that high and dignified office for two terms.

The members of the society are directed to wear the usual badge of mourning for a deceased member for thirty days; and they are also respectfully invited to attend the funeral of the deceased, on Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock, from the place to be appointed for the purpose. By order,

COL. RICHARD VARICK, chairman.

Chas. Graham, secretary.

The mayor of New York announced his decease to the boards of aldermen and assistant-aldermen, both which passed resolutions on the occasion, and together appointed a committee to take charge of the interment of his remains. The gentlemen of the bar, the court of general sessions of the peace, the superior court of New York, the trustees of Columbia college, the university, the college of physicians and surgeons, the chamber of commerce, the chamber of trade, the historical society, the N. Y. literary and philosophic society, the printers, &c. &c passed resolutions in testimony of their respect for the deceased, and arranged themselves for attending the funeral, &c. and the following orders were issued by the major general commanding the first division of the New York state artillery:

New York, July 5, 1831.

☞The major general announces to the division the death of the hon. JAMES MONROE, late president of the United States. He departed this life on the 4th inst. in the 73rd year of his age.

In consigning to the tomb the illustrious dead, while the heart is solaced by the reflection of the virtues which graced their lives, there is a desire, honorable to our nature, of prolonging as it were our attachment and love, by honoring their remains. It is a feeling just and useful; it is a reward to past, it is an incentive to future virtue. To such honors is the memory of Mr. Monroe justly entitled. His youth was passed in the field, periling his life, and shedding his blood in the cause of his country's freedom and independence. His after years were honored by the confidence of his country in diplomatic missions of high import, and in filling the highest office that the people can bestow. In the former, his missions were attended with complete success, and the administration of his high office was crowned with happiness and the prosperity of his country. He has been blest to a late period of life with witnessing these blessings to his native land, and now full of years, "sinks to rest with all his country's wishes blest."

This division is ordered on duty to pay funeral honors to his remains. The interment will take place on Thursday 7th inst. from the City Hall. The procession will move precisely at 4 o'clock. The division line will be formed in Broadway, the right resting on the north side of Vesey street. Gen. Hopkins will direct the national flag to be displayed at the battery in the usual emblem of mourning, and will order minute guns to be fired during the procession—73 in number, corresponding with the years of the deceased. Gen. Arcularius will order a squadron of cavalry to assemble at half past 2 o'clock, at the late residence of the deceased, No. 63, Prince street, to escort the body with the relations and friends, and the committee of the corporation to the City Hall. The body will then be taken from thence to St. Paul's church, where the funeral service will be performed—after the same, the line will break into open column, left in front, with reversed arms, and proceed to the New York cementry in Second street, where military funeral honors will be paid. The officers will wear mourning sword knots, and the standards and instruments of music will be dressed in crape.

General Muir, commissary general, will deliver the requisite ammunition upon the order of the commandants of the several brigades.

By order of maj. gen. MORTON.

S. D. JACKSON, division inspector.

The officers of the third division of infantry were also invited to attend—so were the naval officers on this station, by com. Chauncey, &c.

Assistant adjutant general's office, E. Dep.
New York, July 6, 1831.

SPECIAL ORDER—NO. 92.

The major general commanding forbears to make a formal announciation of the death of ex-president Monroe to the division of the army under his orders. That interesting event, will, no doubt, be appropriately and generally announced by the highest authority.

In the mean time, the funeral of the illustrious deceased will, it is understood, commence at 4 o'clock, P. M. on the 7th inst. from the City Hall. All the officers of the army, in the city and harbor of New York, who can be spared from duties not indispensable, are requested to meet the major general commanding the department at the time and place given above, in order to take such place in the funeral procession as may be assigned them. (See No. 109, general regulations of the army.)

The post of fort Columbus, being within sight and hearing of the city, will fire minute guns during the march of the procession. This may be regulated by the city bells, which, it is presumed, will be tolled during the same period.

By order of maj. gen. SCOTT.
W. C. DE HART, A. A. adj. gen.

The greatest credit (says the New York American) is due to the committee of arrangement of the common council, of which alderman Cebra was chairman, for the punctuality, order, and precision of the whole proceedings.

The body having been brought by a guard of honor from the late residence of the deceased, accompanied by the immediate relatives and friends, was deposited on the platform in front of the City Hall. Immediately above it, a temporary stage, covered with black cloth, had been erected; and from that, president Duer, of Columbia college, made the following brief and appropriate remarks:

Fellow citizens—Another anniversary of our national independence has been consecrated by the death of another of those patriots who assisted to achieve it—of another of those statesmen who, after a long course of public service, attained the highest office in that government, to the foundation of which he had contributed by an early devotion of life and fortune to his country.

Did this event stand single in our annals—were it unconnected in our memories with the deaths on a former anniversary of the same glorious day—of two of his illustrious predecessors—even then a similar removal of the deceased would have been deemed admonitory, and would have commanded a solemn and appropriate notice. But following as it does that signal union in their flight from this world of the immortal spirits of Adams and Jefferson, the departure of MONROE must impress us with an awful sense of a divine interposition, and awaken a livelier gratitude for the favor and protection of an overruling Providence.

Amongst our national blessings we may indeed enumerate not merely the lives, but the very deaths of men like him whose mortal remains now lie before us. For his life was spent in usefulness to his country—and his death imparts a greater sanctity to her institutions. It would be superfluous, fellow citizens, to detain you with a narrative of events, which are interwoven with the history of this nation, and which must needs be familiar to all who have watched its prosperity, or who value its renown. It is enough on this occasion to remind you that in the various public employments in which the deceased was engaged for half a century, he was distinguished for the ardor of his patriotism, and the uprightness of his intentions, for valor and perseverance as a soldier—for industry, caution and fidelity as a statesman. And although before he reached the highest station to which he could be elevated by the favor or gratitude of his countrymen, he had not escaped the political controversies of the time; yet party spirit had then so far subsided, and political adversaries had become so far reconciled, that he was first chosen president against a merely nominal opposition, and was re-elected by a unanimous vote. His administration of that high office was not only characterised for its temperate and impartial spirit; but it exhibited just and liberal views of national policy, and was signalised by the firm attitude and enlightened principles which it assumed in regard to the South American republics, and in support of the integrity and inviolability of the western continent.

At the expiration of the usual term of service he retired permanently from public life: but the time he had devoted to it had prevented him from bestowing that attention on his private affairs which was essential to the comfort of his declining years. With a broken constitution, and impaired fortune, he sought for repose in the bosom of his family, and looked for his remuneration to the justice of his country; from the one, he received all the consolations which this world could afford—from the other a grateful acknowledgment of his claims.

Upon us, however, fellow-citizens, and upon our posterity, he still has claims which money cannot compensate—which time cannot impair—nor death extinguish. We owe to his memory a lasting debt of gratitude for the blood shed in his youth in defence of our liberties—for the vigor of manhood exhausted in his efforts to promote our national interests—and for the experience of his age devoted to extend and perpetuate our political welfare and security. And whilst we commit his body to the earth from which it sprung, and commend his soul to the heaven whence it issued, let us not forget, my countrymen, another and a higher debt due to the Great Ruler of the universe for the example of such a life, and for the glory of such a death.

The body was then taken from before the City Hall to St. Paul's church, where the impressive funeral service of the Episcopal church was read by the right rev. bishop Onderdonk and the rev. Dr. Wainright. The pulpit and reading desk were clad in mourning, and an appropriate anthem was sung by the choir.

In the meantime, the several societies formed in the park. The procession then moved in the following order, as arranged by the committee of the corporation—

Major general Morton's division of artillery, under arms.
The funeral escort, consisting of two battalions of infantry in reversed order.
The sexton.
The reverend the clergy.
Pall bearers in open barouches. THE BODY. Pall bearers in open barouches.
The relatives of the deceased.
The common council of the city of New York as mourners, in the following order:
The mayor of the city.
The board of aldermen, headed by their president.
The board of assistant aldermen, headed by their president.
The officers of the two boards.
The society of the Cincinnati.
The physicians of the deceased.
The president, trustees, faculty, and students of Columbia college.
The university of the city of New York, the hon. Albert Gallatin presiding.
College of physicians and surgeons.
Foreign ministers and consuls.
Marshal of the United States, and sheriff of the city and county.
Judges of the United States and state courts, and the recorder.
Members of congress.
Senate and assembly of the state legislature.
Members of the bar.
President and trustees of the village of Brooklyn.
Officers of the army and navy of the United States.
Militia officers not on duty.
Chamber of commerce.
Board of trade.
Officers of the customs.
Wardens of the port and harbor masters.
Marine society.
Various other societies.
Citizens of Brooklyn.
Citizens of New York.

The body was carried in a hearse, covered with black cloth, fringed with gold. From the centre pannels, the national flag hung reversed, and eight black feathers waved above the whole; the hearse was drawn by four black horses. On either side of the hearse, in open barouches, rode the

PALL BEARERS.

Samuel L. Southard, N. J.	David Brooks,
Col. Richard Varick,	Col. John Trumbull,
John Watts,	Gov. Aaron Ogden, of N. J.
Jno. Ferguson, naval officer,	Thos. Morris, U. S. marshal.

Preceding the hearse, the rt. rev. bishop Onderdonk and the rev. Dr. Wainwright rode in a carriage, followed by the rev. clergy and all others on foot.

The procession moved up Broadway to Bleecker street, the military forming in line on each side of Bleecker and Second streets, while the different public bodies and societies marched through and entered the cemetery. The body was then deposited in the vault assigned to it on the north east end. The troops fired three rounds after the body had been lowered, and the procession moved out of the cemetery in the same order in which they entered.

The body of the deceased was deposited in a leaden coffin soon after death, and that in a mahogany coffin, which bears on a plate of silver the following inscription:

JAMES MONROE,
Of Virginia,
DIED 4th JULY, 1831.
AGED 74 YEARS.

The shops generally were closed; and it is to be mentioned, as especially creditable to the inhabitants of the Bowery and Chatham-row, through which the corpse was conveyed to the City Hall, that their stores and dwellings were hung in black—a spontaneous tribute of respect.

ARMY GENERAL ORDERS:

Head quarters of the army,
Adjutant general's office, Washington, July 8th, 1831.

The general in chief has received the following order from the war department:—

War department, July 7th, 1831.

It becomes my painful duty to announce to the army the death of the venerated patriot and ex-president JAMES MONROE. This afflicting dispensation occurred on the late anniversary of our independence.

At a moment when a nation of freemen were celebrating the achievements of that devoted band of patriots who purchased with their blood the liberty we enjoy, one of the principal actors in the great drama was called to his last account. Participating in the sensation which must fill every heart on such an afflicting occasion, and anxious to manifest his gratitude for the eminent services, and admiration for the talents and virtue of the deceased, the president directs that funeral honors be paid him at every military post and station in the United States, and that the officers wear crape on the left arm for six months.

Major general Macomb will give the necessary instructions for carrying into execution forthwith the foregoing order. P. G. RANDOLPH, acting sec. of war.

The major general commanding the army, in obeying the commands of the president, in reference to the melancholy subject of the above order, cannot but indulge in those feelings which the afflicting occasion so naturally excites. The army will sympathise with him and with their fellow citizens generally, in the loss which the country has sustained in the death of ex-president MONROE. His public services in the field and in the cabinet are too well known to require a recital here. Suffice it to say, that he was an ornament to the American nation both as a soldier and a statesman—constant in the dissemination of those principles which led to the achievement of the glorious independence of these states, and ever ready to defend them at every hazard. An example worthy of the contemplation of every American citizen.

On the first Monday after the arrival of this order at each military post, the troops will be paraded at 10 o'clock, A. M. and the order read to them, after which all labors for the day will cease.

The national flag will be displayed half staff.

At dawn of day, 13 guns will be fired, and afterwards at intervals of thirty minutes between the rising and setting sun, a single gun will be fired; and at the close of the day, a salute of 24 guns.

The colors of the several regiments will be put in mourning for the space of six months, and the officers wear crape during the same period.

By order of ALEXANDER MACOMB,
Maj. gen. commanding U. S. army.
R. JONES, adj. gen.

NAVY GENERAL ORDERS.

Navy department, July 7, 1831.

The president of the United States, with deep regret, announces to the navy and to the marine corps, the death of our illustrious and venerated fellow-citizen JAMES MONROE. It pleased Divine Providence to remove him from this scene of trial, in the city of New York, on the fifty-fifth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence: and from sympathy with his relations and the American people for his loss, and from respect to his sacrifices and sufferings in achieving, and his distinguished services in since maintaining, that independence, the president orders, that funeral honors shall be paid to his memory at each of the navy yards, and on board all the public vessels in commission, by firing twenty-one minute guns, commencing at twelve o'clock M. on the day after this communication is received, by carrying the flags half mast for one week, and by the officers wearing crape on the left arm for six months. LEVI WOODBURY.

HONORS TO THE MEMORY OF MR. MONROE, IN VIRGINIA.

From the Richmond Enquirer.

As soon as the confirmation of the death of ex-president Monroe was received in this city on Friday last, the executive department and the general court, took measures to express their respect for the deceased patriot. The following order was adopted by the lieutenant governor.

Executive department, 8th July, 1831.

The executive having just received intelligence of the death, on the 4th instant, of James Monroe, esq. late president of the United States, a native of Virginia, distinguished by his zeal and patriotism, during our revolutionary struggle, and through a long life since, by many important public services, and by steady devotion to his country's good: Therefore, direct, as a testimony of public respect and gratitude, that the bell be tolled from 3 o'clock until sunset, of this day, and that minute guns be fired, from one hour before until sunset of this day. The latter service will be performed by the Richmond Lafayette artillery.

P. V. DANIEL, lieut. gov. of Va.
To capt. John B. Richardson, of the Lafayette artillery.

The general court came to the following order:

VIRGINIA:

At a general court held at the capitol, in the city of Richmond, on Friday, the 8th of July, 1831:

The court having just received intelligence by letter from James P. Preston, esq. of the death of their venerable fellow citizen, JAMES MONROE, late president of the United States, at the city of New York, on the 4th inst. and considering that it is due to the eminent stations he has filled, to his great moral worth, and to the distinguished services he has rendered to the country, to testify, by some public act, their respect for his memory and character:

Therefore, resolved, That the members of this court will wear crape on their left arms, during the residue of the term, as a manifestation of their feelings on this melancholy occasion, and of their sorrow for the loss which the public, as well as his family and friends, has sustained.

Resolved, That, as a further tribute of respect to his memory, this court be now adjourned till to-morrow, 1 o'clock, P. M. and that these resolutions be spread among the orders of the court.

A copy—Test, WM. G. PENDLETON, clk.

On Friday evening, the bell tolled every quarter of a minute, and minute guns were fired until the setting of the sun.

Honors were paid to the memory of the deceased by hoisting the flags at half-mast, the tolling of bells, firing of minute guns, or the passage of resolutions by the local authorities and other bodies of citizens—and very many of the public newspapers appeared in mourning. No one has departed this life in the United States since ADAMS and JEFFERSON, who was more beloved by the people than JAMES MONROE.

POLITICS OF THE DAY.

From the Globe.

["Official."]

"We blush for the degredation of the press. Our newspapers are filled almost entirely with discussions of private character, private quarrels and personal abuse. An effort seems to be making to decide every election by such controversies. Nothing is sacred. While peculators are lauded, honest men are loully traduced. The most faithful public service, the purest morals, are no shield. They seem to attract the most violent assaults."

From the Albany Argus.

[New York "official."]

The Daily Advertiser of yesterday contains the following paragraph:

"We have known, for some weeks past, that the anti-masons had addressed a letter to judge McLean of Ohio; and we have good reason to believe for the purpose of ascertaining whether he would consent, if nominated, to serve as their candidate for president. Whether this letter was addressed to him 'by authority,' or as the mere suggestion of particular individuals, we pretend not to know, nor do we care. It has drawn forth from him, however, an answer, which the anti-masonic journals will experience no great pleasure in publishing: for their edification and amusement, however, we take leave to state, that judge McLean has explicitly declared, that he would not denounce masonry, if he was certain that such denunciation would elevate him to the presidency."

The anti-masonic "brother" of the Daily Advertiser, the Evening Journal, says the above statement "is a ridiculous fabrication."

From the Globe.

"The United States Telegraph, to keep up appearances, still holds out the idea that several of the members of the late cabinet were required by the president through a member of congress, as a sine qua non of their continuance in office, to compel their families to associate with the lady of the secretary of war. Col. Johnson is named as the member of congress who will confirm the statement.

We pronounce this a foul slander upon col. Johnson. He was never authorised by the president to make any such communication; he never said that he was so authorised; nor did he ever make such a communication. It is time for him of the Telegraph to bring forward his proofs. Let him not again, without evidence, re-assert to an honest people this thrice repeated and thrice contradicted slander upon the president and col. Johnson."

From the United States Telegraph.

[Late "official"—in reply.]

The Globe asserts that "it is time for him of the Telegraph to bring forward his proofs."

It will be remembered that we asserted that the member of congress, whom we admit to have been col. Johnson of Kentucky, informed Messrs. Ingham, Branch and Berrien, that he acted upon the authority of the president. And there are other circumstances which go to prove that he did so act. Those gentlemen so understood him. It is also true, that, upon hearing their reply, the president declined pressing the matter further at that time; and, when the whole truth comes before the people, there will be very few who can entertain a doubt that col. Johnson did act as we have stated, and upon the advice and direction of gen. Jackson. The Globe undertakes to deny this for col. Johnson, and call upon us for the proof. It will be in time for us to bring forward our proof when col. Johnson himself shall have made or authorised a denial. Has he authorised the publication in the Globe? If so, let the Globe publish his statement. When that is done, we will speak again; until it is done, let the Globe be silent.

From the Philadelphia Sentinel.

[Late Pennsylvania "official."]

[To explain the article annexed, it is necessary to say, that at the D-mocratic-Jackson celebration of the 4th of July, at Philadelphia, a tremendous commotion was caused by the introduction of the toast stated below.]

To the editors of the American Sentinel.

The following toast offered by me at the Jackson democratic festival, has been the subject of severe remark in several numbers of the Inquirer:

TOAST.

John McLean, of Ohio—If purity of private life, fidelity in public trust—if talents and acquirements of a high order, united with large experience and extensive observation, can recommend a citizen to the confidence of his countrymen, let them elevate this unobtrusive man of the people to the presidency.

I am induced to notice those remarks only because they seem designed to render the mayor of the city responsible for an act purely my own, by intimating that he may have counselled the course which I thought proper to pursue on the occasion referred to. Justice to that gentleman requires me to aver in the most positive and unequivocal manner that I offered the toast without consultation or advice from any quarter, and without any previous conversation with the mayor from which he could know or infer that I intended so to do—as expressing my own free, deliberate and as yet, unaltered sentiments. Having performed this act of justice to another, I may be indulged in a short statement of facts, explaining my own reasons for thus openly and unequivocally avowing my friendship for judge McLean—reasons abundantly sufficient to determine my course, without advice or instruction from any quarter.

My acquaintance with judge McLean began some years ago, before he had been named as a candidate for the presidency, and during the time when I followed my business in the city of Washington. At a moment of severe domestic affliction, I experienced from him and his family a degree of kindness which has left an indelible impression upon my memory. Since then all that I have known or heard of judge McLean has added to my feelings of personal esteem, and to my conviction that he is eminently qualified to serve his country in the highest public station. Hence from the first mention of his name as a candidate for election, I have openly avowed my preference for him as the successor of general Andrew Jackson.

Such were my feelings, when I visited Washington on business for the commonwealth in the month of April last. I then called on the president, in relation to a claim for services rendered the government, in the arrest of Dr. Watkins. Being informed that he was out, I proceeded to the office of major Lewis, and stated my business to him. He immediately changed the subject and inquired my opinion as to the strength of the Jackson party in Philadelphia, which opinion I candidly gave, disguising no portion of the truth, whether agreeable or the reverse. He then asked me how judge Wilkins had been received in Philadelphia, and whether preparations were making for the reception of judge McLean. I replied that judge Wilkins had been well received, that I believed judge McLean would be cheeringly welcomed, and added moreover, that the latter would in my opinion be president after the expiration of gen. Jackson's term. Major Lewis then said, that McLean should be the last man to come out for president, as gen. Jackson had honored him with one of the highest offices in his gift, that McLean never could or ought to be elected, and that every thing should be done by the friends of Jackson to prevent it. He then asked me whether the American Sentinel or Pennsylvania Inquirer had the greatest circulation, and which was best supported by the Jackson party. I replied that I had no confidence in the democracy of the Inquirer, but regarded it as in the market, ready to adopt the sentiments of the party which would pay best. My reply seemed to startle major Lewis, who said, he had understood that the Inquirer had a more extensive circulation than any Jackson paper in the city.

At this point in the conversation, major Lewis proposed to introduce me to Mr. Van Buren: I accepted the offer, and was accordingly introduced to Mr. Van Buren, when a conversation ensued corresponding precisely to that with major Lewis, except that part which related to the Philadelphia newspapers, and with this addition, that a question was anxiously asked by Mr. Van Buren, whether judge Hemphill was to be chairman at the Clay meeting in Philadelphia, as had been currently reported in Washington. I stated in reply, that a similar report had been circulated in Philadelphia, but that I did not believe it. I then took my leave of Mr. Van Buren.

On leaving the secretary's mansion, I requested major Lewis to introduce me to the president, to whom I was the bearer of a letter relating to my claim. He promised to do so, if I would call at his office at 2 o'clock, P. M. I called at that hour, and waited till near 3 o'clock without seeing him, went to the president's mansion. I was informed that the president was not at home, and major Lewis being also denied to me, I had no alternative but to retreat. At 4 o'clock I returned to the president's, renewed my inquiries for him and major Lewis, and received the same answer. On going back to my lodgings I met Mr. George C. Smoot, a friend of mine, to whom I stated my anxiety to see the president, and my disappointment at the conduct of major Lewis. Mr. Smoot then offered his services to accompany me to the president's, assuring me of an interview with the president, if I would obey his instructions. When we reached the door, he directed me to address a note to general Jackson, mentioning my wish to see him on business of importance, subject to his decision, and my intention to wait for an answer. In a few moments the president came into the hall with my note in his hand, and invited Mr. Smoot and myself into his sitting room. I presented the letter from the mayor, and said I had called three or four times during the day without the good fortune to find him at home. To my utter astonishment he replied that he had not been from home during the whole day. The conversation was here interrupted by the entrance of major Lewis, who after making a slight apology to me for disappointing me, immediately remarked to the president, "Mr. Blayney, does not believe that judge Hemphill will act as chairman at the Clay meeting in Philadelphia." The president waived the discourse on this subject, and after satisfactorily closing my business, I retired.

On my return to Philadelphia I mentioned the whole of these conversations to the mayor, who, after expressing his surprise at their character and his inability to understand their meaning, made a request which I have faithfully regarded up to the present moment, that I would not communicate them to any one else.

The report soon became current, that major Lewis was making a contract for the purchase of the Inquirer, and this at once explained to me the cause of the strict inquiry as to the circulation and standing of that paper. I am still at a loss, however, to understand the reason for major Lewis's reluctance to carry me into the presence of the president, unless he desired the president to be kept in ignorance of the conversation which had passed at his office, which I am led to infer from his unwillingness to engage in a political discussion started by major Lewis, was the case.

I am perfectly ready to admit that the insight which I thus obtained into the character and advisers of those who surrounded the president, was not calculated to shake my attachment to judge McLean, or to induce me to invert, at an assemblage of my own townsmen, opinions and feelings which I had freely expressed to the chief favorites and advisers of general Jackson. Still less has the course of the Inquirer since the reported purchase tended to strengthen my confidence in the purity of some to whom common report has assigned the most intimate relations with the head of the government. I have, therefore, adhered to the man of my own free and deliberate choice, and have plainly expressed that choice in the toast which has occasioned so much unnecessary excitement. Whatever may be the consequence of such an offence, in this land of boasted liberty, ruled in the name, at least, if not in the spirit of the constitution, I am ready to bear. I must insist, however, that upon my own head, and upon that only, my sins be visited, and especially, that the charge attempted against the mayor, of having prompted me on this occasion, I now pronounce it to be unequivocally false.

WILLIS H. BLAYNEY.

From the United States Telegraph of June 23.

The Globe of this morning gives a contrast between "the ex-secretaries Clay and Eaton," and says, "Mr. Clay challenged a senator for words spoken in debate."

"Major Eaton sent a challenge to an adversary for an insult transmitted in writing, and, as it seemed, purposely given to provoke it."

"Mr. Clay was provoked by a taunt calling him a blackleg."

"Major Eaton by a wanton attack on the character of his wife."

We are certainly not the apologists of Mr. Clay. We were of those who have been consistently opposed to him. We did not urge him to make the bargain, and, after pledging that the Argus should not complain, turn about, because he had refused a clerkship worth $1,500 per annum, and denounce him and the bargain too.*

We were opposed to the election of Mr. Adams, and to the challenge of Mr. Randolph. So were the people. Will the people approve of the challenge of Mr. Ingham? The Globe, by way of justifying it, says that major Eaton was provoked by a wanton attack upon the character of his wife. What are the facts?

The president dismissed Messrs. Ingham, Branch and Berrien from office; the cause assigned was want of "harmony in feeling." It was alike due to them and the country that the cause of that want of harmony should be known. It was stated in this paper that it was occasioned by the refusal of their families to visit major Eaton's. Was this a wanton attack upon the wife of major Eaton, which justified his calling for the blood of the husbands of the offending ladies? If so, why did major Eaton submit to it for so long a time? Major Eaton knew before the appointment of either Mr. Ingham or Mr. Branch, that their families would not associate with his; he did not then consider it a cause of quarrel. What has transpired since then to make it so? The words in the Telegraph which Mr. Eaton quotes as cause of quarrel, are:

"It is proved that the families of the secretaries of the treasury and of the navy, and of the attorney general, refused to associate with her."

It is not said, nor is it pretended, that Mr. Ingham ever said a disparaging word of Mrs. Eaton. The charge that he has made a wanton attack upon her, and that such attack was the cause of the challenge, is untrue. The cause of the challenge, however, is given in Mr. Eaton's first note. It was given because Mr. Ingham's family refused to visit Mrs. Eaton; and this was the cause of that want of harmony which dissolved the cabinet. Is not this what we have said, and for saying which we have been condemned as a deserter from the party? Is not all that we have said relative to the malign influence fully made out by the acts and the admissions of the parties? More.

Did we not foretell the course of the Globe? The editor will remember that, when he came to us, on his arrival at Washington, with his hypocritical pretensions of friendship and respect for us, we told him that his press was about to be established to support Mrs. Eaton. He then, in the freshness of heart, swore an oath, which we will not repeat, and, like one of old, who said "Is thy servant a dog?" protested that he would not enter into such service. Now where is he? A willing slave, laboring to prove that the refusal of Mr. Ingham's family to visit Mrs. E. is a wanton attack upon "female innocence," calling for the blood of the husband and the father.

Quid non mortalia pectora cogis,
Aura sacra fames?

From the American Sentinel, of July 14.

MR. INGHAM'S APPOINTMENT.

The "malign influence," not satisfied with breaking up the cabinet of general Jackson, seem determined to

---

*Extract from a letter written to gen. John P. Van Ness, by the hon. Thomas P. Moore, 4th March, 1828.

"I received two letters from a confidential friend of Mr. Clay's, residing in Kentucky, urging me to vote for whoever would make Mr. Clay secretary of state, and intimating that Mr. Adams would do it."

Mr. Blair will scarcely deny that he was the person who wrote to Mr. Moore.

Extract of letter from Amos Kendall to H. Clay, dated Frankfort, January 21st, 1825.

"As I informed you, the resolutions requesting you to vote for Jackson passed, and you have doubtless received them. Jackson is my second choice, all circumstances being equal between him and Adams. But if our interest in the west can be promoted by any other arrangement, I shall be content. * * * *

DO WHAT YOU THINK BEST, THE ARGUS WILL NOT COMPLAIN."

Extract from a letter addressed to Mr. Clay by Mr. Kendall, in 1828.

"You afterwards offered me a clerkship, with a salary of 1,000, which I declined, expressing a willingness to accept one with a salary of $1,500."

So much for Mr. Kendall's devotion to gen. Jackson and his abhorrence of the "BARGAIN."

make war upon the republican members of the Pennsylvania delegation in congress, who approved of Mr. Ingham's appointment as secretary of the treasury. Measuring other men's morals by their own, they presumptuously and indecently endeavor to bring our members down to their own debased and profligate level. With this view, one of them has written a letter, which is published in the "arranged" Inquirer, of the 4th inst. containing the following version of the old coffin handbill slander, revised and corrected by authority.

"At a festive club of the Calhoun members of con-"gress from Pennsylvania, the infamous project was "conceived of thwarting the views of the president, and "of bullying him into the appointment of Samuel D. "Ingham. It was a bold and desperate attempt; but "upon the issue depended their momentary triumph, or "their total overthrow. While the intoxicating juice "of the grape was still burning in their veins, these "'eleven Calhoun members from Pennsylvania,' posted "off to the president, demanded the appointment of Mr. "Ingham, and the rejection of Mr. Baldwin. Their de-"mand was not acceded to; they retired to their quar-"ters, collected five members from other states, returned "to the president, passed themselves off as the majority "of the Pennsylvania delegation in congress, and made "a second demand which was not acceded to. At length "they declared, that if Mr. Ingham was not appointed, "their friends in the senate would reject the nomination "of Mr. Baldwin! Believing that they stated nothing "but facts, and being anxious to conform to what he was "erroneously led to believe the wishes of the people of "Pennsylvania, he yielded to their entreaties."

If it were necessary, it would not be difficult to trace the authorship of this scandalous attack on the Pennsylvania delegation. It could doubtless be found in the vicinity of the treasury department, and in the person of an intimate friend of the late secretary at war. The Inquirer vouches its respectability in the following editorial note:

"The letter we furnish from Washington this morn-"ing, gives what we believe to be a true account of the "recent transactions at the seat of government. It de-"serves to be perused by all who desire to sift the wheat "of truth from the chaff of falsehood, in which those "transactions are involved."

Emanating from a source which ought to be considered respectable, and endorsed by the Lewis official here, the slander has acquired an importance it never before possessed. We are, therefore, authorised on the most unquestionable authority to give it a decided and unqualified contradiction.

It is not true, that the members of the Pennsylvania delegation, or any number of them, met on the day referred to, at a festive club, at home or elsewhere; that they visited the president while the juice of the grape was still burning in their veins; or that they ever attempted to bully general Jackson into the appointment of Mr. Ingham.

The day on which the members alluded to waited on the president, as well as the hour, were designated by himself; and it has always been understood by them, that the interview was sought by the president. Certainly, the whole conversation induced the members to believe that the president was much gratified with the visit.

It is absolutely and unqualifiedly false, that the members referred to ever called upon the president more than once. The whole story, therefore, about a second visit in company with members from other states, and a third visit, at which they threatened the president with the rejection of Mr. Baldwin's nomination by the senate, is a most infamous and groundless falsehood.

Who are the men that are thus charged with bullying general Jackson into the appointment of Mr. Ingham, while the intoxicating juice of the grape was burning in their veins?. Why, governor Wolf, general McKean, Mr. Ramsay, of Cumberland, Dr. Adam King, of York, Mr. Fry, of Lehigh, Mr. Forward, of Somerset, Mr. Mitchell, of Centre, judge Green, of Dauphin, the late D. H. Miller, Mr. Adams, of Berks, and Dr. Sutherland, of Philadelphia.

Mr. Ingham, of course, was not present, Mr. Van Horne, of Lycoming, though absent from indisposition, specially requested his name to be given to the president as approving the appointment of Mr. Ingham; thus making, if all are included, thirteen out of twenty members, which was the entire number of Jackson representatives in that congress.

We have greatly misunderstood the character of general Jackson, if he would suffer himself to be bullied into the appointment of any man, and we are very certain that the members from this state would be among the last to assume that character.

To the charge of intoxication, thus indecently brought against the Pennsylvania delegation, the well known character of the gentlemen named is a sufficient answer.

For the truth of what we here assert, we appeal with confidence to the president of the United States. Under ordinary circumstances, we would have suffered this stale slander to pass unnoticed; but originating with a faction at the seat of government, and transmitted to its organ here, who vouches for its truth, we have felt it our duty to repel the foul calumny which has thus been reiterated against some of the soundest democrats and most honorable men in Pennsylvania.

We deferred making this statement until the return of the president to Washington, and we would be obliged to any friend who will take the trouble to have it safely conveyed to him, in order that he may see what has been said to his disparagement and that of his friends, in his absence.

From the Globe.

The editor of the Telegraph charged the president with requiring certain members of his late cabinet, through a member of congress, to associate with the family of another member of the cabinet, as the condition on which he would retain them in office.

We denied the charge so far as the president was concerned.

It was repeated.

We again denied it, and further denied that the member of congress supposed to be referred to, had ever borne such a message.

It was again repeated.

Having ascertained the member of congress alluded to, and having obtained assurance from him that the statement was false, we contradicted the story peremptorily, and called for proof. Had we not a right then, if the Telegraph still insisted on its affirmation, to insist on our part that it should produce the proof of the witness referred to, as having borne the message from the president? Col. Johnson is the individual whom the Telegraph has pointed out as the witness connusant of the whole matter and communicating between the president and the members of the cabinet. It was certainly the business of the party making the charge to call out the facts from col. Johnson, to establish his affirmative positions. Instead of doing this, the editor of the Telegraph requires us to prove that his charge was not true.

At this point we should have dropped the controversy, but we have understood that it is reported to give countenance to the contradicted statement of the Telegraph, that Mr. Berrien has received a letter from col. Johnson, which shews that we had no warrant for the denial we made as to him. We take the liberty, therefore, of quoting from the letter of col Johnson which we have, his express declaration that the president did not make the exaction of the members of his cabinet charged by the Telepraph. The col. says,

"He" (general Jackson), "never authorised me to require social intercourse, &c. &c. He always disclaimed it. I told the parties so." These are the words of the colonel, to the word, point and letter. If this does not satisfy, we must refer the parties making the charge, to the witness called by them.

From the Globe.

MR. BERRIEN TO MR. BLAIR.

Washington, 19th July, 1831.

Sir: In an article under the editorial head, in your paper of this morning, which has relation to a controversy between the editor of the Telegraph and yourself, I observe the following remark:—

"At this point, we should have dropped the controversy, but we have understood, that it is reported to give countenance to the contradicted statement of the Telegraph, that Mr. Berrien has received a letter from col. Johnson, which shews that we had no warrant for the denial we made as to him. We take the liberty, therefore, of quoting from the letter of colonel Johnson, which we have, his express declaration, that the president did not make the exaction of the members of his cabinet, charged by the Telegraph. The colonel says—'He' (general Jackson), never authorised me to require social intercourse, &c &c. He always disclaimed it; I told the parties so." These are the words of the colonel, to the word, point and letter. If this does not satisfy, we must refer the parties making the charge, to the witness called by them."

The reference thus made to me, renders it necessary, that I should submit the following observations to the public, and I have accordingly to ask that you will give them a place in your paper.

I have not authorised the report of which you speak, and I would have told you so, without hesitation, if you had intimated its existence to me. That such a course would have been more conformable to the views of col. Johnson, I infer from the following considerations.

I have a letter from that gentleman, in which, after stating his objects, and motives, in seeking the interview which with the approbation of the president he held with Messrs. Branch, Ingham and myself, he proceeded to remark that he has not himself seen the necessity, or propriety, of any allusion in newspapers, to this interview—and adds that if any should consider it necessary, then the great object should be to state the conversation correctly, for which purpose, his views were made known in that letter, in order that any misunderstanding might be corrected. Acquiescing in the propriety of this suggestion, I immediately communicated to col. Johnson a statement of the conversation referred to, as it was very distinctly impressed upon my memory—and sufficient time has not yet elapsed, I believe, to authorise me to expect an answer in the regular course of the mail. However this may be, I have not received any. Independently, therefore, of my reluctance to appear before the public, in relation to any matters connected with the dissolution of the late cabinet, a reluctance which could only be yielded to my own strong conviction of the propriety of such a measure, I have thought that the understanding implied in the correspondence, to which I have referred, would be violated, by publishing a statement of what passed at the interview in question, until it could be accompanied by the remarks of col. Johnson, on that which I had transmitted to him. A departure from this understanding, by that gentleman himself, would of course relieve me from its obligation. But from the tenor of your editorial article, I infer, that the act of publishing the extract from his letter, is not authorised by him, I adhere, therefore, at present to the determination, which I had formed; and your object as public journalists, is to present nothing to your readers which is not true, and not to withhold from them, that which is so, I take liberty of suggesting, as well to the editor of the Telegraph, as to yourself, the propriety of abstaining from any partial and imperfect statements of the conversation, which occurred at the interview in question. The delusion produced by such statements, must be speedily correct d: but until that correction is made, their effect is to mislead the public mind, on a subject of awakening interest to the American people. I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN MACPHERSON BERRIEN.

To Francis P. Blair, esq. editor of the Globe.

MR. BLAIR TO MR. BERRIEN.

Washington, July 19, 1831:

Dear sir: I have this moment received your letter, to which I will give immediate publicity.

I did not suppose that you had authorised the report, which imposed on me the necessity of giving an extract from colonel Johnson's letter. Under such an impression, I would not have hesitated to call upon you to disavow it. The report, I knew, was false, and was merely circulated to keep in countenance the charge made against the president until it could work some prejudice against him in the public mind, I did not suppose that you were an accessary in this business, and, therefore, would not insult you by an application which could only be founded on such an inference.

The course I have taken with regard to col. Johnson's letter, grew out of circumstances which will justify me to him, although he did not authorise me to publish his letter. My sole object was at once to clear the skirts of the president of a charge which you are well aware ought not to be attached to him; for you have, as I understand, explicitly declared that he disclaimed to you, at the time when you were in communication with col. Johnson, any design like that now imputed to him.

With regard to conversations between yourself and col. Johnson, I shall certainly abstain, as I have hitherto abstained, from making "any partial or imperfect statements." I am, sir, your obedient servant,

F. P. BLAIR.

☞It was not until after this sheet was prepared for the press, that we saw copies of two other letters, (each), between Messrs. Berrien and Blair. We cannot get them in without a great inconvenience. The leading point is, that Mr. Berrien utterly disavows the matter stated by Mr. Blair, that he [Mr. Berrien] was "well aware" that the president had "disclaimed" to him [Mr. Berrien] any design like that imputed to him [the president], in the communication of col. Johnson. We shall give the correspondence, of course. It plainly appears that Mr. Berrien will support the charge made, that col. Johnson, in the name of the president, waited upon him in the manner hitherto stated, by the editor of the Telegraph, &c. We are on the eve of a most strange exposition.

New Hope, July 15th, 1831.

To the editors of the American Sentinel.

Gentlemen—I have observed an article in the Globe of the 11th inst. containing a labored attempt to show that I was on the look out for "some offence" from the president. Among other remarks in support of that assumption, a note addressed by the president to me is given as evidence of it. I think it proper, under these circumstances, to communicate, through your paper, to the public, the entire correspondence between the president and myself on the subject referred to in his note; on which I deem it unnecessary to make any other comment than to remark, that in all the various notes received by me from the president antecedent to that time, he had uniformly addressed me as "the secretary of the treasury." The change could not therefore fail to attract my notice, and the public will judge from the president's note of the 6th inst. whether it does not appear more probable that he intended to designate me as standing in a new relation to the government, than that my note to him of the 7th inst. proceeded from a disposition to look "out for offence."

A correspondence between Mr. Barry and myself is referred to in the Globe for the same purpose. I will also furnish you copies of that, from which the public will be able to judge of its character. I am, very respectfully, your obd't serv't, S. D. INGHAM.

The president with his respects to Mr. Ingham, acting secretary of the treasury, and informs him that he has been notified by the mayor of the city of Washington, that the canal commissioners are to have a meeting to day, at which they desire the United States to be represented. The president requests to be informed whether it will be convenient for Mr. Ingham to attend the proposed meeting; and if inconvenient, whether it would not be advisable to authorise some person to attend as the representative of the United States.

Monday June 6th, 1831.

Address on the back "Mr. S. D. Ingham, acting secretary of the treasury."

The president of the United States:

Sir—On my return this evening from an excursion to Annapolis, I found on my table a note from you on business, in which I am designated as the "acting secretary of the treasury." As I have received no "acting appointment," this suggests a form and tenure of office, as I apprehend, wholly unknown to the laws, and having been adopted for the first time on this occasion, it indicates a new official relation, which deeming it to be illegal, I cannot consent to make myself responsible for, by continuing to perform the duties of the treasury department under that character. I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. D. INGHAM.

Washington, June 7th, 1831.

The president with his respects to Mr. Ingham, acknowledges the receipt of his note of the 7th inst. which he has this moment received. Its contents he has read with surprise. Surely, at no time has he in any way intended the slightest indignity or any thing that could wear such an appearance to any gentleman who has been connected with him in the government. It ought not nor cannot be conceived that a note hastily written, addressed "acting," when it should have been secretary of the treasury, should be considered an indignity offered, or could diminish or alter the authority under which he was transacting the duties of the department. The president in justice to himself can only add that it was not intended to alter them.*

June 8th, 1831.

The president of the U. States:

Sir—Your note of last evening removes the difficulty which had arisen in my mind from that of Monday. The duties of the office will be attended to as usual until the weights and measures shall be so arranged that the work can progress without embarrassment. I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. D. INGHAM.

From the U. S. Telegraph of July 16.

Who does not see in this letter, [Mr. Trist's to Mr. Ingham], published in the Globe, and thus given to the world, by the president's order of course, that he has thrown the weight of his character and official influence into the scale of the register, treasurer, and second auditor? Who does not know that the simple facts that a major Eaton was in the register's and treasurer's rooms, and that they saw him there, constitutes no offence? But who so blind as not to see that an examination of witnesses might prove that the register and treasurer were privy, and gave countenance to the contemplated assault; and that the proof of that fact would give a more reprehensible character to the proceedings? We have heard that even Amos Kendall was in the plot, and that, such was his anxiety, that he not only visited the treasury building, but kept himself advised of the progress of the war by messengers, and a correspondence with one of the brothers-in-law. This, and much more, we are credibly informed, would have come out in evidence, if Mr. Ingham's proposition had been acceded to.

From the Globe of the 19th inst.

To the editor of the Globe:

Sir: The Telegraph of this evening, in a commentary on the alleged conspiracy to assassinate Mr. Ingham, contains the following passage:

"We have heard that even Amos Kendall was in the plot, and that such was his anxiety, that he not only visited the treasury building, but kept himself advised of the progress of the war by messengers and a correspondence with one of the brothers in-law."

With the exception that I was once in the treasury building that day, these allegations are totally false. It is false that I was in any plot; it is false that I had any anxiety; it is false that I kept myself advised of the progress of the war by messengers; it is false that I had any "correspondence with one of the brothers-in law," or any one else, on that subject. I knew nothing whatever of major Eaton's designs, or Mr. Ingham's alarms.

In the evening of that day I several times passed Mr. Ingham's dwelling with my wife on my arm. We were looking at several houses with a view to rent one. Probably we were mistaken for a "recruited force;" but I most solemnly declare I had no hostile design against Mr. Ingham, nor do I believe my wife had.

Very respectfully, AMOS KENDALL.

July 16th, 1831.

From the U. S. Telegraph of the same evening.

Mr. Kendall is out in the Globe with a denial, in which he asserts that neither he or his wife had any hostile designs on Mr. Ingham. He denies any agency in the plot: any correspondence with either of the brothers-in law. We give Mr. Kendall's denial for what it is worth. We still believe that he did know of major Eaton's object, and that the correspondence would have appeared in proof, in case an investigation had been made. Mr. Kendall's denial does not surprise us. We know how much it is worth.

POLITICS OF THE DAY.

FROM THE GLOBE, OF JULY 22.

Mr. Berrien to Mr. Blair.

Washington, July 20, 1831.

SIR: Your note of yesterday was received under circumstances which prevented my immediate attention to it. I reply to it now, to correct the misapprehension into which you have been led, and which, by the publicity which you have given to it, is calculated to mislead the public.

I extract from your note the following sentence:

"My sole object was at once to clear the skirts of the president from a charge, which you are well aware ought not to be attached to him; for you have as I understand, explicitly declared, that he disclaimed to you, at the time when you were in communication with col. Johnson, any design like that now imputed to him."

I make this quotation for the purpose of saying to you, that you have been entirely misinformed—that the statement contained in this extract is not warranted by any declaration ever made by [me;] and still assuming it to be your wish to represent this mater truly to the public, I am under the necessity of asking you to give publicity to this note. I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant, JOHN MACPHERSON BERRIEN.

To Francis P. Blair, esq. editor of the Globe.

Mr. Blair to Mr. Berrien.

Washington, July 20, 1831.

SIR: Your note of this morning will be given immediately to the press. In reference to the subject of which it treats, you do me but justice when you say that "I wish to represent this matter truly to the public." You will permit me, therefore, briefly to show the ground on which I felt myself authorised to say that "you were well aware," that the charge implicating the president, ought not to be attached to him, and that you had yourself explicitly declared that he disclaimed the purpose imputed to him.

As to the first branch of this statement, which you do not seem directly to controvert, I have to support me the positive written declaration of col. Johnson, in which he says that the president always disclaimed such a requisition, and that he told you so. Besides this, I have before me, in the hand writing of the president, the identical paper, which he read to yourself, and Messrs. Branch and Ingham, and which presented the attitude that he thought it his duty to assume in relation to the circumstances which affected the harmony and character of his cabinet. The course which he thought proper then to adopt, was predicated on information given him by several members of congress, showing that a combination had been entered into, in which yourself and the other gentlemen named were concerned, to disgrace major Eaton, and coerce his dismission from the cabinet. After a prefatory verbal explanation of the reasons inducing the interview, the president proceeded to say, that if it were true that you had taken the course of which he spoke, he felt himself called on to make the declaration which he read to you from his written memorandum, in which he says that is was, using his own words, "not only unjust in itself, but highly disrespectful to me," (the president), "and well calculated to destroy the harmony of my cabinet. The grounds upon which this opinion is founded, are substantially these. I do not claim the right to interfere, in any manner, in the domestic relations or personal intercourse of any member of my cabinet, nor have I in any manner attempted it." &c.

In the conclusion of the same paper, after recapitulating the circumstances to which he wished to call your attention, he says, as the result of the matter, "therefore have I sought this interview, to assure you if there is any truth in the report that you have entered into the combination charged, to drive major Eaton from my cabinet, that I feel it an indignity and insult offered to myself, and is of a character that will be considered of."

This is the ground on which this matter was placed by the president in his interview with you in the beginning of the difficulties. And from it, and the absolute asseveration of col. Johnson, I consider my statement, "that you were well aware that the president disclaimed all right to interfere and dictate the social intercourse of the family of any member of the cabinet, to be well warranted."

That I am also warranted in having said that you, yourself, had declared that the president disclaimed to you any disposition of the sort, will appear from the extract which I make from a letter of your own, now before me. After recapitulating a conversation of your own, held with col. Johnson, (the tenor of which you inform me is to be adjusted between you and him), you make this single remark in relation to the president:

"In the interview to which I was invited by the president, some few days afterwards, I frankly exposed to him my views on this subject, and he disclaimed any disposition to press such a requisition."

In this you have allusion to the written declaration read to you by the president, which can bear no other interpretation than that which you have given it in this extract.

In both the points presented by me, in the extract quoted in your last note, I feel myself sustained by the documentary evidence, which I now lay before you; and trust you will also consider it as fully vindicating the statement which I have made. Having thus justified myself, you will permit me to conclude my correspondence with you. I am, sir, your obedient servant,

F. P. BLAIR.

Mr. Berrien to Mr. Blair.

Washington, 20th July, 1831.

SIR: I have this moment received your note, in answer to mine of this date. I make no apology for continuing this correspondence, although you intimate a wish to conclude it, because it will be readily understood that it is in your character as a public journalist, and not as an individual, that I address you. I exercise a right, therefore, which, as the editor of a public journal, you can with no propriety withhold, when I claim the insertion of this note in the same paper which conveys your own communication to the public.

I repeat the quotation from your note of yesterday:

"My sole object was at once to clear the skirts of the president of a charge, which you are well aware ought not to be attached to him; for you have, as I understand, declared that he disclaimed to you, at the time when you were in communication with col. Johnson, any design like that now imputed to him."

The first remark which I have to make upon this quotation, with reference to your observation that I did not seem to controvert the first branch of this statement, is the following:

Your assertion that I was well aware that the charge against the president, to which you referred, ought not to be attached to him, was made expressly to rest upon your understanding that I had explicitly declared, that he, (the president), disclaimed to me any such design.—

When, therefore, I told you that such a statement was not warranted by any declaration ever made by me, and of course that your understanding was not correct, I gave you a very broad denial of my having any such knowledge as that which you have imputed to me. In more distinct terms, however, (if that be possible), I now renew that declaration. I have no such knowledge. Nay, more, sir: I have no knowledge of the paper, "in the hand writing of the president," to which you refer. No such paper was ever read to me, or shown to me, or spoken of to me. If it had been, I should have most certainly not now have had occasion to address myself to the public on this subject through the columns of your paper.

Having thus disposed of the paper to which you refer, and shown that this can furnish no ground for your understanding of what I was or was not aware of, since I never saw it, and its contents were never communicated to me, I advert next to your suggestion, that this understanding is warranted by col. Johnson's positive asseveration. Upon this subject I have already told the public, through you, that I consider myself bound by the implied understanding resulting from my correspondence with that gentleman, not to publish any statement of the conversation which occurred between him, Messrs. Branch and Ingham, and myself, until he shall have had a reasonable time to reply to my letter. I told you at the same time, that any departure from this understanding, which was authorised by that gentleman, would absolve me from its obligation. I still adhere to this view, and content myself, at present, with repeating, in reference to that of which you suppose me to be well aware, that I have no such knowledge. The time must speedily arrive when this forbearance will be no longer necessary.

Your next reference is to a letter of mine to major Eaton, which you say is in your possession. As you have published an extract, you are bound to give the correspondence—even before that is done, it is very easy to see that you have entirely misunderstood the expression which you have quoted—that a disclaimer of an intention to press a requisition, is a wholly different thing from denial of ever having made it; and that in using this expression I could not have had allusion to "a written declaration," which I had never seen or heard of.

You will perceive then, sir, that you are wholly unsustained in all the points of your statement, except by a declaration which you admit that you have used without authority, and which will be met if it becomes necessary. As a faithful journalist, you will, of course, seize the occasion to correct your error. You can, no doubt, do this, in relation to the paper on which you have placed so much reliance, by a direct appeal to the president, who will not, I think, authorise the statement that that paper was ever shown to me. However this may be, I bear this testimony to the truth. Neither inviting controversy, nor seeking political effect, I find myself in a position, in which I must either speak, or silently permit the public to be misled. I have a sufficient sense of what is due to them, not to intrude myself uncalled upon their notice; and the consciousness of what I owe to myself will not permit me to shrink from the performance of my duty. I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

JN. MACPHERSON BERRIEN.

To Francis P. Blair, esq. editor of the Globe.

Mr. Blair to Mr. Berrien.

Washington, July 21, 1831.

SIR: Your last letter was received late at night, when the Globe was made up for the press. To give it insertion with the correspondence which preceded it, rendered it necessary that I should defer the whole until this day, and substitute other matter, previously set up, for my paper.

Without adverting to the special pleading of your letter, (in which, being no lawyer I have no skill), I come at once to the point. You take issue again with me, by declaring "that no such paper as that quoted by me was ever read to [you], or shown to you, or spoken of to you." And you further say, that the president "will not, you think, authorise the statement that that paper was ever shown to [you.]"

When the statement which I made, predicated upon col. Johnson's letter, was impeached in your second note, I made the appeal to the president which you seem to think I ought now to make. He immediately put into my hands the original memorandum which he wrote, and which he read to Messrs. Branch, Ingham, and yourself; and I am now expressly authorised to state again, that in the interview referred to in my note and in your own letter, quoted therein, he held in his hand, and read to you, the paper from which I have given the extracts, which you say was never read, shown, or spoken of to you. And I am authorised further to say, that if you will call on the president he will again exhibit and read to you this original document. It was prepared by him in contemplation that the interview might lead to an immediate dissolution of his cabinet, and it was intended by him to record the basis he assumed in doing an act which involved his own character and the interests of the country. The paper thus prepared by the president was communicated at the time to several of his friends, whom he consulted on the occasion. And the substance of the conversation which preceded and followed the communication was also immediately reduced to writing, and connected with the document read to you, that nothing might be left to recollection, if circumstances at a remote period should make a reference to it necessary. With regard to a transaction so recorded, and vouched by the concurrent testimony of those consulted on the occasion, there can be no mistake. A man's memory may be treacherous when the man himself is honest. I am willing to believe this is your case. You have innocently forgotten the declaration made by the president, which stands authenticated as I have told you, as well as the communication of the same purport made to you by colonel Johnson.

I am obliged to rely on this written record of a fact, rather than on your memory, especially when I find this positive proof confirming the statement of colonel Johnson, that the president disclaimed any right or desire to interfere with the private associations of yourself or your family, and that you knew it..

I next quoted your own written admission, confirming the statement of colonel Johnson, and the written record of the president, in the following words: "In the interview to which I was invited by the president some few days afterwards, (after colonel Johnson's visit), I frankly expressed to him my views on the subject, and he disclaimed any disposition to press such a requisition."

You say that "a disclaimer of an intention to press such a requisition, is a wholly different thing from denial of ever having made it."

I thought not, in this case, because no such requisition had been made. Colonel Johnson says, the president disclaimed to him any desire to control your domestic affairs, or private intercourse, and he told you so. The record of what the president said to you, declares, that he claimed no right to interfere "in the domestic relations or personal intercourse of any member of his cabinet;" and, in allusion to the same conversation, you say, he "disclaimed any disposition to press such a requisition. When no such requisition had been made by col. Johnson; when he told you the president made none; and when you do not pretend he made any, either directly or indirectly, I could not but understand your declaration, that "he disclaimed any disposition to press such a requisition," as a declaration that he made no such requisition,

But I find, in the character you have always sustained before the public, other conclusive proof, that no such requisition was ever made of you, and that you knew it. If the president had signified to you, directly or indirectly, that he required you to compel your family to associate with any one, contrary to their will and yours, you would not, as a man of honor, have waited for an invitation to resign. You would have thrown your commission in the face of the president, and said to him, "sir, I am no longer adviser or associate with a man who requires me to disgrace myself and family, though he be the president of the United States!!" In your public character I had a guarantee that you would not, for the sake of your honor, salary and emoluments, as attorney general, sink your character as a man, by tamely listening to such a requisition. No, sir; it is impossible to believe that you could have listened to such a requisition; dismissed your self-respect, forgot your southern honor, and humbly bowed in seeming reverence to the man who had insulted you, until politely invited to resign! It is impossible that you could bury such an insult, profess to be the friend of the president, make the speech that you did recently in Georgia, and now that you are out of office, disclose a fact which would seal your own shame. No, sir; no such proposition was ever made to you; you had no cause to complain of the president; you eulogized him in public and private: and you would have gladly acted as attorney general to the end of his administration, had you not been invited to resign.

But the circumstances under which the harmony of the late cabinet was restored, repel the inference, which you will have it, in your last note, that the extract from your letter to major Eaton, leaves open in the ambiguousness of its expression. From the moment that you denied to the president any participation in the political combination to drive major Eaton from the cabinet, the usual courtesies were renewed among its members, without any association between their respective families. Major Eaton would have been as reluctant to receive visiters, driven into his doors by the power of the president, as they could possibly have been to submit to such tyranny and degradation. His house was thronged by those who were among the most respectable people of the city, by the most honorable families visiting, annually, here, and by those from abroad, most distinguished by station. To the gaiety and respectability of parties thus attended, the appearance of persons constrained by the authority of the executive, if it could have been exerted for such purpose, would have added nothing. It could have served no purpose to have exacted such a requisition as that now imputed, to the injury of the president. To have forced the wife of the secretary of war, upon that portion of society which was unwilling to receive her, could have added nothing to her reputation. It is ridiculous to impute to the failure of such a design, the dissolution of the late cabinet. You, I think, must know that this step was the result of the diversity of political views, which attached the two parties in the cabinet to different divisions of the new parties which became apparent in the dissension between the president and vice president. This produced, in the then state of the cabinet, combinations in congress, calculated to defeat the most salutary measures of the administration. In the opposition which showed itself with regard to the Turkish negotiation, the members of the cabinet favorable to the new-born opposition, were expressly exempted in the denunciations of those members of the senate, who then came out and disclosed, for the first time, their hostility to the president and a part of his cabinet. That a wish to bring major Eaton and his family into society here, had no influence in producing the dissolution of the cabinet, is apparent from the fact that it operated to consign them and him to privacy. The want of the harmony essential to the public welfare, however originated, was pregnant with political effects, and produced this result.

You require of me to correct the error of my declaration, predicated on the information which colonel Johnson communicated to me, upon the ground that I have no authority to use the evidence which establishes the fact. The testimony which I have in my possession, under col. Johnson's hand, satisfies me thoroughly of the truth of the assertion I have made, and therefore, I will not admit it to be an error. Your exception to the use I have made of his testimony, may be applicable as a censure upon my course. But I consider, that circumstances fully justify that course, and I am only responsible to col. Johnson for my conduct in relation to his letter. Your objection to the authority under which I have acted as to col. Johnson's evidence does not, in the least, change the nature of that evidence. It is as convincing as it could be under full authority to use it, and probably more so than evidence purposely prepared for the public eye.

You seem to think that I am bound to publish, on my own account, the correspondence between major Eaton and yourself, because I have used a paragraph having exclusive reference to the president. I do not think so. I will have nothing to do with the controversy between maj. Eaton and yourself. You have a right to bring that subject before the public in any way you please, and on your own responsibility. I will not hesitate to print it, or any part you may choose to embody, in the discussion with me.

I closed my last note to you, by an intimation that it would conclude our correspondence. I did so because the issue between us depended altogether upon the verity of the statements I had made, contradicting assertions in the Telegraph, for which I did not know that you were responsible. When you volunteered to question my statements, I laid before you frankly the ground on which I acted; and then, in a second letter, brought to your view the proof on which, as to myself, I was willing to rest the issue. But as you seem inclined to make, through me, an attack on the president, and to use the correspondence on which you entered (certainly without being called for by any thing I said, as to yourself), as the medium of bringing on a general discussion of the question of the dissolution of the late cabinet, I shall certainly sacrifice my inclination to what you consider my duty. My reluctance to continue the correspondence with you, proceeds from no want of respect to you. But I believe the public is sick of the subject; is satisfied with the dissolution of the old cabinet, and the formation of the new one; and this induced the inclination I have evinced, to spare the country the disgust of the dissection of a subject, which it seems willing to bury. At all events, the progress we have made will be sufficient for one lecture. If you think fit, we will resume it again. Yours, &c.

F. P. BLAIR.

From the U. S. Telegraph of July 22.

Washington, 22d July, 1831.

SIR: The Globe of this morning contains a letter from Francis P. Blair, esq. its editor, the material allegations of which are said to be authorised by the president of the United States, and by col. Johnson. I had already said, as you will perceive in the same paper, that I had no such knowledge as this statement imputes to me—and it is with a view to contradict this my declaration, that the authority of the president of the United States has been invoked. It belongs to the American people to decide the issue which has been forced upon me, and unequal as the contest necessarily must be, I may not hesitate as to the course which duty demands.

My reply to the statement of the Globe cannot be prepared in time for your paper of this afternoon. I hope to be able to present it to the public in the morning. Meantime that it may not be supposed for a moment that I will submit silently to the imputations contained in that statement, I have to ask you to give this note a place in your paper of this afternoon.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

JN. MACPHERSON BERRIEN.

To the editor of the Telegraph.

MR. BERRIEN TO THE PUBLIC.

From the National Intelligencer of July 23.

Circumstances beyond my control have placed me under the necessity of presenting myself to your notice. I assert no claim to your attention, which does not belong equally to every free citizen of the republic. But I ask, and, I feel that I have a right to expect, your candid consideration of this address. Its subject is one of awakening interest to us all. The position in which I find myself has nothing inviting in it. It is one which I have not sought, but which has been forced upon me, and one in which I am called upon to vindicate not myself merely but the cause of truth, and the best and dearest interests of the community, at a hazard to which fatuity alone could be insensible.

The misrepresentations of a public journal, professing to speak the language of the president of the United States, and published under his eye, have presented to me the alternative, of submitting to an imputation, alike dishonorable and unfounded in fact, or of meeting the issue which has been tendered to me under the alleged authority of that high officer. If I do not shrink from this unequal strife, it is because I have a confidence which has never wavered, in the intelligence of my countrymen, a firm and unshaken reliance in the justice of that tribunal, whose high prerogative it is at all times, and under all circumstances, to vindicate the cause of truth.

I have studiously abstained from any effort to excite public feeling in relation to the dissolution of the late cabinet. I have felt that the question of its propriety was one, the decision of which belonged alone to the American people. Personally I have not been disposed to deny the right of the president to exercise his own free will, as well in the change, as in the original selection of his cabinet; and with a perfect sense of the delicacy of my own situation, I would have been at all times a reluctant witness in the investigation of the causes which led to the recent events. It was not however enough that I should submit myself to his will, although the principle by which it was avowedly regulated, could have no application to me; for this I have unhesitatingly done. But I have been required silently to witness the entire misrepresentation of occurrences which the public were well aware must have come under my observation; nay, to be publicly vouched as authority for that which was directly in conflict with my convictions of truth—and finally to be called to vindicate my own claim to veracity, assailed as it is under the alleged authority of the president of the United States, or to submit to an imputation which no honorable man may bear. I mistake the character of the American people, if they would require this. I am totally ignorant of my own, if, under any circumstances, I could yield to it. If, in the face of this great community, the cause of truth can be prostrated by the arm of power, at least the privilege of vindicating it, shall not be tamely surrendered in my person. I will bow to the decision of my countrymen—but whatever that decision may be, the high consolation of having faithfully discharged my duty to them, and to myself, shall not be taken from me.

The disingenuous and unmanly suggestion of my desire to remain in the cabinet of general Jackson, notwithstanding the occurrences which produced my retirement, will be my apology for adverting briefly to the origin of my connexion with it, and to the circumstances which induced its continuance.

It was without any solicitation on my part, or, so far as I know or believe, on the part of any of my friends, that I was invited to accept the office of attorney general of the United States. There were circumstances, temporary in their nature, but still strongly operative, which rendered it not desirable to me. I felt, however, that I was called to decide upon the question of my acceptance, not merely as an individual, but as a citizen, and especially as a citizen of Georgia. On certain principles of general policy, some of which were particularly interesting to the people of that state, the views communicated to me by the president, were in accordance with my own: and I felt it to be my duty, not to withhold any assistance which I could give to carry them into effect. The annunciation of the names of the intended cabinet seemed to me, however, to present an insuperable bar to my acceptance of the office which was tendered to me. I thought I foresaw clearly the evils which have too obviously resulted from this selection. A stranger to general Jackson, I could not with propriety discuss these objections with him. I knew, moreover, that some of his confidential friends had faithfully discharged their duty to him, and to the country, by a frank communication of them. In this state of things, I sought the counsel of those around me. To a gentleman high in the confidence of the president, and to a distinguished citizen of my own state, I submitted the inquiry, whether, with this view of the cabinet which the president had selected, I could with propriety become a member of it. The former expressed his decided conviction, founded on a long and intimate knowledge of the president's character, that he would himself speedily see, and correct the evil. The latter urged the peculiar relations of Georgia with the general government, as presenting a strong claim upon me not to refuse the invitation which had been given to me. I yielded to these suggestions, and took my place in the cabinet, with a firm determination to avoid the controversies which I feared might occur. To that determination I have steadily adhered. Associating on terms of courtesy with my colleagues, my official intercourse with them was never interrupted by discord.

If there were any combinations growing out of the supposed conflict between the interests of Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Van Buren, I had no part in them—and as little in the supposed measures of that character, having for their object to coerce major Eaton to retire from the cabinet—or to exclude his family from the society of Washington. With mine they did not associate; but no advance had been made on either side, and their actual relation seemed therefore to furnish no just ground of offence to either party. In this posture of things, and shortly after I had given an evening party to which Mrs. Eaton had not been invited, I received and heard with infinite surprise the message of col. Johnson.

I could make no mistake as to its character, for there was a direct and repeated reference to the large parties, which had been then recently given by Messrs. Branch and Ingham, and myself. Such a mistake, if it had been one, would have been instantly corrected, from the nature of my reply. If the complaint had been of a combination to evict major Eaton from office, and not to exclude his family from society, the reference to these evening parties would have been idle: and my declaration that I would not permit the president to control the local intercourse of myself and family, would have been instantly met by an explanation, which would have removed the impression from the minds of Messrs. Branch and Ingham, and myself. Yet we all parted with col. Johnson, with a clear conviction that such a proposition had been made, and feeling as we all did, that an indignity had been offered to us, there was, as I believe, no difference of opinion between us as to the course we ought to pursue, if this proposition should be avowed and pressed by the president.

This conversation took place on Wednesday evening, and the rumor of our intended removal speedily became general. On the succeeding day, the personal friends of general Jackson interposed, and he was awakened to a sense of the impropriety of his projected course. It was then, according to col. Johnson's statement to Mr. Ingham, that the paper spoken of by the editor of the Globe was prepared. My two colleagues had their interview with the president on the succeeding day, (Friday) and as Mr. Ingham's statement, made from full notes taken at the time, proves, no paper was shown to him on that occasion. Owing to a mistake in the communication of the president's wishes to me, I did not see him until the succeeding day, (Saturday), and then the excitement of his feelings had so entirely subsided, that he seemed to me to be anxious to dispose of the subject as briefly as possible. He spoke of the falsehood of the reports against Mrs. Eaton, of which he said he had sufficient proof; and upon my declining to discuss that question, he complained of the injustice of excluding her from society: referred to the large parties given by Messrs. Ingham and Branch, and myself, and told me if he could have been convinced that there was a combination between those gentlemen and myself to exclude her from society, that he would have required our resignations. He immediately added, that he was entirely satisfied that there had been no such combination, and again referred to those large parties, and to the rumors to which they had given rise, as having produced that impression. So far from then suggesting that information had been received from any member of congress, when I claimed the right of having the names of any persons who had made to him representations unfavorable to my conduct, he still referred to the thousand rumors which had reached him as the origin of such impression which had been made upon his mind. He showed me no paper—spoke to me of none—intimated to me no terms which he would hereafter require. By his declaration that he did not intend to press the requisition which he had made through col. Johnson, I considered the object of the interview to be to explain to me the motives under which he had acted, and to announce the change of his determination. He accompanied this with expressions of personal kindness, which I thought were intended to soothe the feelings which he must have been conscious of having excited. Still I thought it was improper for me longer to remain in the cabinet. Admitting that sufficient atonement had been made for the indignity offered by the message sent through col. Johnson, there was a perpetual liability to the recurrence of similar outrage. I believed it, therefore, to be my duty to retire. My friends thought otherwise, and my own sense of what the interests of Georgia at that particular crisis required, induced me to repress my feelings.

When at a subsequent period, the controversy occurred between the president and vice president, I thought I saw in this, the evidence of an intention again to agitate the question, which by the agency of the personal friends of gen. Jackson, had been before happily repressed. The connection of Mr. Crawford with this controversy, and my own relation to gen. Jackson, forbade me to take any part in it—and I studiously avoided all interference, except to deprecate Mr. Calhoun's publication. I left Washington on the fourth day of April, one day after major Eaton had announced to the president his determination to resign, according to the statement in his (maj. Eaton's) letter of resignation, and not the slightest intimation was given to me of the intended change in the cabinet. But when I saw the correspondence between the president and the several heads of departments, I could not doubt for a moment how, and by whom, the dissolution had been produced. I did not feel at liberty to express my views generally, until my return to Washington should enable me to dissolve my connection with the president; but to a few friends who had the right to understand my actual position, I stated the utter impossibility of my continuance in the cabinet, unless the president could place the retirement of my colleagues on other grounds than those which I believed to have occasioned it, and such as I could approve. In full view of the speedy dissolution of all connection between the president and myself, I availed myself of the occasion afforded by the kindness of my fellow citizens of Savannah, to do an act of justice to his public conduct, on a question vitally interesting to the people of Georgia. If there be any man who is incapable of understanding, or of appreciating the motive which prompted this act, I cannot envy his feelings, and will not attempt to enlighten his understanding. I returned to this city, had a conversation with the president, of which the prominent points are adverted to in my letter of resignation which immediately followed it, and having brought up the public business, which was in arrear, retired from office.

While these occurrences were in progress, major Eaton addressed to me a letter of like import with his first communication to Mr. Ingham. He called upon me to sanction or disavow the statement in the Telegraph, that my family had refused to associate with his. I answered by detailing the conversation which had passed between myself and col. Johnson, and stated that I had subsequently expressed the same views to the president, who had disclaimed any disposition to press this requisition, referring to that which I had previously stated to have been made through col. Johnson. The editor of the Globe has published this detached sentence of my letter, and has made an impotent attempt to distort its meaning. The public shall judge of the whole correspondence for themselves. I had no disposition to publish this correspondence. Perfectly satisfied that it would at all times speak for itself, and not emulous of reputation to be acquired in such controversies, I have resisted the numerous calls which have been made upon me through different journals to give it to the public. But the editor of the Globe is in possession of it, and by the publication of an isolated extract, attempts to do me injustice. I exercise a right, therefore, which belongs to me, when I take from him, this unfair means of annoyance, by giving the whole to the public.

Friday night, 17th June, 1831.

Sir: I have studied to disregard the abusive slanders which have arisen through so debased a source as the United States Telegraph. I have been content to wait for the full development of what he had to say, and until persons of responsible character should be brought forth to endorse his vile abuse of me, and of my family. In that paper of this evening is contained the following remark of my wife: "It is proven that the secretaries of the treasury and of the navy, and of the attorney general, refused to associate with her." This publication appears in a paper which professes to be friendly to you, and is brought forth under your immediate eye. I desire to know of you, whether or not you sanction this statement; or disavow it. The relation we have sustained towards each other authorises me to demand an immediate answer. Very respectfully, J. H. EATON.

John M. Berrien, esq.

Washington, 18th June, 1831.

Sir: I received to-day your note of last night, in which you call my attention to an article in the United States Telegraph of the 17th instant, relating to your wife—and desiring to know whether I will sanction or disavow that statement, you add, "the relation we have sustained towards each other, authorises me to demand an immediate answer."

To this inquiry preferred as matter of right, and presented in the form of a demand, my answer must be brief. It consists in the simple denial of the claim which you assert. I cannot recognise your right to interrogate me, concerning the statements of the Telegraph, or of any other public journal, which are made without my agency. You might with equal propriety select an article from any newspaper in the union, for the purpose of putting me to the question—and if the claim which you assert be well founded, I might be required at the instance of any person aggrieved to give my confession of faith, in relation to the various statements to be found in any of the journals, in which my name may chance to be mentioned. Such a demand, therefore, cannot be admitted for a moment. But although I cannot recognise your right, either as derived from the relation which we have sustained towards each other, or from any other source, to make the demand presented by your note, I am not quite sure, looking to the position in which we stand before the public, that I can acquit myself to the community or to myself for declining to answer your inquiry.

In the progress of those events which have at length resulted in the dissolution of the cabinet, my determination has been not to do any act which was calculated to provoke controversy, nor to deviate under whatever urgency from that line of conduct, which my own sense of propriety prescribed. Acting upon this determination, I have necessarily pursued a course, which a refusal to answer your inquiry, might seem to indicate an unwillingness to avow. Such an inference would be unjust as it regards myself, and delusive in relation to the public. Although, therefore, I have the most unaffected reluctance to enter upon such a subject, and certainly do not acquiesce in your right to demand it, it seems to me that you have by making the inquiry, imposed upon me the obligation to do so, from a just consideration of what I owe to myself and to the public. I have then to state to you, that up to the time of your marriage, I had not heard the rumors, which have since in various forms, been presented to the public, and was ignorant of Mrs. Eaton's relation to the society of this place. I accepted your invitation to be present at your wedding, therefore, with no distrust of the propriety of my doing so, other than that which resulted from my own situation at that period. You are yourself no doubt aware how much that event, and your subsequent introduction into the cabinet, made these rumors the subject of conversation. I could not longer continue in ignorance of that which was publicly and generally spoken of, and it consequently became necessary for me, embarrassed as the question was, by the official relation in which we stood to each other, to determine upon my future conduct. In doing this, it did not seem to me to be necessary, to decide upon the truth or falsehood of the statements which were made. It was sufficient to ascertain the general sense of the community of which I had recently become a member; and having done so, to conform to it. In the winter of 1830, as I presume is known to you, I was called upon by a gentleman, who represented himself as acting, and who I doubt not did act, under the authority of the president, to express with precise reference to this subject the regret which he felt at the want of harmony, or of social intercourse among the members of his cabinet, and to announce his determination at any rate to have it. Messrs. Ingham and Branch were present at this interview. The fact was distinctly stated that they and myself had successively given very large parties to which Mrs Eaton had not been invited. We were then told that on such occasions at least the president would expect in future a social intercourse between our respective families. There were various other suggestions made during this conversation, but the recapitulation of them is not rendered necessary by your inquiry. I answered this communication for myself, that I would not permit the president, nor any other individual to regulate the social intercourse of myself or family—and that if such requisition was persevered in, I would retire from the official situation which I held. In the interview to which I was invited by the president some few days afterwards, I frankly expressed to him my views on this subject, and he disclaimed any disposition to press such a requisition. I am not aware that any other occasion has occurred in which the question of an intercourse between your family and mine has been presented to me or to my family.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,
JOHN MACPHERSON BERRIEN.

To J. H. Eaton, esq.

Monday Morning, 8 o'clock.

Sir: I have received your note of the 18th inst. It may become necessary for me to offer something in reply. For the present I have engagements which prevent me from doing more than to acknowledge that it has been received. Very respectfully, 20th June, 1831. J. H. EATON.
Mr. Berrien.

June 22d, 1831.

Sir: I have not had leisure to reply to your letter of the 18th until to-day. It involved matter which it behoved me to give a full and calm consideration to. That has been given.

I felt indisposed to believe that these attacks of gen. Green could be authorised by you, or were made under your sanction. Your declaration is evidence of the correctness of what I was before impressed with. I take occasion, therefore, with pleasure, to acknowledge the frankness with which you have disavowed an agency in this nefarious business. Respectfully, your most obedient, J. H. EATON.

J. M. Berrien, esq.

Washington, 23d June, 1831.

Sir: Your note of yesterday was received in the course of the day. I was too much indisposed, however, to reply to it at the moment, and do so now merely to prevent misconception.

In your note of the 17th instant, you called upon me to sanction or disavow the statement contained in a publication of the Telegraph of that date. I could not recognise your right to make this demand, but for the reasons mentioned in my reply, I thought it was proper to state to you what I had done, in relation to this matter. To do this was the only object of that note.

You are quite right, however, in believing that I had no agency in procuring the publication of the statement referred to. And adverting to the spirit of your last note, I have no hesitation in thus confirming the conviction which you have expressed. I am, respectfully, JOHN MACPHERSON BERRIEN.

To J. H. Eaton, esq.

Shortly after this, I received a letter from col. Johnson, which with my reply, I feel myself bound now to give to the public. I have anxiously desired to delay this until I could receive col. Johnson's answer. Perhaps I have waited long enough; for my reply, according to the memorandum which I have of it, was dated on the 7th instant. But it is not this circumstance which has determined me. Col. Johnson has furnished to the editor of the Globe a statement full or otherwise, of what passed between Messrs. Branch and Ingham and myself and himself, on the occasion so often referred to. Extracts from this statement are used to do me injustice. This is done, to be sure, without the authority of col. Johnson, but he has furnished the means which are thus improperly used, and I have no alternative but to give the correspondence, or submit to continued misrepresentation. I publish col. Johnson's letter, as an act of justice to him, that the public may be in full possession of his statement. My reply follows; and after this the letter and statement of Mr. Ingham, to whom, as well as to Mr. Branch, I forwarded a copy of col. Johnson's letter. From Mr. Branch I have received no reply—owing, as I suppose, to his absence from home.

Col. R. M. Johnson to Messrs. Berrien and Ingham.

Great Crossing, 30th June, 1831.

Gentlemen: The Telegraph has alluded to some communication made to you by a member of congress, authorised by the president—the substance of which is, that the president wished to coerce a social intercourse between your families and Mrs. Eaton. I see the Globe denies it. I have thought it barely possible that the allusion could be made to me, because if I had ever communicated such an idea, I should have done the most palpable, gross, and wanton injustice to the president; for he disclaimed, on all occasions, any right, or desire, or intention, to regulate the private or social intercourse of his cabinet. The president had been induced to believe that a part of his cabinet had entered into a deep laid scheme to drive major Eaton from his cabinet, and of this he complained. I did not believe it, and, as the mutual friend of all concerned, I proposed that I should have the opportunity to converse with that portion of his cabinet before he had an interview with them, and he acquiesced—and the interview which I had with you, resulted, as I understood, in a better understanding, and in fact I considered it a reconciliation. Whatever came from me, upon the subject of a social intercourse, was the suggestions of my solicitude to restore harmony among friends. My object was peace and friendship. I have never considered myself at liberty to say any thing about this interview except to a discreet and confidential friend. I certainly should not think any of the parties justified in representing for publication or newspapers, what any of the other parties said, without submitting such statement for mutual examination; for the plain reason that such conversations are so easily misunderstood. I may well remember what I have said myself, but may not so easily represent what you have said, or intended to say. I have not myself seen the necessity or propriety of any allusion in newspapers, to our interview, which was among intimate and bosom friends, where the conversation was free and unreserved, and for the object of peace and friendship. But if any should consider it necessary, then the great object should be, to state the conversation correctly; for there can be no motive to misunderstand the facts. For fear that allusion should have been made to myself, as the member of congress, and believing it barely possible that I may have been misunderstood on the particular point alluded to, I have felt it my duty, and due to that perfect friendship which has ever existed between us, to make known these views, that the proper correction may be made, as a misunderstanding, without the necessity of any formal publication from either of us, and without even a disclosure as to what member of congress allusion was made. Sincerely and truly your friend, RICHARD M. JOHNSON.

Messrs. Ingham and Berrien, city of Washington.

The absence of gov. Branch has been the only cause why this letter was not also addressed to him.

Mr. Berrien to col. Johnson.

Washington, 7th July, 1831.

Dear sir: Yours of the 30th ult. addressed jointly to Mr. Ingham and myself has been duly received. I have noted your view of the occurrence to which it refers, with a perfect disposition to meet you in the spirit of frankness and of good feeling, which is expressed in your letter. It is an evidence of my reluctance to engage in controversy, that I have abstained from going before the public, notwithstanding the multiplied misrepresentations with which the newspapers are teeming. I still desire to avoid this necessity—but as circumstances beyond my control may render it indispensable, I acquiesce with the less reluctance, in the interchange of recollections which you propose.

I am to speak of what occurred at the interview which took place between you, Messrs. Branch and Ingham, and myself, at my house. You had, as I afterwards understood, held previous conversations on the same subject with one or both of those gentlemen, but I was perfectly unprepared for the interview, until the moment when you announced its object at my house. The impression made by your announciation was such as not to be easily effaced from my memory. You began by expressing the friendly regard which you felt for those gentlemen and myself, and by stating that this was the motive for your interference. You told us that an impression had been made upon the mind of the president that a combination existed between Messrs. Ingham, and Branch, and myself, to exclude Mrs. Eaton from the society of Washington—that he was excited by this representation, considering it as an attempt to wound him through major Eaton—that the president had seen with pain the want of harmony among the members of his cabinet—that he was determined to have harmony, and that his determination would be announced to us in the course of the week. You added that you had in the mean time sought this interview with the approbation of the president, from motives of regard for all parties. You mentioned, as circumstances which had contributed to produce this conviction on the mind of the president, that Messrs. Branch, and Ingham, and myself, had successively given large parties to which Mrs. E. had not been invited—and while you disclaimed any disposition on his part to require an intimacy between our families and that of maj. Eaton, you added, that he would in future expect that at least on such occasions as that to which you had referred, (that is to say, when large or general parties were given), that Mrs. E. should be invited. I replied to you that not having been previously advised of the intention to hold this interview—having had no conference with the other gentlemen, I must be considered solely responsible for what I was about to say. I then observed that I would not permit the president or any other man to regulate the social intercourse of myself or family—and that if such a requisition was persevered in, I would retire from office. You expressed your regret at the terms of this answer—and I remarked that it was indifferent to me in what terms it was conveyed, provided the substance was retained—but that from this I would not depart. I understood you to disclaim any intention on the part of the president to require an intimate intercourse between the families of Messrs. Branch, and Ingham, and myself, and that of major Eaton, but to express with equal clearness his expectation that when we gave large or general parties Mrs. E. should be invited—and it was my purpose to deny altogether his right to interfere in this matter. The replies of the other gentlemen were, according to my recollection, substantially the same—but I shall enclose copies of your letter to them, and leave them to speak for themselves.

The impression which this conversation made upon my mind is clear and distinct; and it is not probable that it could have been effaced from my memory. My own disposition was instantly to resign my office. In consenting to retain it, I yielded to the opinions of those in whose judgment I had confidence, and to my sense of what was due to the interests of Georgia, at that particular juncture.

My remembrance of this conversation is moreover confirmed by a recollection of what occurred on my subsequent interview with the president, in which a particular reference was made to it. When he spoke of a combination between Messrs. Ingham and Branch, and myself, to exclude Mrs. E. from society, I claimed, as matter of right, to know the names of the persons by whom such a representation had been made. He said the impression had been derived from the various rumors which had reached him; spoke of the parties which had been given by those gentlemen and myself, to which Mrs. E. had not been invited—and added that the reports against her were foul calumnies. I remonstrated against his having adopted an opinion dishonorable to any member of his cabinet on mere rumor, but expressly declined to discuss the question of the truth or falsehood of the reports to which he had referred—telling him, that, without undertaking to decide whether they were true or false, it was my purpose merely to conform to the general sense of the community of which I had become a member; and that I could not be induced to change that determination. The decision of the president not to pursue this matter further, I understood at the time to have been produced by the representations of some of his most intimate personal friends.

Such is my understanding of the conversation referred to in your letter. I look to it as the origin and continuing cause of the distraction of the party, which has thus lost the means of doing much good which it might have effected. But I am not desirous to bruit it to the world. If, without imputing to me the alleged want of harmony in the cabinet, my retirement is placed on the ground of the president's mere will, so far as I am concerned, it is well. I do not dispute his right to exercise that as he thinks fit; but, for the sake of my children, I will not submit to the continued misrepresentations of the public journals. The best legacy I have to bequeath them is the unstarnished reputation of their father. I can easily conceive, also, that a state of things may exist, in which a sense of duty to the public will compel me to speak. But I hope such an emergency will not arise.

I ought perhaps to add, that I have already stated to major Eaton the substance of this, so far as it was necessary to answer a call which he made upon me to avow or disavow the statement in the Telegraph, that my family had refused to associate with his. It was not necessary however, to mention your name, and it was consequently not mentioned. I spoke of the interview as having been had with "a gentleman who represented himself as acting, and who I doubt not did act under the authority of the president." Having now replied to your letter, I will only add, that, should our recollections differ, I shall regret it. But that I have taken great care not to put down any thing which is not distinctly impressed upon mine. I am, dear sir, respectfully, yours,

JOHN MACPHERSON BERRIEN.

Hon. R. M. Johnson.

Mr. Ingham to col. Johnson.

New Hope, July 13th, 1831.

Dear sir—I have received a copy of your letter of the 30th ult. to Mr. Berrien and myself, forwarded by him from Washington, relating to an allegation made in the newspapers, that gen. Jackson had required, through a member of congress, of Messrs. Branch, Berrien, and myself, that our families should associate with Mrs. Eaton. I had also noticed the publication in the Telegraph to which you refer, and another of the same import in a New York paper of an earlier date, and supposing it probable, in the existing state of the public mind, that the discussion would take such a range as to involve all the parties to that transaction in the necessity of making explanations, I had commenced the preparation of copies of a statement of the conversation which you have referred to; as well that between you and me, as that between gen. Jackson and myself on the same subject, intending, as soon as they could be completed, to send one to him and another to yourself. Upon the receipt of your letter, I immediately wrote you a note, expressing an intention to wait for the further comparison of our recollections before I made any determination as to the disposition of my statement. But two articles in the Globe of the 11th inst. which you have no doubt seen, reached me before my letter was mailed, and arrested its progress. These articles, as far as they relate to this subject, bear on their face the evidence of having been authorised by general Jackson and yourself, and leave me no choice as to the publication of my statement. The article which I supposed to have been authorised by you, shows that you have also taken a different view of this matter since your letter to me before referred to was written. I could not otherwise reconcile your remonstrance against a publication of what you then deemed a confidential conversation, with the authority alleged by the Globe to publish your denial of the statement alluded to; at least, without a previous interchange of recollections between all the parties concerned. I do not, however, concur with you in the opinion that there ever was any obligation of secrecy imposed on me, or those associated with me, to be implied from the friendly character of the conversation referred to. The communication made to me by you that my continuance in office would depend upon the consent of my family to visit Mrs. Eaton and invite her to their large parties, I considered at the time, though not so intended by you, as in its nature offensive. It could not, therefore, carry with it the confidential obligation which belongs to the usual intercourse of friendship. I regarded the proposition as wounding to my feelings, and had determined to resign my office even after you informed me that gen. Jackson had changed his ground, from which I was only dissuaded by the earnest remonstrances of the friends I consulted, who urged, among other considerations, that although my personal respect for the president ought be impaired, my services in the department were for the country, and while it was faithfully served, I could not be unfaithful to the administration. A proposition thus disposed of could be regarded as any thing rather than imposing an obligation of friendly confidence. But I find an additional reason for publication growing out of your letter; its apparent disagreement from my statement, and its admonitory suggestions could not fail, whenever the whole matter shall be brought out, which is inevitable in the present state of the public mind, to expose me to the imputation of having shrunk from doing what duty to my own character, if not to the country, seemed to demand. I cannot therefore accord in your desire that no publication shall be made, any more than I can in the views of the obligation of secrecy which you have suggested. I would prefer, however, to accompany the publication with that of your letter of the 30th ult. but not having received any intimation of your wishes on that subject, it will require some deliberation to determine what is most proper to be done in this particular. I can assure you that this determination will be exclusively governed by a desire to do what, under all circumstances, may appear most likely to meet your own wishes. I have now only to add that in making the statements of these conversations, I have relied not merely on the indelible impressions made on my memory, but on memoranda put on paper at the time. I have not the slightest recollection or any note of your having adverted to any fact or circumstance alleged by general Jackson or yourself, as evidence of unkind feeling for, much less hostility to, or a conspiracy against maj. Eaton on the part of Mr. Branch, Mr. Berrien, or myself, or of any want of harmony in the cabinet other than the simple and isolated fact, that our families did not visit Mrs. Eaton and invite her to their parties. Nor have I any note or recollection of any proposition made by you to me individually, or jointly with the other gentlemen, as a means of removing the alleged difficulties, other than that our families should visit Mrs. Eaton, and invite her to their large parties. I cannot but persuade myself that my statement will call to mind matters which may have escaped your recollection, and satisfy your judgment that, whatever may have been the nature of your instructions I could not have understood them differently from what I have. I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. D. INGHAM.

Mr. Ingham's statement, a copy of which was enclosed in his letter to col. Johnson.

On Wednesday, the 27th of January, 1831, col. Johnson of Kentucky, waited on me in the treasury department, and after some preliminary conversation, in which he expressed his great regret that my family, and that of Mr. Branch and Mr. Berrien, did not visit Mrs. Eaton, he said that it had been a subject of great excitement with the president, who had come to the determination of having harmony in his cabinet by some accommodation of this matter. He, col. Johnson, was the friend of us all, and had now come at the request of the president to see whether any thing could be done: who thought that when our ladies gave parties they ought to invite Mrs. Eaton, and as they had never returned her call, if they would leave the first card, and open a formal intercourse in that way, the president would be satisfied, but unless something was done of this nature, he had no doubt, indeed he knew, that the president was resolved to have harmony, and would probably remove Mr. Branch, Mr. Berrien, and myself. I replied to col. Johnson, that in all matters of official business, or having any connection therewith, I considered myself bound to maintain an open, frank, and harmonious intercourse with the gentlemen I was associated with. That the president had a right to expect the exertion of my best faculties, and the employment of my time, in the public service. As to the family of Mr. Eaton, I felt an obligation on me not to say any thing to aggravate the difficulties which he labored under, but to observe total silence and neutrality in relation to the reports about his wife, and to inculcate the same course as to my family, and if any other representations had been made to the president they were false. Having prescribed to myself this rule, and always acted upon it, I had done all that the president had a right to expect. That the society of Washington was liberally organised; there was but one circle, into which every person of respectable character disposed to be social was readily admitted, without reference to the circumstance of birth, fortune, or station which operated in many other places. That we had no right to exert official power to regulate its social intercourse. That Mrs. Eaton had never been received by the society here, and it did not become us to force her upon it; that my family had therefore not associated with her, and they had done so with my approbation, and that the president ought not, for the sake of his own character, to interfere in such matters. But if he chose to exert his power to force my family to visit any body they did not choose to visit, he was interfering with that which belonged to me, and no human power should regulate the social intercourse of my family, by means of official or any other power which I could resist. If I could submit to such control I should be unworthy of my station, and would despise myself. That it was eminently due to the character of the president to have it known that he did not interfere in such matters, and that the course we had pursued was preservative of his honor and political standing. I had taken my ground on mature reflection, as to what was due to my family, to my friends, and to the administration, without any prejudice against major Eaton or his wife, and had fully determined not to change it, whatever might be the consequence.

Col. J. said that he had been requested by the president to have a conversation with the secretary of the navy and the attorney general also; but, from what I had said, he supposed it would be of no avail. The president had expressed a hope that our families would have been willing to invite Mrs. Eaton to their large parties, to give the appearance of an ostensible intercourse, adding that he was so much excited that he was like a roaring lion. He had heard that the lady of a foreign minister had joined in the conspiracy against Mrs. Eaton, and he had sworn that he would send her and her husband home if he could not put an end to such doings. I replied, that it could hardly be possible that the president contemplated such a step. Col. J. replied, that he certainly did; and again remarked that it seemed to be useless for him to see Mr. Branch and Mr. Berrien. I told him that each of us had taken our course, upon our own views of propriety, without concert; and that he ought not to consider me as answering for any but myself. He then proposed that I should meet him at Mr. Branch's, and invite Mr Berrien that evening at 7 o'clock; which was agreed to. Col. J. came to my house about 6, and we went up to Mr. Berrien's, having first sent for Mr. Branch. On our way to Mr. Berrien's, Col. J. remarked that the president had informed him that he would invite Mr. Branch, Mr. Berrien and myself, to meet him on the next Friday, when he would inform us, in the presence of Dr. Ely, of his determination; and if we did not agree to comply with his wishes, he would expect us to send in our resignations. Upon our arrival at Mr. Berrien's col. J. renewed the subject in presence of him and gov. Branch, and repeated substantially, though, I thought rather more qualifiedly, what he had said to me. He did not go so much into detail, nor do I recollect whether he mentioned the president's remarks as to the lady above mentioned and Dr. Ely—those gentlemen will better recollect. Mr. Branch and Mr. Berrien replied, as unequivocally as I had done, that they would never consent to have the social relations of their families controlled by any power whatever but their own. Mr. Branch, Mr. Berrien and myself, went the same evening to a party at col. Towson's, where a report was current that we were to be removed forthwith, of which I had no, doubt at the time. The next morning, col. J. came to my house and said that he ought perhaps to have been more frank last evening, and told us positively that the president had finally determined on our removal from office, unless we agreed at once that our families should visit Mrs. Eaton, and invite her to their large parties; and that he had made up his mind to designate Mr. Dickins to take charge of the treasury department, and Mr. Kendall to take charge of the navy department, and would find an attorney general somewhere. I observed that my course was fixed, and could not be changed for all the offices in the president's gift; and it made no more difference to me than to any other person whom the president designated to take my place. In the evening of the same day, colonel J. called again, and informed me that he had just been with the president, who had drawn up a paper explanatory of what he had intended and expected of us; that some of his Tennessee friends had been with him for several hours: that his passion had subsided, and he had entirely changed his ground: He would not insist on our families visiting Mrs. Eaton; he only wished us to assist in putting down the slanders against her; that he believed her innocent, and he thought our families ought to do what they could to sustain her, if they could not visit her; and that he wished to see me the next day. Colonel J. added that the president had been exceedingly excited for several days, but was now perfectly calm and mild. The next day I waited on the president, and opened the subject by stating that colonel Johnson had informed me that he wished to see me; to which he assented, and went into a long argument to show how innocent a woman Mrs. Eaton was, and how much she had been persecuted, and mentioned the names of a number of ladies who had been active in this persecution, and that the lady of a foreign minister was also one of the conspirators; adding that he would send her and her husband home, and teach him and his master that the wife of a member of his cabinet was not to be thus treated; that Mrs. E. was as pure and chaste as Mrs. Donelson's infant daughter, but there was a combinaton here among a number of ladies, not those of the heads of departments, to drive her out of society; and to drive her husband out of office; but he would be cut into inch pieces on the rack, before he would suffer him or his wife to be injured by their vile calumnies; that he was resolved to have harmony in his cabinet, and he wished us to join in putting down the slanders against Mrs. Eaton. I observed to the president, that I had never considered it incumbent on me to investigate the character of Mrs. Eaton; such a service did not, in my judgment, come within the scope of my duties to the government; it belonged to society alone to determine such matters. The power of the administration could not change the opinion of the community, even if it could be properly used to control the relations of domestic life in any case. The society of Washington must be the best judges of whom it ought to receive. I regretted the difficulties which major Eaton labored under, and had felt it to be my duty not to aggravate them. I had intended at an early day to have had a conversation with him on the subject, with a view to have our social relations defined, but no opportunity had offered, without volunteering one, and it had not been done in that way. The course I had taken was, however, adopted with great care, to save his feelings as much as possible, consistently with what was due to my family, and the community with which we were associated. I considered the charge of my family to be a sacred trust, belonging exclusively to myself, as a member of society. The administration had nothing to do with it, more than with that of any other individual, and political power could not be properly exerted over their social intercourse, and it was important to his reputation to have it understood that he did not interfere in such matters. That I was not aware of any want of harmony in the cabinet; I had not seen the slightest symptom of such a feeling in its deliberations, and I was perfectly certain that my official conduct had never been influenced in the slightest degree by a feeling of that nature. I saw no ground, therefore, for the least change on my part in this respect. To which the president replied, in a changed tone, that he had the most entire confidence in my integrity and capacity in executing the duties of the department, and expressed his perfect satisfaction, in that respect, with my whole conduct; he had never supposed for a moment that my official acts had been influenced in the least degree by any unkind feelings towards major Eaton; and he did not mean to insist on our families visiting Mrs. Eaton: He had been much excited for some time past, by the combination against her, and he wished us to aid him in putting down their slanders, adding that she was excluded from most of the invitations to parties; and, when invited, she was insulted; and that the lady of a foreign minister before referred to had insulted her at baron Krudener's party. I remarked, that some injustice might be done to that lady on that occasion; although she might not choose to associate with Mrs. Eaton, I did not think she intended to insult her, she might have supposed that there was some design, not altogether respectful to herself, in the offer of the attendance to supper of the secretary of war, whose wife she did not visit, instead of that of the secretary of state, which, according to the usual practice she probably considered herself entitled to. I was present, and saw most of what had happened. She evidently thought herself aggrieved at something, but acted with much dignity on the occasion. I saw no appearance of insult offered to Mrs. Eaton. He replied that he had been fully informed, and knew all about it; and but for certan reasons which he mentioned, he would have sent the foreign minister before refered to, and his wife, home immediately. After some further conversation on this and other matters, in which I considered the president as having entirely waived the demand made through col. Johnson, that my family must visit Mrs. Eaton, as the condition for my remaining in office, and in which he expressed himself in terms of personal kindness towards me, I took my leave. He did not show me, or read any paper on the subject.

The public will now, I think, be at no loss to determine upon the true state of the facts of this case. Mr. Ingham's very full statement is taken from notes made at the time, and which were shown to me shortly after they were made. In repeated conversations with Mr. Branch, our recollections were found to concur. The transaction was of a nature calculated to awaken all my attention, and to impress itself indelibly upon my memory. I claim no benefit, therefore, from any supposed imperfection of this faculty, and expect to be believed, because I speak the truth.

In relation to the statement that the paper drawn up in the hand-writing of the president was shown to me, the denial of which I most explicitly repeat, if charity is to perform her holy office in reconciling these conflicting assertions, it is much more easy to believe that the memory of the president may have failed on this occasion. He saw and conversed with various persons on this subject, and has to rely upon his memory for the fact of having shown this paper to different individuals. Each of those individuals is required only to speak for himself." The nature of the transaction was such that it could not have escaped the recollection of either of them.

It was impossible if such a paper had been shewn, not to have demanded, and to have persevered in the demand to have the names of the persons, on whose information the requisition was made. No one would have consented to have the conditions on which he should continue in office prescribed to him, on the ground of a combination, the evidence of which rested on mere rumor. An inquiry must have been the consequence, and the transaction could not only not have been forgotten by the parties, but would thus have become known to others. I would not myself have retained my office a moment after such a paper was exhibited to me. I will not question the intention of the president to have shewn this paper to me, nor his belief that he did so; but that he did not do so, is certain. Those who know me will not doubt the sincerity of this declaration, and an impartial community will, I trust, perceive no sufficient motive to be deduced, either from my character, or the circumstances of this transaction, for the belief of intentional misrepresentation on my part.

At any rate, I have discharged my duty, by bearing this testimony to the truth. I know to what it subjects me; but I rely upon the discernment and the integrity of my countrymen, and will abide the result.

Washington, 23d July, 1831.

SIR: In my communication to the public, which appeared in the National Intelligencer of this morning, I mentioned that I had not yet heard from Mr. Branch, to whom I had forwarded a copy of col. Johnson's letter. I have now to state that, by the mail of this morning I received a letter from Mr. Branch, dated the 20th instant, in which he says:

"You can very well imagine my surprise, on reading the colonel's [Johnson's] letter, from what you yourself experienced. My recollections of the interview will most abundantly corroborate all that you have said."

I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

JN. MACPHERSON BERRIEN.

To the editor of the Telegraph.

☞ In placing the following brief remarks of the editor of the "Globe" in opposition to the statements of Messrs. Berrien, Ingham and Branch—if error exists, it is against the gentlemen named: but we shall not further give room to Mr. Blair's publications, in reply to statements authenticated by substantial names—unless he speaks "by authority," and in or through the names of gentlemen of sufficient grade. It is not to be presumed that three members of the late "cabinet," referring to things which happened to themselves, should enter into a controversy with the editor of the Globe, recently arrived at Washington, under peculiar circumstances, and who cannot be presumed to know any thing of the facts, except at second-hand. This proceeding is according to a rule adopted at the commencement of this work, nearly twenty years ago, and it is right that it should be adhered to. Col. Johnson's reply, of course, will appear when received—so shall any statement which the president may make, or authorise to be made, or that of any other respectable and responsible person cognizant of the facts in question, and without comment, as our custom is: but the speculations of the editor of the Globe must remain in their own rank. What that rank is, may be easily determined by his catching at a slip of the pen, or a misprint, in the "National Intelligencer," as to the year in which Mr. Ingham states that col. Johnson called on him.* The year was established correctly by Mr. Berrien, and so fixed by circumstances in Mr. Ingham's statement, that it could not be doubted—besides, it was corrected in the "Telegraph" of Saturday evening, and yet fastened upon by the "Globe" of Monday! And was the editor of that paper ignorant why the parties "slept" over the circumstances "for more than 18 months," seeing that Mr. Berrien had said in his letter of the 18th June to Mr. Eaton, that the "president had disclaimed any disposition to press the requisition" of col. Johnson? But we shall not enter into this controversy—in giving place to these remarks of the editor of the Globe, we have felt it proper to make these explanations as

EDITOR OF THE REGISTER.

From the Globe of Monday, July 25.

"We lay before our readers to-day, Mr. Berrien's address to the public. We will review it deliberately, and show from a mass of circumstances, in addition to col. Johnson's positive testimony, that the charge which Messrs. Berrien, Branch and Ingham now urge against the president, is utterly unfounded. We will show from its contradiction of a well known fact, susceptible of the clearest proof, that Mr. Ingham's statement is essentially incorrect: and that notwithstanding Messrs. Berrien, Branch and Ingham, the interested parties, who make this evidence, unite in saying that it is taken from notes made at the time by Mr. Ingham—and that in their "repeated conversations," they concurred in its details—yet that it furnishes in itself a clue from which we will prove it is not a true record. We will show, moreover, that it stands contradicted, not only by the impartial witness, who communicated between the president and these parties, but also by the knowledge of all those near the president, and acquainted with his views.

"There is one thing somewhat remarkable in relation to this transaction, to which we would call public attention. It is, that these parties should have slept over circumstances of such "awakening interest to the American people," for more than 18 months!! May not the inclination to conceal this long delay in doing public justice, have prompted Mr. Ingham to give his record the date of 27th January, 1831, when, it as Mr. Berrien says, "these notes were taken at the time," and shown to him shortly after, the date would have been January, 1830."

Miscellanies.

Some of the citizens of Washington invited major Eaton to a public dinner, which he declined, as will be seen by the following answer.

Washington city, 12th July, 1831.

Gentlemen: For the polite invitation to a public dinner, which you have presented to me, in behalf of "a number of the citizens of Washington, without distinction of party," I beg leave to tender my sincere thanks. The spirit and kindness of the communication demand of me this acknowledgement.

No man can be regardless of public sentiment: it wisely regulates human action; and is gratifying or painful, as it is favorably or otherwise bestowed. But confidence and kindness, however manifested by strangers, become more endearing when they proceed from those who have long been acquainted with him to whom they are offered. For thirteen years past, official duties have called me to act before those in whose behalf the civility you tender is made; and to them my conduct and actions in life, must show whatever of merit or demerit I may lay claim to. Hence additional gratification is derived from the friendly character of your invitation: and, under such circumstances, a testimonial so flattering is the more acceptable. Few of us, in this life, are without difficulties and trials: mine have been severe. Yet I have consolation in the belief, "that the greatest friend of truth is time—her greatest enemy, prejudice—and her constant companion, humility."

Recent circumstances have placed me, most reluctantly, in noisy strife before the public: to the unnecessary excitement which it has occasioned, I wish to contribute nothing. Reposing in private life, my desire is, to see the public mind at rest, rather than by any course of mine to disturb it;— to quiet angry feelings, and by no participation, to afford any new impulse to farther misrepresentations. At a time, like the present, when political designs interpose a dark and misty medium to every vision, and when the ties of former friendships are rudely rent asunder, I cannot shut my eyes to the admonitions afforded, which urged me to prefer retirement, so congenial to my feelings, rather than by accepting the civility of friends, to be placed in a situation where my actions and their motives might be misconceived, and misrepresented. Besides these considerations, of themselves sufficiently weighty, my every moment must necessarily be employed in preparations for my departure home.

For these reasons, gentlemen, I feel constrained to decline the honor you intended; and to acknowledge the obligation you have placed me under—duly appreciating the kind, the generous impulse which dictated the proffered civility. Rest assured, that in my retirement to a peaceful home, where motive will be wanting to disturb me, I shall ever remember this prominent mark of your kindness, and with feelings of gratitude, cherish its recollection.

For yourselves, individually, and those whom you represent, I beg you to receive the respectful consideration of your fellow citizen, J. H. EATON.

MR. BRANCH.

From the Roanoke Advocate.

Windsor, July 12, 1831.

Dear sir: From information communicated to me by my friends, as well in this, as in other counties of the district, that it is in your power to relate circumstances connected with your late official station, which would convince me of the propriety of your course, and that great injustice had been done you; and as I have repeatedly stated to my friends, that when these facts were made to appear, that I would no longer be your opponent: I now, sir, frankly make the same declaration to you. I do this from no motive of a personal kind whatever. From no fear of a defeat in my election, but from an imperious sense of duty, which I owe to justice, the honor and to the interest of my state. If you have been treated with harshness, unkindness or injustice, no matter by whom, I hold it to be the bounden duty of every citizen of this state, fearlessly to sustain you. The circumstances which may be within your knowledge to establish this fact, you have only to relate to the satisfaction of a certain number of my friends selected from each county in this district. And I take this occasion to say, that I am no longer a candidate, and that I have always entertained a high admiration of your character as a man and a politician. I know, sir, that I have personal and political enemies that would be gratified at any misfortune that might befal me, political or otherwise, but I hope and believe that you have no sympathy with them. With high consideration, yours respectfully,

J. A. BYNUM.

REPLY.

Windsor, July 12, 1831.

Dear sir: I have received your letter of this date, and can truly say, in reply, that I believe myself to have been unkindly treated in the transactions alluded to. I have no disposition to dilate on my wrong before the American people: but misunderstood, as I have been, my conduct censured and my motives impeached, I hold myself at liberty to give such explanations as my friends may require. I cheerfully accede to your proposition and will meet your friends, at any time and place they may select. I have to thank you, sir, for the magnanimity of your course, and do assure you, that there is no feeling in my bosom that responds in unison with the passions of your enemies. With much respect, I am yours, &c. JOHN BRANCH.

J. A. Bynum, esq.

Halifax county, July 17th, 1831.

In pursuance to the above correspondence, Mr. Bynum called upon the undersigned persons, his political friends, to hear a statement of facts from the hon. John Branch, relative to his late connexion with the administration of the general government. After an attentive hearing and dispassionate consideration, we unanimously and unhesitatingly say; from the facts disclosed, we believe gov. Branch to have been treated with injustice: we believe the governor, not only to have discharged the duties of his late office with ability and fidelity, but also believe, that in all his relations with the citizens of Washington, that his conduct strictly conformed to the rules of honor and propriety. We, with the governor, believe, from the facts disclosed to us, that our venerable president, although, like other men, not exempt from the frailties of human nature, has done nothing in this matter that cannot be forgiven; done nothing for which we should abandon him; done nothing improper which did not result from his peculiar situation. From the facts disclosed, we feel it to be our duty to say, in our opinion, the governor merits the continued confidence of this state, and particularly at this time, that of the citizens of this district.

We find the following curious advertisement in the Lexington Reporter:

I think it due to justice and truth, to publish a pamphlet, consisting of general Jackson's correspondence with me, which induced me to write and publish as many phamphlets to promote his election to the presidency, as required the appropriation of a great deal of time, upwards of 10,000 dollars in money, besides one hundred dollars given to Amos Kendall as advance, to induce him to desert Henry Clay, and to espouse the cause and service of general Jackson—upon which occasion he assumed and claimed the authorship of the pamphlets written by me, under the signature of Philo-Jackson, and now when I am inclined to make an expose of those publications, I am treated with injustice, ingratitude, and calumny by his adherents, when he and they know, that I have not the pecuniary means to render the public justice, which I desire.

The pamphlet will contain about 50 pages, and will be offered for sale at fifty cents. All who may incline to give the desired aid, may call on me and enable me to perform this honorable devotion to duty.

The pamphlet will amuse and instruct them, and show how a man of virtuous intentions may be duped.

HENRY BANKS, of Virginia.

June, 28, 1831.

From the Philadelphia Sentinel, of July 25.

Late Pennsylvania "official!"

With feelings of no ordinary mortification we submit to our readers the correspondence between the late distinguished and respectable attorney general and Francis P. Blair, the locum tenens of Amos Kendall in the editorial chair of that coarse, vulgar, scurrilous journal, the "Globe." More concentrated impudence we have never witnessed in the same space, than is contained in Blair's portion of it. The conclusion of his first letter, in which further correspondence with Mr. Berrien is declined, in an apish imitation of the termination of general Jackson's with Mr. Calhoun:—but what might be admissible as between such men, is the very apex of presumption, when assumed by a hireling, retained as the ostensible editor of a pensioned press, towards such a man as the learned, dignified, courteous, and honorable John McPherson Berrien, of Georgia. The sneers of the last letter contain the very essence of malignity:—but it requires no gloss, and the repulsive and odious task of touching it is not necessary. This single comment perhaps is sufficient. Francis P. Blair, the author of this insolence, is a renegade from the ranks of the coalition; one of those Kentuckians who knew, approved and applauded the "bargain," and contributed to its consummation by influencing his immediate representative Mr. White, to vote for John Quincy Adams, and against Andrew Jackson:—John McPherson Berrien of Georgia, against whom it is directed, is one of the most distinguished citizens of the south, both for pure moral deportment and splendid intellectual faculties. During the ascendancy of the coalition, he represented the state of Georgia in the senate of the United States, where he manifested a warmth of devotion to the republican principles on which gen. Jackson was supported, and a brilliancy of intellect in maintaining them, which induced the president to call him into his cabinet. How he demeaned himself in his department, the nation and the president have borne ample testimony. Every true friend of the president we think will unite with us in the ardent hope that this affair will satisfy him that the deepest and dearest interests of the republican party, present and future, require that he should disentangle himself from such men as Blair and Kendall, promptly and forever.

POLITICAL SCRAPS.

The South Carolina "Telescope" sometime since, had a labored article to show that Mr. Madison has survived his capacity of being useful!—The writer had the impudence to preface his essay with the following well known couplet from Pope:—

> From Marlborough's eyes the tears of dotage flow,
> And Swift expires a driveller and a show!

And Mr. Ritchie, in his paper of the 22d instant, has "seen with regret" the late letter of the father of the constitution, concerning the bank of the United States! Alack a-day!

The New York Courier and Enquirer, a few months ago, had the following respectful paragraph:

"That every state in the union has a deep regard, an unfeigned veneration for Virginia, all will freely and cheerfully admit. Good old Virginia, the land of great spirits gone to better worlds! but the aristocracy of that democratic state are becoming troublesome—thrusting their long line of ancestry continually in your face, talking of their state as the "republic," "a bold and fearful race," &c. &c. as if there was no other state throughout this confederacy. It is amusing and yet provoking to see the old tinsel—the thread bare laced ruffles—and pink'd heel shoes of the "ancien regime," elbowing every body aside to take the lead, and such men as Tazewell and Tyler enveloping themselves in the mantles of Washington, Jefferson and Madison—strutting through the senate and crying make way for the "republic" of Virginia—make way for Hamlet the Dane. Every Virginian of independent and manly bearing must flout such empty pretenders, such impudent inflated efforts to bring their state into disrepute. But Mr. Tyler has said no one finds fault with himself or colleague; they, it is imagined are unaccountable agents;—have a right to oppose Adams to day, support Jackson to-morrow, flatter Clay the next day, and finally charge the president with committing "lawless acts;" they presume, to think that they can take any protean shape they please, support or oppose any party, break down the democracy of the country and join Webster and the tariff men, and because they were born in the "republic of Virginia no fault is to be found with them!"

The same paper noticing a report that the Virginia members of congress had seceded from general Jackson, said:

"Virginia will set matters right; or if she don't it is no matter—we can get along without her."

Again—from the same: In the whole of this Turkish affair, one of the most suspicious points is the fact, that Mr. Tazewell never opened his mouth on the illegality of the commission while the treaty was under consideration in the senate, but no sooner had Duff Green been elected printer, than we find both he and Mr. Tyler taking open ground against the administration. Was this silence assumed merely to deceive the friends of Andrew Jackson, and cheat them into the re-election of Duff Green? If it be so, it is a specimen of shallow cunning, utterly at variance with the high character to which Mr. Tazewell sets up studied pretensions."

The National Gazette speaking of the late doings at Washington, and the correspondence to which they gave birth, says:—

Altogether, these are singular productions, and we may say, after the person in the upper window of the ark in the Dutch picture of the deluge—"Hazy weather, Master Noah."

In the Philadelphia Gazette of Wednesday, September 26, 1827, was the following prediction:—

"It is one part of the business of a good statesman to find a proper place for every body. Jackson will in this respect, shew himself superior to any president we have had since the days of Washington. In strong natural sagacity he is unmatched by any man in the country, and he will surround himself with a cabinet composed of the first men in the nation."

The Philadelphia Sentinel is pressing major Lewis, the 2d auditor at Washington, very closely, as to the certain arrangements charged as being made between him and the editor of the Philadelphia Inquirer.

TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES.

On the next presidential election.

[From the U. S. (Philadelphia) Gazette.]

The subscribers, ORIGINAL SUPPORTERS OF ANDREW JACKSON to the presidency of the United States, deeply and solemnly impressed with the importance of preserving great fundamental principles of liberty, free from violation—as well as of maintaining entire and unblemished their own integrity—and of redeeming to the people the faith they pledged for the fulfilment of the professions, made when they selected him as a candidate, for the purpose of accomplishing great national reforms, and of establishing salutary practices of pure republican government—deeming the period now arrived, when the public expect, and the crisis demands, a declaration of their opinions in respect to their future course, and a redemption of their pledges made in time past—do here represent and declare:—

That at the presidential elections of 1824 and 1828, they gave the preference to Andrew Jackson, because they had sufficient reason to believe him identified with CERTAIN PRINCIPLES, professed by him, which the abuses of faction, and the inroads of ambition, were rapidly sweeping into total oblivion:—which principles were obviously essential to the preservation of popular rights—the duration of this happy republic, and the continuance of our inestimable UNION. They look'd to the man only as the means of giving a lasting establishment to those principles:—his public services having inspired a confidence in his rectitude, that he would faithfully fulfil the great object of his election. A blind devotion to his will, as a chief; or an implicit acquiescence in his opinions, as those of an infallible master—were tenets never comprehended in our democratic creed. Although faithful to his country, yet we never believed him to be exalted above the erring faculties of a mortal, however confidently we cherished the conviction, that he never would prove faithless and derelict to his pledges and professions. In the wreath of glory that entwined his brows as a victor, we thought we beheld a sure guarantee for the consummation of his principles as a statesman. Without thinking him splendidly endowed, we had reason to believe him inflexibly honest; a trait in his character, that on all occasions was the theme of his exultation, and the subject of his pride. If, on this point, experience has proved us to have been too credulous, or too confiding—the fault in us is as much allied to virtue, as the failure on his part is alien to it. Still, respect for his services to his country, in the field, inspires us with clemency in our reproaches for his errors in the cabinet. We are willing to believe that his head, rather than his heart, has been in fault; and that age, increasing the infirmities of a fragile constitution has contributed to frustrate expectations which a more vigorous period of life might have fulfilled; notwithstanding the arduous nature of the task, which he was called to discharge—more peculiarly arduous to him, because destitute of that experience in government, and unaccustomed to those deep habits of thought and study, which alone qualify the statesman to shine, or the patriot to triumph; a fact which, while it mitigates censure, at the same time pleads in behalf of his country, for his timely retirement to the shades of private life. For what mind, however great by nature, can resist the ruinous inroads of time; and what man, who has acquired glory and renown, in the summer of his life, would consent to become a spectacle for compassion, by a public exhibition of the follies and weakness of age; detracting from his just fame, and unconsciously inflicting the most serious wounds upon his country.

When we selected general Jackson for our candidate, indifferent to every thing but principle; and determined to peril all minor considerations for a great public blessing—we announced to him our principles, and he fully reciprocated our views, elucidating their utility, and often adding embellishments to their charms. He avowed, professed, and confirmed all, and more than all that we required. Rather ultra than deficient in the doctrines of liberty, we were left to expect from him too much, than to distrust him of too little—thus verifying the old remark, that those who are the most zealous in preaching, are apt to be the most lax and culpable in practice.

The principles common to general Jackson and his early supporters may be embraced under the following heads:—

1. To establish the precedent of one PRESIDENTIAL term of four years.

2. To make no appointment of MEMBERS OF CONGRESS; so as to preserve the integrity of the legislature, from the corruption of the executive power and patronage.

3. To protect AMERICAN INDUSTRY by an adequate TARIFF.

4. To promote INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

5. To establish the principle of ROTATION IN OFFICE.

The consent of general Jackson to become a candidate for the second term, has violated his solemn and repeated pledge to his party, that he would serve but four years and thus establish a salutary precedent, which would apply the axe to the very root of political corruption. Nothing could have been more emphatic and solemn, than his declarations on this point; and nothing more ardent and zealous than our attestations of its importance. Experience had sadly shewn, to what dangerous corruptions and abuse of the executive patronage, a desire for re-election had often carried the most well-meaning of our chief magistrates—a re-election, in which the great body of the people took no active part; a re-election supported chiefly from mercenary motives, by a paid band of rapacious office-holders—clamorous for the continuance of their pay—audacious in their deportment—insulting to the people—and reckless of the consequences of their cupidity. Experience had also proved that it not only warped the integrity of the president, but destroyed his independence, impaired his vigor, and distracted his attention; his solicitude being directed from his country to himself—and the public interest sacrificed to personal ambition. It was found even to contaminate our morals and corrupt the public press; the eagerness of the incumbent to secure his renewed lease of power, leading him to acts from which the patriot would revolt, as criminal and unjust; as fatal to the rights and destructive to the liberty of the citizen. How shall we express our astonishment and grief, that Andrew Jackson should have brought himself within the possible sphere of such evils? But we must supersede our admiration, by declaring our determination not to sustain him in a course so baneful to his country, and so blighting to the lustre of his own glory.

The APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS has been the prolific source of the most dangerous collusion between the legislative and executive branches of government. It holds out the lure of office to the representatives of the people, enticing them to a dereliction of their duty; and rewards the pliant tool of executive pleasure, who may betray his country, or violate his oath. The constitution itself, has attempted by an express provision, to guard against this impure collusion of the two separate branches of government, where it declares—section 6, "that no member of congress shall be appointed to any office which was created, or the emoluments whereof were augmented, during the term for which he was elected." We recite the article to show, that the spirit of this constitutional exclusion, clearly extends to the inhibition of all appointments from the members of congress. Even on the supposition that no direct possible corruption existed, in such an application of executive patronage; still the undue influence which it must exercise over congress, cannot but ultimately lead to consequences as pernicious as the most open and high handed corruption. The mere fact of being ELIGIBLE to HONORS and REWARDS from the executive, is sufficient to make our representatives pliable instruments of power, instead of inflexible champions of freedom, and faithful agents to their constituents. The saying of Walpole, that every man has his price, expresses a fallible trait of the human character that ought to construct every possible barrier against temptation. When even a patriot like Andrew Jackson can forego his purposes, and renounce his resolves, at the beck of ambition, how shall we trust those of less firmness, or more frailty? When, in an evil hour, he threw wide open this door to corruption, the patriot was lost in the politician, and the art of the demagogue triumphed over the honesty of the republican.

On this subject, we must quote his own words, in his letter to the legislature of Tennessee—"There is no truth more sacred in politics," says general Jackson, "and none more conclusively stamped upon all the state constitutions, as well as the federal constitution, than that which requires the three great departments of power, the legislative, judicial, and executive, to be kept separate and apart. But simple and manifest as this truth is, the difficulty of arriving at it in practice, with constitutional restraints, still remains, and presents a question, whether the wisdom and virtue of the present generation, with a view to amendment in this important matter, may not be usefully employed?"

"With a view to sustain more effectually, in practice, the axiom which divides the three great classes of power into independent constitutional checks, I WOULD IMPOSE A PROVISION, RENDERING ANY MEMBER OF CONGRESS INELIGIBLE TO OFFICE, UNDER THE GENERAL GOVERNMENT, DURING THE TERM FOR WHICH HE WAS ELECTED, AND FOR TWO YEARS THEREAFTER, except in cases of judicial office." "The effect of such a constitutional provision is obvious. By it congress, in a considerable degree, would be free from that connexion with the executive department, which at present gives strong grounds of APPREHENSION and JEALOUSY on the part of the people. Members, instead of being liable to be withdrawn from legislating on the great interests of the nation, through prospects of executive patronage, would be more liberally confided in by their constituents, while their vigilance would be less interrupted by party feelings and party excitements. Calculations from intrigue, or management, would fail; nor would their deliberations, or their investigation of subjects, consume so much time. The MORALS OF THE COUNTRY WOULD BE IMPROVED, and virtue, uniting with the labors of the representatives, and with the official ministers of the law, would tend to perpetuate the honor and glory of the government. But if this change in the constitution should not be obtained, and important appointments continue to devolve on the representatives in congress, it requires no depth of thought to be convinced, that CORRUPTION WILL BE THE ORDER OF THE DAY; and that, under the garb of conscientious sacrifice to establish precedents for the public good, evils of serious importance to the freedom and prosperity of the republic may arise. It is through THIS CHANNEL that the people may expect to be attacked in their constitutional sovereignty, and where TYRANNY may be well apprehended to spring up in some favorable emergency. Against such inroads every guard ought to be interposed, and none better occurs than that of closing the suspected avenue with some necessary constitutional restriction. We know human nature to be prone to evil; we are easily taught to pray that we may not be led into temptation; and hence the opinion, that by constitutional provision, all avenues to temptation on the part of our political servants, should be closed."

Yet this corruption so justly described, and vividly painted, in all its ramifications and consequences; has gen. Jackson practised to a pernicious extent, unheard of among his predecessors! Comment on such tergiversation is needless; and surprise is stifled by grief and mortification, over the weakness of nature, and the frailty of the man. Without good faith there can be no morals in government, and the support of general Jackson for a re-election, after the flagrant violation of a pledge so solemn, and a principle so important, would be knowingly to put upon the people a fraud and imposition, as insulting to their understandings, as dangerous and destructive to their liberties.

But it is not merely on one—it is on all points that he has proved reckless to his word, and inconsistent with his professions. On no part of his public character did he boast with so much pride and ardor as his DEMOCRACY. In his letter to doctor William Dickson, he makes a full avowal of the entire principles of the JEFFERSON SCHOOL. He says:—

"Believing as I do, that any citizen who does obtain the suffrage of the freemen of Tennessee, must be a character, the composition of which is virtue, talents, and the TRUE WHIG PRINCIPLES OF SEVENTY-SIX; in short, sir, that he must be a republican, and in politics, like Cæsar's wife, not only chaste, but UNSUSPECTED."

"The first two component parts of this character I know you possess; the latter, as to myself, I have ever thought you did. But, sir, the public mind has been lately led to believe that your political sentiments are doubtful, and some have held you up as an aristocrat. These reasons have operated with me to call upon you to answer the following interrogatories:—First—are you, and have you always been, a true admirer of the whig principles of seventy-six? Have you always been an admirer of the state authorities? Are you now, and have you always been, an admirer of the constitution of the United States, friendly to its administration, agreeable to the true literal meaning of the instrument, and banishing the dangerous doctrine of implication? Have you always been, and are you now, opposed to standing armies in time of peace? Are you now, and have you always been, inimical to a standing armament? Are you now, and have you always been, opposed to foreign political connexions? Are you now, and have you always been, opposed to the extension of executive patronage? Have you always been, and are you now, an advocate for freedom of religion and freedom of the press? Are you now, and have you always been, friendly to economy in the public disbursements, and an enemy to the system of loans? And, lastly, are you a real republican in principle, and will you be a republican in practice?"

From a creed so full and ample, we had every reason to believe that his practice would have corresponded to his professions; and his appointments and measures assumed a congenial shape. But when once licensed in power, what was his conduct? He called to his councils and his confidence some of the most conspicuous ultra federalists of the country, who had distinguished themselves for their opposition to the late war, to compose his original cabinet. The present even exceeds the first, in this inconsistent association of the federalists of '98 with a disciple, at least a professing disciple, of the Jefferson school. The secretary of the treasury, the secretary of the navy, and the attorney general, have ever been noted for their ultra-devotion to the antagonist party: and in his local and minor appointments, a similar preference is generally perceived to prevail. Fidelity to the principles of Thomas Jefferson, consistency with our past lives, honor, virtue, and a true regard for the rights of man, all forbid us to yield our support to one who has so totally sacrificed his principles, and so entirely abandoned his party. As democrats, we cannot support

ANDREW JACKSON, or give countenance to his federal appointments, and aristocratical career.

When it is considered how intimately connected the purity of the press is with the FREEDOM OF ELECTIONS, we cannot be too jealous of the exercise of government over this controlling lever of public opinion, nor too indignant when we behold it extended over the states for the purpose of promoting his re-election. His own words on this subject must be conclusive. In his inaugural speech he declared that—

"The recent demonstration of public sentiment inscribes on the list of executive duties, in characters too legible to be overlooked, the task of REFORM, which will require particularly the correction of those abuses that have brought the PATRONAGE of the FEDERAL GOVERNMENT into conflict with the FREEDOM OF ELECTIONS."

It would be our desire to conceal, not parade, his aberrations, were such tenderness compatible with public duty, or consonant to the justice due to ourselves. The undisguised purchase of the public press by his officers and minions furnishes a sad comment on his professed regard for its purity and freedom, when he erects, in the metropolis of the nation, and through the agency of a treasury officer and the postmaster general, one of the most noted partisan newspapers; we not only feel it a wrong, but are compelled to regard it as an insult to the people, whose integrity it questions, and whose intelligence it derides.

As Americans, jealous of the honor, and sensitive of the fame of our country, among the nations of the earth, would that we could draw a veil over the unhappy and degrading scenes that have recently disgraced the capital of the republic. Who among those that gave their ready and generous credence to the professions of Andrew Jackson, could have anticipated amidst the wildest dreams of political adversity, or forebodings of ruin, that in two short years his administration would have brought confusion on himself, disgrace on his country, shame on his friends, and triumph to his enemies? But let us, in compassion, draw the curtain over a picture which, if fully exposed to view, might reveal what would crimson the cheek of chastity, as well as excite a pang in the heart of the patriot. It more than suffices to know that he composed his first cabinet on wrong principles, from the MEMBERS OF CONGRESS, and if public report speaks but half the truth, he has dissolved it in principles equally erroneous, and less justifiable; principles which equally shock the moral sense, and the political integrity of the American people; principles unknown to the constitution, and subversive of our rights. It now remains to state the change of position, as to parties, which a dereliction from principles, almost necessarily induced, when gen. Jackson came into power.

Whilst true to his original creed of democracy, he remained faithful to the people, who took him up from affection, and sustained him as a candidate from principle. But the moment he became derelict—the moment he left the path of the patriot, for the devious way of the politician—that moment he forsook the people for intriguers, and interested aspirants, who calculating to succeed by using his popularity for their evil purposes, gave him a hollow-hearted support for the substantial recompense of honors and rewards. It was in this manner that Amos Kendall and Francis P. Blair, who had advised Mr. Clay to vote for Mr. Adams—were bought into his support, and became the lawgivers of his party—whilst his original friends were carelessly overlooked, or ungratefully discarded; or estranged by a barrier of corruption, which to surmount required the sacrifice of all the principles and measures for which they had associated in his support.

A total revolution of character, of principles, of purposes, of opinions like this, requires no argument or elucidation to prove, must reverse the position of the individual,—dissolve all the affinities of party cohesion, and rend asunder all the sympathies of party attachment, that originally existed. Whilst we announce the fact, however, we cannot give countenance to a fraud; and on the same grounds that we at first accorded him our adhesion, do we hereby withdraw from ANDREW JACKSON our future support; convinced that time, circumstances, and power, have destroyed that IDENTITY OF POLITICAL CHARACTER that once attracted our admiration, won our confidence, and secured our affection.

SEAMEN'S PROTECTIONS.

The pages of this work will shew that we have, "many a time and oft," preferred a decided protest against the practice which obtained of granting paper-protections to such men as fought under Hull, and the long line of worthies who succeeded him, in holding up the "star-spangled banner,"—because that it admitted something like a right in the British, (who claimed it), to examine into the character of those who sailed under our flag; a right that we would rather see every such John Bull "hanged on a tree" than admit, while power to resist the degradation remained.

We have lately met with the following notice of one of Mr. Clay's speeches on this subject, and take much pleasure in presenting it to our readers.

When the subject of the impressment of American seamen by Great Britain, agitated our country from one end of the union to the other, congress had been induced to pass a bill to furnish our seamen with certificates of citizenship, in order to prevent them from being mistaken for British subjects. Mr. Clay justly considered this step as a dangerous and dishonorable concession, and took occasion to express his feelings in the following cogent appeal. [Nat. Jour.

"We are told by gentlemen in the opposition, that government has not done all that was incumbent on it to do, to avoid just cause of complaint on the part of Great Britain; that, in particular, the certificates of protection authorised by congress, are fraudulently used. Sir, government has done too much in granting those paper protections. I can never think of them without being shocked—they resemble the passes which the master grants to his negro slave, 'let the bearer, Mungo, pass and repass, without molestation.' What do they imply? That Great Britain has a right to seize all who are not provided with them. From their very nature they must be liable to abuse on both sides. If Great Britain desires a mark by which she can know her own subjects, let her give them an ear mark.—The colors that float from the mast head, should be the credentials of our seamen. It is impossible that this country should ever abandon the gallant tars who have won for us such splendid trophies. Let me suppose that the genius of Columbia should visit one of them in his oppressor's prison, and attempt to reconcile him to his forlorn and wretched condition.—She would say to him, in the language of gentlemen on the other side, 'Great Britain intends you no harm, she did not mean to impress you, but one of her own subjects; having taken you by mistake, I will remonstrate, and try to prevail on her, by peaceable means, to release you, but I cannot, my son, fight for you.' If he did not consider this mere mockery, the poor tar would address her judgment, and say, 'You owe me my country, protection; I owe you, in return, obedience. I am no British subject—I am a native of old Massachusetts, where live my aged father, my wife, my children. I have faithfully discharged my duty. Will you refuse to do yours?' Appealing to her passions, he would continue, 'I lost this eye in fighting under Truxton, with the Insurgente; I got this scar before Tripoli; I broke this leg on board the Constitution, when the Guerriere struck.'"

There was something in the impassioned gesture and pathetic tone of utterance which distinguished this appeal, that the feeling which dictated it passed from man to man, as if one mysterious chain of sympathy connected every bosom.

A FARMER AND A SHOEMAKER.

From the Portsmouth Journal.

Farmer. Good morning, neighbor, have you finished my shoes?

Shoemaker. Yes. And I hope you brought me the cheese according to agreement.

F. To be sure, I did. But look ye neighbor. I shan't be gulled any longer. You must hereafter make my shoes at 25 per cent. less, or I won't have them of you.

S. Why neighbor, what are you at? It requires all my time, at present prices, to make a comfortable living; so that your prices would soon make me a bankrupt. The reduction you propose is more than the profit.

F. Now that's a fine story—but I've got my eyes open and you shant take me in any more. I take the N. H. Patriot, from which I learn that a duty on an article for protection is a tax on the consumers, and goes into the pockets of the mechanics. This is so plain that it is strange I never thought on it before. The duty is 25 cents a pair. Now do you suppose I am going to pay you all that the shoes cost you, and your profit on them, and 25 cents besides? Not I. I shall serve all alike, for there is a tax for the benefit of all of you, the hatter, tailor, harness-maker, cabinet-maker, rope-maker, blacksmith, &c. I shall save many a dollar by getting off this protection. What a glorious fellow this Patriot man is, to let us into these secrets and show us how you wrong us.

S. Why neighbor are you in earnest?

F. In earnest? Why should I not be, when I have been so much imposed on, and found you out at last?

S. Now, neighbor, you know we live by helping one another. I can't afford to lose your custom;—what must be done to keep it?

F. What must you do? Why, take off the 25 cents, tax, duty, protection, or whatever the Patriot man calls it, and be content to live with a fair profit, in an honest way, and I will buy your shoes; for to give every one his due (hang the du-ties) you make better shoes than any body.

S. Well, you know I take your produce in pay.

F. Well, suppose you do. Is not my produce as good as your shoes.

S. But what I am going to say, as I take your produce in pay, you should, to make it fair between us, take off the duty, tax, protection, that we pay on your produce.

F. Agreed! But if the farmer was protected the Patriot would have told us of it.

S. Be that as it may; we now understand each other. To make our dealings just we are to repeal the tariff as to our trades, that is, I am to deduct the duty from the price of every pair of shoes you buy of me; and you are to deduct the duty from every article of produce which I take of you in payment.

F. That's it exactly. How ready the mechanics are to grow honest when found out.

S. How much cheese did you bring me?

F. 200 pounds.

S. What is it worth?

F. My wife said I must get ten cents a pound, though it is not her best, which, like a shrewd woman as she is, she keeps at home.

S. This is rather high, but I will take it at that price after you deduct the duty.

F. Oh yes—what is it?

S. Nine cents per pound!

F Nine cents—deduct nine cents from ten. Why my wife, pleasant as she is, would look cross enough to turn all the milk sour if I hinted such a thing. Do you think I am such a fool as to sell cheese for a cent a pound.

S. This is a bargain of your own seeking:—I was content with things as they were.

INTERESTING OR AMUSING SCRAPS.

Smelting of iron. Heated air for blast furnaces has been used for some time at the Clyde iron works, and with great success. Experiments have proved that iron is smelted by heated air, with three-fourths of the quantity of coal required, when cold air, that is air not artificially heated, is employed for that purpose, while the produce of the furnace in iron is at the same time greatly increased. All the furnaces at Clyde iron works are now blown with it. At these works the air, before it is thrown into the blast furnaces, is heated 220 deg. of far. in cast iron vessels placed on furnaces, similar to those of steam engine boilers. It is expected that a higher temperature than 220 degrees will be productive of a proportionally increased effect. But this is a subject of experiment. It is supposed that this improvement will accomplish a saving in the cost of the iron in Great Britain to the amount of at least £200,000 a year.

What mules think of railway conveyance. The produce of the Mauch Chunck coal (anthracite) mine, in Pennsylvania, is conveyed to a village of the same name in wagons, running on an inclined railway; and to each train of 42 wagons, there are 7 cars attached, containing 28 mules, which are employed to draw back the wagons when emptied. Professor Silliman states, that the mules readily perform the duty of drawing up the empty wagons, but that "having once experienced the comfort of riding down, they appear to regard it as a right, and neither mild nor severe measures, not even the sharpest whipping, can ever induce them to descend in any other way."

Anthracite coal. A correspondent enquires the meaning of Anthracite, in this connexion. Anthracites is a Latin noun, signifying a precious stone, having spots with the appearance of sparks of fire. Anthrax, signifies a coal, or coals. The meaning of the term Anthracite may hence be gathered with sufficient clearness, as the sparkling appearance of good fossil coal is well known.

Age of ships. The Royal William was launched in 1719, and is supposed not to have been repaired till 1757; it was surveyed afloat in 1785, and probably lasted many years more. The Betsey Cains yacht, in which king William performed his first voyage to England was then several years old; it was sold to a merchant in the reign of George I. and employed in the coal trade, in which service she existed till February, 1827, when she struck on a reef of rocks near Tynemouth bar, and was there lost, only for want of timely assistance, her timbers being, after the lapse of at least one hundred and forty years, still perfectly sound. How is it that no such ships are built now-a-days? Is it the dry-rot, or underwriting that flourishes? [Mechanics' Mag.

Dyspepsia. The Halsteadian mode of craw-thumping, kneading the bowels, &c. in cases of indigestion or dyspepsia, seems to be precisely the same as that practised by the Sandwich Islanders. The march of intellect, and particularly the taste for internal improvement, do not seem to be exclusively confined to the continents of the old or new world. In the following extract from a review of capt. Kotzebue's account of his visit to Hauii, Oahu, &c. we find a precedent for our civilized treatment of a complaint thought to be peculiar only to the most refined people. The personage described, however, was one filled with royal blood—no less than the sovereign queen, Namahanua, widow of Tamahamaha, late monarch of those islands:—

On one occasion, he called at dinner-time; she was lying stretched on her prodigious stomach upon some fine mats before the looking glass; a number of China dishes were arranged in a semi-circle before her, and her attendants were employed in handing first one and then another to her majesty. She ate voraciously, while two boys flapped away the flies with large bunches of feathers: the quantity of food she ate was prodigious. After the entrance of captain Kotzebue, she ate enough to satisfy six men, and those Russians; at least, the estimate is Kotzebue's. After she was satisfied, she drew her breath with apparent difficulty, and then exclaimed, "I have eaten famously!" By the assistance of her attendants she then turned upon her back and made a sign with her hand to a tall strong fellow who seemed prepared for duty. He immediately sprang upon her body and kneaded her as unmercifully with his knees and fists as if she had been a trough of bread: this was done to favor digestion. After groaning a little at this ungenteel treatment, and taking a short time to recover herself, she ordered her royal person to be again turned on the stomach and recommenced her meal. Namahanua and her fat hog are the greatest curiosities in Oahu. By a natural sympathy with fatness, she loves every thing embonpoint. This hog is black, of extraordinary size, and the queen feeds him to suffocation, as other ladies do Dutch pugs. He has two Kanackas to attend upon him, and can scarcely move from obesity, to use a word almost too fine for bacon.

Terrible explosion. A Rio Janeiro paper of April 13th contains an account of a violent thunder storm which descended upon port Alegre on the 11th of March. The rain fell in torrents, and the lightning struck in several places. A powder-house about a league from the city, containing 37,500 pounds of powder, was struck and blown to atoms. The explosion shook the whole city, like an earthquake. The houses on the margin of the river felt the shock most, and every building received more or less injury. All the materials of the powder house were thrown to the distance of more than 200 rods; the foundations were torn up, and not a tile or a beam was left. The woods in the immediate vicinity were swept down, and the largest trees torn up by the roots. At a distance of 16 or 20 rods from the magazine, a military guard was quartered, and although the building which they were in was greatly injured, particularly in the roof, not a single soldier suffered any material harm. Several cattle, which happened to be near, were killed. [N. Y. Jour. Com.

Philadelphia, June 15. About five yesterday afternoon a thunder storm came up from the southeast, with heavy rain. The steeple of Christ church, we are told, was probably saved by its lightning rod. In the back porch of Hieskell and Niblo's hotel, Mr. Niblo and several of his guests, were engaged in conversation, when one of the party desired the others to watch the steeple, and observe how the lightning appeared to play round the spire. He had scarcely spoken, when a ball of fire, followed instantly by a terrific crash of thunder, seemed to strike that point of the rod, vanishing immediately, and producing no other effect than a slight appearance of smoke. The rod passes down the interior of the steeple, and on examination, traces of the lightning were found on several of the lower links and the wall which they touch.

Remarkable effect of lightning. On Monday the 29th ult. the house of Richard Whitney, in Winchendon, Mass. was struck with lightning, and the chimney, being the only one in a house nearly three stories high, and uniting ten fire places, was rent from top to bottom, and scattered into every room in the house. The lightning also branched out, and ran in all directions, and into almost all parts of the house. The family present consisted of seven—two very aged people, Mrs. Whitney, and 4 children. Most of them were partly stunned by the shock, but none materially injured, except Mrs. W. who was found some minutes afterward, buried in the rubbish from the chimney, and was taken up apparently dead. She was carried out of doors, and long exertions used for her recovery before any signs of life appeared, except one gasp. She at length showed symptoms of life, and in a few hours was restored to her reason. The hair on one side of her head was scorched, and the color changed, and a red streak was discovered reaching from her head to her foot. She is now, (ten days after the event), in a fair way of recovery to health.

EDITORIAL AND MISCELLANEOUS.

☞ The deep interest and great extent of the various matter accumulating, has induced us again to incur the expense of publishing eight additional pages, to make up the present number. It is our resolution, so far as the ability may be afforded, and as promptly as the nature of things will admit of, to offer to our subscribers and the public, as full and faithful a record of the events of the day, as any other like work, any where issuing from the press, furnishes—for the present information and future use of public and private persons. But in our own land, there is no citizen who has not an important stake in the public transactions—such being, in fact, the sovereign power of the country—the source and deposit of all legitimate authority.

It has been observed that we have latterly much increased our usual supply of matter, and at a pretty heavy additional expense. But such compliments are due to our old and steadfast friends, and the many, very many gentlemen who have more recently held out a liberal support to us. There IS an earnest and rapidly increasing desire to investigate and uphold the principles of the "AMERICAN SYSTEM;" and never before have we so much felt the want of ability to render justice to a cause so important, so universal—which passes the threshhold of every freeman's home, and abides with him, and will lead him in the right way, if kindly received and considerately entertained. But "the will must be accepted for the deed." If to others, more favored by genius and education, it is reserved to set forth the lofty and commanding claims of the laboring classes to the protection of a wise and paternal government, with that interest and energy which belong to matters so important—we have a heart that never wanders and an industry not easily exhausted, a devotion of more than thirty years standing and a zeal unbounded, to cast, as our "mite," into the general treasury of knowledge, that men "HIGH-SOULED MEN," may turn into and contemplate themselves—and resolve to hold that rank in the creation which THE FATHER OF ALL designed that all should possess and enjoy: for he "created all men free and equal, and endowed all with certain natural and unalienable rights, such as life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness." And the congress of seventy-six well knew that "life" would be in vain and "liberty" a non-entity, without a successful "pursuit of happiness." Which latter is the aim and end of the "AMERICAN SYSTEM." The wretched people of Spain and Portugal have life—the miserable and starving inhabitants of Great Britain and Ireland possess what is called liberty—but the right to pursue their own happiness is denied, and life, or liberty, is hardly worth having in either.

But in the United States of America, blessed be GOD, the right to "pursue happiness" is regarded as "unalienable," and the people have undoubted power to render this right operative, in every respect. To accomplish this, however, they must consider themselves—feel themselves to be men—proud men, bowing to no throne, acknowledging no superiority save in the SOVEREIGN OF NATIONS—unless in the virtue and talents displayed by some of HIS creatures, and administered for the benefit of their fellow beings. How have we coveted, (but without maliciousness), the power to render service to our brethren—to utter the things that we feel—to describe, as with a "pencil of light" the thoughts which burn within us, that all men > ——"should their daily know,

> "But know their rights and knowing dare maintain"
> "And crush the tyrant, while they rend the chain,"

which has bound them to some political JUGGERNAUT—emperor, king, priest, or party!—whose dominion is in utter opposition to what we esteem the "unalienable rights" of human nature. The policy by which the British East India company, or government, desolated some of the fairest portions of the earth, and swept away pretty nearly one hundred millions of men by their wars and monopolies, every where marks the progress of the conqueror. The British made the poor Indians themselves (as Cortez and Pizarro had done before them), the chief instruments of their own destruction, by exciting jealousies and arming one part of the population against the rest, so that they, alternately, preyed on one another, until vast regions of country, that once teemed with happy people, have become the habitation of hyenas and tygers. How has this policy operated in Ireland—where christian neighbors meet in bloody frays, and are prompt to act against one another, instead of combining against the common oppressor of both? How is it in the United States—where political party arrays man against his fellow, and teaches him to excuse, or support, things which his own private good sense rejects as abommable—which he knows, or at least ought to know, are in severe resistance to his private interests? But light is going forth—the people will reason, and the republic must never be despaired of. It shall stand—at once a warning and guide to all the nations of the world.

☞ Notwithstanding the extent and closeness of the matter in the present number, very many articles prepared for insertion have been postponed. It is difficult to get along in these busy times.

☞ An agent, Mr. Francis Forster, will leave this office in a day or two with the accounts that are due in certain counties of Pennsylvania, bordering on the city of Philadelphia—and, on the suggestion of several friends, will wait upon gentlemen who may be thought willing to ENCOURAGE AND PROTECT THE MANUFACTURE OF NILES' REGISTER! We bespeak for Mr. F. a courteous reception, and will be thankful for any attentions that may be paid him by our kind friends in that part of the country.

☞Just when the matter for the present number was about to be made-up for the press, the U. States "Telegraph" of yesterday came into my possession—for I do not receive the daily paper. The leading article is addressed "to Hezekiah Niles, editor of Niles' Weekly Register," and has for its motto "let us reason together," proposing a full and fair discussion of certain points contained in the essay called "Politics for working men"—concerning which I have only time to say, that, differently circumstanced, I WOULD GLADLY ACCEPT. But I am committed to Mr. Ritchie, editor of the "Richmond Enquirer," to carry on a like discussion—and, as he intends to enlarge his paper for that very purpose!!! I am not at liberty, just now, to take up the glove thrown down by the editor of the Telegraph; and the gallant general will not expect me to fight two such veterans of the quill, as himself and Mr. Ritchie, on the same subject, and at the same time! If the latter will not meet me in inky field, I will, with much pleasure, meet the latter—provided the discussion has a pre-determined extent,* and each party shall liberally, and without remark, (except in brief explanation of some mistake or error), publish the essays of the other, at weekly intervals—this paper appearing only in weekly numbers.

☞An old and much respected subscriber in Georgia, has, in a good spirit, propounded the following query—"If it be a fact [as has been asserted in the REGISTER], that American manufactured goods have come "into competition with those of the same quality, and "made of like materials, of foreign manufacture, in for"eign markets, where both are subject to the same du"ties, &c. why may they not come into competition in "our own market, without protection, where the raw "materials are grown," &c.

Such are the points of the query, which we have presented in their strongest form, believing that we can easily satisfy our old friend, and we shall take much pleasure in attempting it, at an early day. He will please to recollect, however, that we have spoken of this "competition" as existing only in respect to coarse cotton goods, as yet; but if we shall shew the reason why the protection afforded to the home manufacture of these goods (as well for the benefit of the cotton planters as that of the farmers and other working-people, generally), should not be withdrawn, we shall establish the principle which he desires may be discussed. The treasury tables concerning the commerce and navigation of the United States for the last year, (which have been so long kept back from the public)—would be very useful in this exposition—but we can make out our case without them. ☞Suppose there may be authority found to show, that cotton goods are shipped to England, and sold there at a profit, being of the kinds made there for HOME USE? What then?

☞The editor gratefully acknowledges the very large circulation that has already been, or is now being given, to his 4th of July essay, addressed to "working men," and published in the REGISTER of the 9th inst. Some tens of thousands of copies have thus soon been spread before the people, and several heavy editions, in pamphlet form, are about to issue in various places, as he is informed. This is, indeed, a compliment—in much fulness of heart acknowledged, while unfeignedly regretting the want of power to bring out the facts pertaining to subjects of such overwhelming importance to the free laboring people of the United States, as those which he desired to present to their view. But, as it was written that it might be read, he wishes it may be placed in the hands of every citizen who derives his subsistence from his own personal industry—believing that it will induce many to reflect upon the matters suggested, and investigate the facts propounded: For this class of individuals, who have to "bear the burthen and heat of the day," in every country—who constitute the wealth of every nation, building up its prosperity in peace or defending it in war, have not, generally, examined the vital concern which they have in the PROTECTION AND EXTENSION OF THE PURSUITS OF WORKING MEN that they may attain "happiness." Nor are they sensible of the irresistible influence which they have in giving a wholesome direction to the national administration, concerning matters which should be as familiar to them as their own fire-sides—as prompt to their consideration as the names of their children! If they will only THINK—the republic stands like a rock of adamant! If they will think upon the matters presented, in the simplicity of that truth which belongs to first principles, they will be prepared to receive the more bold and clearer lights, which wise and learned philanthropists and statesmen will gladly spread before them—the editor regarding himself as filling only the place of a rough pioneer in the great work of making the people feel their own "consequence," that they may have private success and "saucy independence"—as the right freedom of action is regarded by persons, dressed in a little brief authority, who assume it as their privilege to DIRECT public opinion—the little-big men of village grog-shops, and other places! There is no mystery in political economy—for the elements of this science are pure as the mountain spring, "refreshing as the water-brook to the panting hart," as illustrated by the case between John Bull, stocking-weaver, and Ephraim Broadbrim, farmer, in the essay alluded to. But if these elements be corrupted—if the fountain be poisoned by grovelling and mean and base political parties—the misery of the old world must and will prevail in the new—and this glorious "land of the brave and the free," sink down into the pauperism of England, the haggard starvation of Ireland, the degradation of Italy, the "thick darkness" of Spain, the despotism of Portugal, the stupid ignorance of Russia, and the desolation of Turkey—for in these LABOR IS NOT HONORED—THE OX THAT TREADETH OUT THE CORN IS MUZZLED—AND THE INDUSTRIOUS POOR GO SUPPERLESS TO BED!

It is with high gratification that the editor perceives a mighty "moving of the waters"—a desire among the working people of the United States to ascertain why they are better off than those of their class in Europe and Asia. Would to HEAVEN, that they fully understood the reason of this!!! He prays them to seek the whys and wherefores! Why the character of man is exalted in America, wherefore the avenues to wealth are opened to all—why liberty and light, through education, is extending, wherefore prosperity abounds! If they ascertain these things—they will rather imitate the gravity of a quaker as he proceeds to his meeting-house to worship, than a herd of huzzaing animals, as they are led or driven to the polls.* The right of suffrage is a glorious right!—and, as he surely believes in his own accountability to HIM who made and preserves him for the "deeds done in the body"—so does he hold it that every freeman should regard himself responsible for his ballot. "I put my vote into the box in the presence of my GOD," was the oft-repeated and solemn saying of one of the best and soundest whigs that ever lived, the late venerable Dr. JAMES TILTON,† of Delaware, at whose "feet" the editor learned to think like a republican, in the days of his youth—and to whose Aristidean character this small tribute of a grateful heart is offered. Thus acting—the "thousandth thousandth generation" of the American people, will bless the statesmen and heroes of 1776.

The editor observes many celebrations of the late anniversary by the working men—the manufacturers in the villages being joined by their natural allies, the farmers of the neighborhood, and they have spoken "sweet music" in their toasts. This is as it should be. No other persons are so much interested in the independence of the United States, as they. It stands the Alpha and Omega of all earthly things which most concerns them. Let them often associate and commune with one another, and furious party might as well attempt to arrest the progress of the cataract of Niagara, as to rule them into subservieney to Great Britain, through what is ridiculously called "free trade"—a thing which is not, and cannot be, except in the common rum of our people. What these decree—they will maintain; for the right reason of the law should be with them, as well as the sword and the sovereignty of the American nation. Let them go forward, and "all's well."

☞The North-western Indians have entirely submitted, without the use of force. Various papers belonging to their affairs, shall be speedily published, and a history of the transactions preserved.

"Hezekiah Niles." Two articles have appeared in the Leesburg "Genius of Liberty," signed "Hezekiah Niles," addressed to the voters of Loudoun county. It is manifest that my name is thus used as a mark of respect—but I submit it to the author of these essays, and my good friend Mr. Sower, the worthy editor of the "Genius," whether the procedure is right in itself?—being assured that they will cheerfully withdraw the signature, if seeing, as I do, the impropriety of the compliment, in kindness intended to be bestowed upon me.

The free trade convention, to be held in September next, at the city of Philadelphia.

We believe that the project of this convention originated with Mr. Raguet, editor of the "Banner of the Constitution," and a member of congress from South Carolina, lately in Philadelphia, who held a meeting with four other persons—six in all, and made the loud call for a general convention, which we published in the Register of the 2nd inst. and another meeting has been held in Philadelphia, publicly called, at which, we understand, fifteen persons attended. These appointed sixteen delegates to the general convention, one of whom is Mr. Surchett—an UNNATURALIZED ENGLISHMAN, as stated in the memorial of certain citizens of Philadelphia to the senate and house of representatives of the United States, at the last session of congress, and not, as we have seen, denied by him; and we think that at least one other of the delegates is a regular British agent. We should like to see the names of the persons present at this meeting. Perhaps, it might afford us much instruction. Will some "free trade editor" give them to the public?

Both parties in South Carolina have made preparations for the sending of delegates to this convention. Indeed, the "state rights and free trade party, or "nullificators," have already appointed twenty delegates, Mr. Langdon Cheves being at the head of the list.

And the "Richmond Enquirer" is earnestly lashing-up the people of Virginia, that delegates may be appointed from that state.

When this general convention shall meet, perhaps, we may amuse our readers by the republication of certain things which the "free trade" party said about the constitutionality, and so forth, of the Harrisburg convention! The constitution is now, we suppose, "about the same that it was in Jerry Jordan's time," as a certain judge in Maryland was accustomed to charge the grand jury of his county, after the decease of Mr. Jordan, who had long been his colleague on the bench, and was accustomed to perform that duty.

But let us not be understood as objecting to this convention! Our desire to hear what "free trade" IS, will lead us into a careful examination of all its proceedings! In the mean time, we renew our promise of rewards to any person who will tell us where "free trade" may be found among civilized nations?

We meet with the following in the New York Evening Post, of July 21.

The last Banner of the Constitution states, on the authority of a gentleman residing in Fredericktown, Maryland, that the American System is losing favor in that part of the state.

"One of the candidates for congress in that district, openly avows his hostility to it at the public meetings; and the attention of the farmers has been a good deal drawn to the iron duty, which is becoming quite unpopular. Two papers in that part of the state, where a year ago not a syllable was uttered against the restrictive policy, are now on the side of the free trade."

In Ohio, no better evidence can be required of the happy change which public opinion is undergoing on the subject of the tariff, than the fact that a half dozen papers, or more, now advocate the doctrine of free trade, in favor of which, within a twelvemonth, not a syllable was lisped. Virginia, Georgia, North and South Carolina, Alabama, Tennessee and Mississippi, are all decidedly with us on the tariff question. Our cause is gaining ground in Maryland and Ohio, hitherto high tariff states.* New York is anti-tariff, Massachusetts is slowly turning from the error of its ways, and we hear cheering accounts from some of the other American System states. Light is indeed beginning to break in upon us, or, to use the phrase of the South Carolina orator, we indeed see a dawn of hope.

By the way, we must again ask, what is New York, this great commercial, anti-tariff city, which owes all its wealth to commerce, and has the deepest interest in the success of the cause of free trade—what is New York doing on the subject of the Philadelphia free trade convention.† Several excellent examples have been set us in sister states: let us speedily imitate them; let us though it is now too late to be first, at least not be last.

☞What is the political character of the papers referred to, in Maryland and elsewhere? It is now manifest that political party is to be whipped into an opposition to the protecting system?—though as old as the days of Franklin, and the originally moving cause of the adoption of the present constitution of the United States, if what Mr. Madison said in 1795, and repeatedly since, is true! The New York "Age" gives us the following extracts from Franklin's works:

"Industry, in all shapes, in all instances, and BY ALL MEANS, should be encouraged and protected; indolence, by every possible means, rooted out." Vol. IV. page 159.

"Some European nations refuse to consume the manufactures of East India. They should likewise forbid them to their colonies; for the gain to the merchant is not to be compared with the loss, [by this means] of people to the nation." Page 183.

"Foreign luxuries and needless manufactures IMPORTED and used in a nation, do, by the same reasoning, increase the people of the nation that furnishes them, and diminish the people of the nation that use them. Laws, therefore, that prevent such importation, and on the contrary promote the exportation of manufactures to be consumed in foreign countries, may be called [with respect to the people that make them] generative laws, as, by increasing subsistence, they encourage marriage."

"Such laws, likewise, strengthen a nation doubly, by increasing its own people, and diminishing its rivals. Page 188.

Meum and tuum. The Connecticut Courant well says—The opponents to the tariff contemplate holding a convention at Philadelphia during the ensuing autumn. Such a meeting is now lauded by men who were so ve-

*Maryland a high tariff state? Would that it were! But it soon will be. Ed. Reg.

†New York is doing a greater "commercial" business than ever she did—she has, indeed, a "free trade!" The Mercantile Advertiser says—

"The amount of duties paid, or secured to be paid at our custom house during the first quarter of the present year, January to March inclusive, was three millions nine hundred and fifty thousand dollars, exceeding by about one million and a half the revenue of the corresponding quarter of 1830. The account for the second quarter of this year, ending on 30th June, is not yet made up, but there is every reason to believe that it will much exceed the amount of the first quarter," hement in condemning any concentration of opinion and of strength, by those who entertained different views of this policy, and who regarded a convention of the friends of domestic industry as an incroachment upon the powers of congress.

Edge tools. There is a very valuable and extensive manufactory of edge-tools at Chambersburg, Pa.* The son of one of the most celebrated makers of such tools in England, lately purchased fifty dollars worth of the Chambersburg manufacture to send home, as patterns—but said, that English articles could not be furnished of like quality and price. We may expect a repetition of what happened, several years ago, in respect to gimblets. Several dozen, of American make, were sent to England by a British agent, (who himself related the story to us), with advice, that any quantity might be forwarded, if of like quality, at certain apparently very high prices—and, in due time, several hogsheads were received by the agent; but the manufacturers made almost a total loss—the wretched quality of their goods forbidding that they should come into competition with the American, and casting them into that class of articles which England produces so plentifully—"to sell" in foreign countries; though they had paid extra prices for the manufacture of these gimblets.

That the English can, and do, work as well in iron as we can, is freely admitted—but in that country, the manufacturers for the home and for the foreign market, are very different persons. The former have a character at stake, and are held closely responsible for the goodness of their wares—but the latter have no character (we speak generally), and would just as freely deal in cast-iron bridle bits as in those of the best wrought metal, if equally profitable—not caring the value of a straw whether the necks of "outlandish" foreigners were broken or not, because of the brittleness of their goods.† A British woollen manufacturer for the home market, would almost as soon have jumped into one of his own dye-tubs, as have openly sent out log-wood dyed cloth for indigo blues. And how is it with us? If we buy a British article, and it turns out unserviceable—we make no complaint, being used to such impositions; but if an American cloth changes its color, an American knife will not cut, or an American lock falls to pieces, as it were, of its own weight (as British locks oftentimes do), what a fuss is made! The fact is always freshly remembered, and we caution others to beware of American manufactures! Will the people reflect a little on this matter, that they may discover how far they are made subservient to foreign interests—how much disposed they are to disregard those of their own country? With what gentleness they permit John Bull to cheat them—how roughly they condemn a fraud committed on them, by their own countrymen? John Bull, in his dealings with foreigners, has worked himself up to the notion of the fish-woman—who, skinning eels alive, was asked if the process was not extremely severe on them? She said it was, at first, "but they had got us'd to it!" And thus Bull's agents, stationed in our cities to superintend the reception and sale of British goods, entered upon the business of false swearing with some small degree of compunction—but, after a while, being used to it, like the fish-woman's eels, they are ready to swear to any thing—in "the way of trade;" a "custom-house oath" being swallowed as easily as a glass of London porter, and as palateably, if rendering as much profit as will pay for the porter—such oaths being "dog-cheap."

Polical movements, &c. Robert B. Gilchrist, of Charleston, has been appointed by the president of the United States, to be attorney of the United States for the district of South Carolina, in the place of Edward Frost, resigned.

Mr. Frost, as stated in another place, refused to bring suit upon a custom house bond, that remained unpaid, because of constitutional scruples!

The beautiful frigate Potomac, with a fine crew of 500 men, is lying at New York, waiting the convenience of Mr. Van Buren, as it is said—who is to be sent to England in this frigate, on her way round Cape Horn. And yet Mr. Van Buren's appointment, as minister to England, has not been announced.

There is a communication in the "Richmond Enquirer," with reference to the alarming fact that gov. Floyd subscribed for the "United States Telegraph" and discontinued the "Baltimore Republican," and making it out to be a constitutional matter! The communication concludes as follows:

"This in governor Floyd might all have been inadvertency, and but for a palpable violation of the constitution a few days previous, without a mitigating circumstance, might so charitably be put down; but surely, there never was a governor that manifested such contempt for his constitutional advisers. He really seems to think it is a heinous offence to be caught in their company."

The United States Gazette which, from its previous intimation of some things that have happened, seems well advised on such subjects—says—"We are informed, that the address of Mr. Berrien, and the accompanying correspondence, are but "cakes and custards," as Sancho was wont to say, to what is about to appear. "Thus, bad begins, but worse remains behind."

It may be well to recollect, that certain of the New York editors were much abused, because they ventured an opinion that Mr. Randolph would not return to Russia. This was the more strange, for no one, we think, ever believed that he would remain and do business, for any length of time, at St. Petersburg. He has long been either incapable, or altogether unwilling, to attend to any business,—and hence he was hardly ever placed on any committee of either house of congress, however small its duties might be: and if so, it was seldom, indeed, that he attended the meetings of his committee. And yet it has been stated, in the "Richmond Enquirer," we think, that previous to his acceptance of the Russian mission he declined that to England and France.

The "Globe" of Tuesday last, in respect to Major Eaton, says—"he has not yet left the city, and we presume upon his high mindedness so far as to believe that he will not, while the kennel, corps, Tray, Blanch, and Sweetheart, growl and bark so fiercely."

Major Poussin retires from the service of the United States, with his distinguished friend, gen. Barnard. Col. James Gadsden, of Florida, has been appointed by the president in the place of gen. Barnard.

Internal improvements. Pennsylvania, in another year, says a writer in the U. S. Gazette, will have 800 miles of canal, and 600 of rail road, leading through her own territory, in full operation. She has appropriated since April 1st, 1826, in public money, thirteen millions of dollars, which, added to the individual appropriations, since the commencement of the Schuylkill canal, it is estimated will make an aggregate of twenty-six millions of dollars, disbursed on rail roads and canals, within her borders, in a very few years.

[Glorious Pennsylvania! These works have involved the state in debt, but added more than 100 millions of dollars to the wealth of the people!]

Baltimore and New York. The rail roads between French-town and New Castle, and Camden, [or Philadelphia] and Amboy, are rapidly preparing for use,

† The following from the "Boston Centinel" is a fine specimen of the spirit here spoken of—

The British schooner Monkey, lieut. Downes, was wrecked on the bar of Tampico, on the 13th of May, while in tow of a steamboat.

It will be remembered that it was this picaroon who, about two years ago, was in the habit of running alongside of small defenceless American vessels near the Bahama banks, while the defenceless merchant vessels, mistaking her for a pirate which she resembled, would often run ashore to escape capture. The Monkey would then come up, save what they could of the wreck, and claim salvage for its assistance, after causing the calamity by its disguise as a pirate!

and the Camden road is about to be extended south to a point on the Delaware, opposite New Castle, the ground being exceedingly favorable for works of this kind.—When these roads are completed, the route from Baltimore to French-town, by water, will require about 5 hours—to New Castle, by rail road, 1 hour—steam ferry boat to cross the Delaware, ¼ hour—to Camden, by rail road 2½ to 3 hours—to Amboy, by the same, 3 hours—to New York, by steam boat, between 2 and 3 hours—say fifteen hours from Baltimore to New York, and without very "high-pressure."

GREAT ZEAL! We find the following very curious notice in a Morristown, New Jersey, paper:

"The ladies' society attached to St. Peters' church respectfully give notice, that on the evening of Tuesday, the 26th instant, a variety of REFRESHMENTS will be offered at Mr. Jason King's hotel. The proceeds to be applied towards liquidating the church debt."

"To the pure," of course, "all things are pure;" but if the ladies get up a refreshment at a tavern, for the sake of liquidating the debt of a church, they render their "good (intentions) liable to be evil spoken of."

MR. ADAMS. After the delivery of the 4th of July oration by ex-president Adams, the company repaired to the festive board. The president of the day called upon Mr. Adams for a toast, when he arose and made the following address.

Friends, neighbors, and fellow-townsmen,—I will now take leave of you for the present—and before parting from you wish to add a few, a very few "more last words" to the many which you have already heard from me this day, with so much indulgence—they are—first, to thank you heartily for that indulgence, and then to propose a toast in honor of the primitive mother of New England—may I add—the primitive mother of those principles, which have made this day a day of glory and of joy!—The Plymouth colony. To that colony our native town did not originally belong: but I see around me more than one of those who number among their sires the fortunate youth from the Mayflower, who first alighted upon the rock. The legislature of this commonwealth have seen fit to link you in political association with the district of Plymouth; and to that association I am indebted for the honor of having been selected as their and your representative in the councils of the union—an honor the more precious in my estimation, because it was a spontaneous and unexpected testimonial of confidence from that, which, above all other lands, I am entitled to call "my own native land." Upon this day I cannot forget Plymouth and her history—I cannot forget the Mayflower, and the social compact of her pilgrims. I propose you for a toast—

The root struck from the seed of the Mayflower,—and the plant ascending from it—salutary—fruitful—perennial—it shall rise to heaven, and overspread the earth."

Mr. Adams is to pronounce an eulogium on Mr. Monroe. The editors of the "National Intelligencer" think it "would be worth a journey to Boston to hear the able and accomplished New Englander pourtraying the merits of one of Virginia's most eminent sons, so intimately known to him. The coincidence of the decease of his own venerable and patriotic father, also on the anniversary of independence, would give a touching interest to the discourse which Mr. ADAMS would deliver on such an occasion.

MR. CALHOUN. The following toast was given by the vice president of the United States, at a public dinner on the 4th of July, in his own district of Pendleton, S. C.

By John C. Calhoun—"The state and general governments—each imperfect when viewed as separate and distinct governments, but, taken as a whole, forming one system, with each checking and controlling the other, unsurpassed by any work of man, in wisdom and sublimity."

THE LATE GOV. MARTIN. Annapolis, July 23. All the members of the executive council attended at the seat of government on Thursday.

George Howard of John E. esq. first named of the council, proceeded on Friday morning, according to the constitution, to qualify as governor of the state of Maryland for the residue of the term for which the late governor was chosen.

Council chamber, July 20, 1831.

The executive council held a special meeting this day. Mr. Worthington submitted the following preamble and resolutions, which were unanimously adopted, and ordered to be entered upon the journal of proceedings, viz:

Whereas the members of the council penetrated with sincere sorrow for the death of his excellency, Daniel Martin, late governor of Maryland, and deeply regretting the loss they have sustained in a guide so experienced, conciliating and prudent, feel it due to the memory of their deceased friend, to testify their high esteem for his frank, manly and polite deportment; his liberal, social and benevolent disposition; his republican simplicity of manners; his firmness and consistency as a politician, and his ever warm and unerring devotion to what he conceived to be the public good—Be it therefore,

Resolved, That the members of this board will, for the space of one month, wear crape on the left arm, as a tribute of their respect for the memory of his excellency Daniel Martin, late governor of Maryland.

Resolved, That the armorer cause 19 minute guns to be fired in the morning of Thursday the 21st inst. at sun rise, and 19 at sun set, and that the state flag be hoisted half-staff, as funeral honors to the deceased.

Resolved, That the clerk of the council communicate the foregoing preamble and resolutions to the family of the late governor.

Resolved, That the council adjourn, until Friday morning next the 22d inst. at 9 o'clock.

Josiah Bailey, esq. has been appointed attorney-general of Maryland, vice Mr. Taney resigned, on being appointed attorney-general of the United States.

"REFORM" INDEED. The Charleston Mercury says—"Among the mottos and patriotic sentiments which adorned the pavilion on Saturday night, was a new one, recently put up, and bearing the inscription, "Edward Frost, the Habersham of South Carolina." This compliment was paid to Mr. Frost in consequence of his having declined, as district attorney, to institute a suit against a gentleman who lately refused to pay a custom house bond. The gentleman alluded to refused to pay for the express purpose of bringing the tariff question before a judicial tribunal: but the district attorney, being thoroughly satisfied of the unconstitutionality of the tariff, declined, as above stated, to have any participation in enforcing it. It is generally rumored, indeed, that Mr. F. has resigned; but we cannot vouch for the correctness of the rumor. His refusal to act under the tariff law, however, (if he has not resigned), will most probably lead to his removal by the president, and is fully equal, in itself, (in disinterested patriotism, and generous devotion to the rights of the state), to the actual resignation of his office. As such it is appreciated by the people. They honor him for his conduct—and he will be ranked, and deservedly so, in the estimation of every lover of constitutional liberty, with the high-minded Habersham of Georgia, whose patriotic conduct in resigning his office rather than assist in rivetting federal usurpation upon his state, will never be forgotten."

[The preceding is unworthy of comment,—and, we presume that the simple fact being known to the executive, Mr. Frost will resign—however "convenient" it may be to have an attorney who feels it "unconstitutional" to compel the payment of just debts—for we warrant it, that the maker of the bond did not take off the amount of the duties from the selling price of his goods.—Mr. Frost has resigned, and another has been made attorney in his stead.]

The "Mercury" also contains the following modest effusion:

"It is well he, [the president], should now distinctly understand that Carolina is not to be menaced out of her principles; we have exhausted the argument and every appeal which patriotism or affection could suggest—we are not to be told that our only hope is in the mercy of our oppressors—this is the privilege of the slave, but ours we trust is a higher one—we look to the sovereignty of the state as our shield—Carolina will use no means but those consistent with the constitution—Menaces of force she disregards. Let but one of her sons be sacrificed by the despotism that would sustain tyranny by such guilt as this, and the execrations of every state in the union will be upon the heads of those who advised or sanctioned it. Let our oppressors, however, understand that the sons of Carolina will seal with their blood fidelity to her principles, rather than live the mendicants of power for the rights which nature's God has given them."

[A mention of the "Mercury" naturally reminds us of "nullification," and of an incident said to have happened a few evenings ago, near the lower bridge over Hartford run, Baltimore, between a couple of gentlemen of color, which may shew that the word is getting into common use! One of them shouted to the other, in a huge passion, "I'll nullifumcate you, by gosh," and he bared his broad black arm, while his white eyes "twinkled like a bed-post." "Bawl away," said the other, "but if you touch me, I'll catch you by the waistband of your trowsers, and chuck you over the bridge, into the mud." And so the nullifumcation ended.

MICHIGAN. There were three candidates to represent this territory in congress—Mr. Wing, national republican, Mr. Dexter, anti masonic, and Mr. Williams, Jackson. The first had more votes than the two last.

FLORIDA ELECTION. It is stated in the Florida papers, that the governor of that territory, is about to issue a writ for a new election of a delegate to congress, upon the ground that, at that recently held, there was an equality of votes: A number of votes from different precincts were rejected by him, as informal and defective. His right to reject them is strongly contested by the friends of col. White.

[If one half of what has been said by col. White and his friends, as to interferences of the officers of the United States to prevent his election—is true, this proceeding, on the part of gov. Duval, will bring out a statement of the most singular and unjustifiable proceedings that ever happened in America.]

INTERESTING TO EDITORS. A case has been decided in New York, in favor of the New York Daily Sentinel, against Lee Powel & Co., wherein the principle was confirmed, that persons receiving a newspaper, without ordering it discontinued, are liable in all cases for the payment of the same.

[This is entirely proper, and, of course, the common law of the land. Without it, the "rights of editors" would be seriously invaded, indeed. On the other hand, unless forbidden by a special contract, the subscriber to a newspaper may order its discontinuance at any time—especially on the payment of arrearages, if any there should be. But the order of discontinuance must be sent direct to the editor, or his agent, with whom the subscriber has transacted business concerning the paper.]

REVOLUTIONARY VETERANS. From the Providence Daily Advertiser. We give a list of the names, ages, and residence, of the revolutionary soldiers who attended the celebration of the fourth in this town. The whole number is 53, of which the oldest is 93, and the youngest 61. Last year there were in all 76 present. Each year brings a decrease of these last links in the chain of olden and present times.

NEW YORK. From the Boston Courier. Messrs. editors—I have before me the official annual report of the expenditures of the city of New York, and subjoin a few extracts therefrom.

The expenses of that city for the last year amounted to $1,038,000. The city debt amounts to 774,555. Among the items of expense, we notice the following, viz:—almshouse, bridewell and penitentiary, $125,000; cleansing of streets, $25,976; coroner's inquests, $2,568; expenses of lighting streets, $49,381, officers for conveying prisoners to bridewell, $1,323; officers' services for executing the Sunday laws, $1,306; public schools, $25,995; opening and widening streets $202,301; fire department, $23,462; paving and repairing streets, $10,975; city watch $86,592; extra police duty of marshals and watchmen, for preserving the peace during the night of December 31, 1830, $1,194. The most singular article of expense is the following: "for refreshments for the common council and its committees at the City Hall $1,499"!!!

Among the receipts into the city treasury, I observe for lottery office licenses $7,000; for tavern and excise licences, $30,880; for penalties for violation of the burial and other city laws, $5,610; from commutation for alien passengers, $14,901; for sales of manure, $19,053; amount received from taxes, $487.881.

It appears by the report, that there are in the city of New York 3,088 persons licensed to sell spirits. In Boston the number is about 600. In New York there are 530 watchmen; in Boston 72. Notwithstanding that New York is three times the size of Boston, yet the expense for public schools is doubly greater in the latter city than in the former. In lighting the streets of New York last year, there were 35,215 gallons of oil used, besides gas, the supply of which for 299 lamps cost $1,397. This is at the average of only about $4,70 for gas, per lamp, a consideration which is worthy of attention on the part of our city authorities; for this is, to say the least, quite as cheap as lighting with oil, to say nothing of the superiority of gas light in every respect.

THE FRENCH CLAIMS. The claims upon France are understood to exceed TWENTY MILLIONS. We are now told that France offers $3,000,000, and it is hinted that Mr. Van Buren should just step over the channel—and for what? Is it not to take the credit of this negotiation off the shoulders of Mr. Rives? By driving a compromise, perhaps, France will give the $3,000,000, and throw in Beaumarchai's claim to boot, and then we are to be told of Mr. Van Buren's great diplomacy in relinquishing twenty millions for three or four or perhaps five!! The claimants may have given a carte blanche, but is it right that a desire to promote Mr. Van Buren's chances for the presidency should fill it up at so great a sacrifice? The presence of Mr. Van Buren in France may be necessary to the adjustment of these claims; but we must admit that we are a little sceptical. [U. S. Telegraph.

PURE BULLISM. "They, (the United States), have no HISTORY worth reading, not a canto of poetry, no memoirs, no collections of SPEECHES, no miscellaneous works of amusement, very few travels, and not even a single good sermon."

[London Monthly Review for April, 1831.

MRS. CLARKE. In a late London paper it is stated that the likeness of the celebrated mistress of the late duke of York, has been expelled from all the shop windows of the city. Perhaps the history of no government furnishes such an example of great influence upon public affairs since Mrs. C. governed the armies of Great Britain, through the duke, who was at the head of that department. This celebrated lady for a time, made appointments, distributed commissions to her favorites, punished and removed her enemies, and endeavored to give the ton to the circle in which she moved—but she and the duke both fell under the displeasure of the public, and were forced to abandon their intrigues and their crimes, which were fully exposed at the time.

MR. NILES—AND THE BANK OF THE U. S.

We to-day lay before our readers Mr. Madison's letter to Mr. Ingersoll. We confess we have seen it with regret. The doctrine does not appear to us as sound and satisfactory. What is it but to say, that an encroachment on the constitution, if recognised by all the departments of the government, consecrates itself? That the sedition act, for instance, was at one time constitutional? It had not only all the departments of the government in its favor—but all the state legislatures, we believe, with the exception of Virginia and Kentucky.

We are not surprised to see Mr. Niles swerving from his moorings on this occasion—He now has no doubt as to the constitutionality of the bank. But hear him! in his last paper:

"Mr. Madison's letter concerning the bank of the U. States, must go far, indeed, to correct the judgment of those who have sincerely believed in the unconstitutionality of that institution. It was after his manner, but with much less power, that we have often reasoned with ourselves for several years past—and by so doing, had nearly retired from those opinions which we formerly entertained on that subject. But thus guided by the FATHER OF THE CONSTITUTION—one of the ablest and best men, too, that ever lived, we have no hesitation in saying, frankly and openly, that we now have no doubt as to the constitutionality of the bank of the United States, and that the question of re-chartering it should be decided according to the expediency of the proceeding—as presented, when the time to act upon the matter shall arrive."

Now, what said Mr. Niles in 1817; after, too, this very ground, which Mr. Madison takes about precedent, had been taken in his message of 1815, with his usual force. Hear Mr. Niles in 1817!—

"A like diversity of opinion has existed, and yet exists, as to the power of congress to establish a national bank. No such power is expressly delegated, and the powers not delegated are reserved to the states respectively, or the people. But congress have power "to provide for the general welfare," which, we humbly believe, would be much better promoted by roads and canals than it will be by the establishment of that bank.———'Time proves all things,'—if such an engine as that had been in the hands of those who endeavored to bankrupt the U. States in the late war, and who, with their comparatively small means, really did so much to depress the public credit—what would have been the consequence? Might they not have stopped—and would they not have stopped, if they could—'the wheels of the government?' On the other hand, if the government had retained more power in the direction of the affairs of this institution, it might be used to persecute and ruin the state banks, and individuals, whose political sentiments should not be considered orthodox. What has happened may happen again."

Here is not a word about the force of precedents; not a word here about the guide, and of the father of the constitution—(unquestionably, one of the best men and purest politicians that ever breathed)—But in 1817, forsooth, the bank was not considered as a branch of the great American System, which it is now attempted to be made!

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR OF THE REGISTER.

I thank Mr. Ritchie for the extraordinary magnanimity that he has shewn, in permitting me to speak for myself! It is so unusual for him to allow any one, whose misfortune it is to incur his "sovereign" displeasure, to be at all seen by the readers of the "Enquirer" except "as through a glass dimly," in the editor's own sublime presentations, that I have "stuck a pin" here to his everlasting praise!—and now have some hope, that, after the elections are over in Virginia, Mr. Ritchie will take courage to fulfil his engagement with me to discuss the "American System"—having, at least, partially defeated my purpose of speaking to the PEOPLE, rather than their servants, the members of congress, as I wished might have happened—giving to Mr. Ritchie the same opportunity of addressing himself to the judgment of my readers. I thought that I had laid a pretty snug little trap for the venerable editor of the "Enquirer," but he was "too old" to be caught in a liberal discussion until—after the elections! But it is no matter. I may yet meet him "at Philippi."

Mr. Ritchie is sorry—very sorry, indeed—melancholy, very melancholy, indeed, that Mr. Madison should have written his letter of June 25, 1831, to Mr. Ingersoll. Poor old man! Does not the infallible never-wavering guide in all things, whether of "faith hope or charity, or in whacking at the pope"—the incorruptible editor of the Richmond Enquirer, "pity" "the father of the constitution" in his dotage—though that letter has more beauty and power than all the Ritchies since the creation have displayed? But let that pass. Mr. Ritchie pities Mr. Madison and has pitied "Mr. Niles." How shall WE survive it?

For the information of my readers, though the editor of the Enquirer cannot any more comprehend what I may say than a Highlander ascertain the use of a knee-buckle, I shall explain the reason of the offensive paragraph that he has quoted.

It is well known that, for years past, (when the present president of the United States thought on such subjects as I did), I oftentimes endeavored to shew the constitutionality of laws to protect the NATIONAL INDUSTRY, or appropriate money for INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS; and that, having established such constitutionality, at least to my own satisfaction, I frequently exhorted others, who honestly differed in opinion with me, to yield up their opposition to the repeatedly established interpretations of the constitution in favor of the principles which I contended for. It is now several years since—I recollect it well—when privately reflecting upon the contents of one of my own essays in which the point alluded to was involved, that I stood self-accused of sheer impudence or palpable dishonesty, in offering a rule to others that I would not abide by myself, as to the bank of the United States; and, though I could not yet fully give up the prejudices or opinions that I had formed in by-gone days, I consented to waive them; holding myself "corrupt" if I should not "practice upon the maxims recommended to others"—however high the authority may be for earnestly advising many things and recklessly doing their opposites. In this frame of mind, I read Mr. Madison's letter—and I thought that it became me, as an honest man, to acknowledge the invincible power of his argument, so far as the constitutionality of the bank was concerned. To accept the monster proposed in place of that institution, was more difficult than to accept a president for life, with liberty to name his successor!—about which strict-construction Mr. Ritchie has been as mute as a "bull-frog frozen up in a "pond." What a croaking would he have made, had the late president of the United States recommended a thing so preposterous?*

So much on the point at issue. But I do not always carry on a Spartan warfare, which was content with driving an enemy into his own camp;—and shall, therefore, pursue Mr. Ritchie into his closet and "corner" him there, a little.

Mr. Ritchie has trenched himself under the oblivious nature of newspaper publications. No file of the "Richmond Enquirer" is accessible to me,—and perhaps, hardly ten sets exist any where. I have long and earnestly sought the use of one, without success. Still, I have some materials on hand—enough to bring out the consistency of that gentleman in bold relief, when I

*Mr. Ritchie has a vast power of discrimination! He seizes like a lion, upon that part of my paragraph, written about fourteen years ago, which suits him, as to the constitutionality of the bank—but notices not the latter clause, which as earnestly rejected the power of the government over the affairs of such an institution—which anticipated the "monster" latterly proposed!

please to use them: The following are offered as specimens of rich things among my collections of scraps. There are some of a much more wicked character; but I reserve them for future use, if necessary. It will be recollected Mr. Ritchie said that general Jackson was "too ignorant to interpret the plainest law, and denounced his election as a NATIONAL CURSE.

From the Richmond Enquirer of March 2, 1824.

After quoting several extracts from the life of general Jackson, Mr. Ritchie asks:

"What do we discover from these extracts?

"We discover that he soon grew tired of political life, and resigned his seat in the senate to one, whom he thought better calculated to serve the country than himself. We discover too that he resigned its [his] judicial functions 'to leave it open for those who were better qualified than himself to discharge its intricate and important duties.' But if these duties are so intricate and important, what shall we say to those of the chief magistrate of the United States?"

"We can commend gen. J's modesty in retiring from the senate and bench, when he discovered the superior qualifications of other people. Can we say as much for his modesty, when he is now aspiring to the highest office in the nation? Or are we to presume that as he retired from the senate and the bench when he discovered his deficiency, he may in the same manner retire from the chair, as soon as he shall have discovered that he is wielding in vain the bow of Ulysses?"

"No doubt the same modesty on the part of general Jackson which caused him to retire from public life, caused him also to play a very subordinate part in the great transactions of those times. Otherwise he never would have retired amidst the perilous storms which threatened to destroy the very constitution of the country."

"In what school then has he acquired the experience, information and qualifications of a statesman? Can a course of three months in the house of representatives, of five or perhaps eight months in the senate of the U. States, have trained him to so complete a knowledge of political pursuits, as to enable him to trust to the resources of his own mind, and exempt him from the control of cooler, more experienced and more CALCULATING counsellors?"

"All our previous presidents have been disciplined statesmen—one only excepted, one of those great men whom nature forms in her happiest mood, to astonish and improve the world.

> His life was gentle; the elements
> So mixed in him, that nature might stand up
> And say to all the world, this was a man.

When we name general WASHINGTON we produce a man "out of the file of precedents"—a man of that strong common sense, blessed with that cool equanimity of temper, gifted with that extensive knowledge of human nature, that he could always go to the best sources of information, when he himself did not possess it, weigh it for a long time, examine opinions in all their bearings, and finally decide for himself."

"General Jackson too is a man of fine talents; but his genius is of that rapid, fiery and impetuous order that would render it difficult for him to acquire the information necessary to guide his administration, AND WOULD CONTINUALLY SUBJECT HIM TO THE SECRET CONTROL OF SUPERIOR MINDS; OF A POWER BEHIND THE THRONE."

From the Richmond Enquirer of March 19, 1824.

"It is at all times an invidious office to criticise the character of a man who has served his country. But believing, as we conscientiously do, that gen. J. is not qualified either by his political information or by the spirit in which he exercises his authority, to administer the high powers of the executive magistrate, with advantage to our country, we feel ourselves bound to canvass his pretensions, and to dispute his success."

"We have attempted to show from the course of his life, from the confessions of his own respectable biographers, that he cannot be possessed of the extensive information of a great statesman—that this defect alone is sufficient to disqualify him for the executive chair."

"We have attempted to also show, by the record, that he has exhibited at Natchez and New Orleans, and in his correspondence with the governor of Georgia, an impetuous and arbitrary temper—which illy qualifies him for the high station to which he aspires."

"It has long been maintained as a maxim, that the man who cannot obey ought not to command: and the rule in the present case at least stands upon this sound reason, that the man who makes his own will and pleasure the sole rule and guide of all his actions' ought not to be trusted with the large powers of a president of the United States."

☞ And now for one out of many specimens—on the OTHER SIDE—

From the Richmond Enquirer of June 24, 1831.

We know that several gentlemen are in the habit of sneering at the character of Andrew Jackson. They depreciate his sense—they ridicule his pretensions to patriotism—and some persons have been heard to pronounce him as malicious as a serpent—and destitute of the manners of a gentleman. It was in vain that the late British minister (Mr. Vaughan) declared that president Jackson 'would be regarded in any society in Europe he had ever seen, as one of the most accomplished gentlemen of the age.' But our own countrymen must set him down as a barbarian as well as a tyrant—as a corrupter of the public morals—and as the tool of every magician or every junto which dares to approach him. As little justice has been done to this man, as was done to Thomas Jefferson. The memory of the one is now relieved from the calumnies with which it was sought to tarnish it during his administraton—and the time may come, when Jackson himself may be admitted to be something better than a dotard, a tool, or a tyrant. He has his faults. He has been guilty of errors, which his best friends are the first to admit—but like Jefferson, he has not met with even common justice from his bitter opponents. And why? the mass of these opponents have been misled in their opinions, by the organs of the opposition. The vilest calumnies have been propagated by the newspaper press—and no wonder, that with these partial views and insidious statements before them, even the liberal part of the opposition have been induced to form the most extravagant and erroneous opinions of the character of the man."

And now—let Mr. Ritchie "to supper with what appetite he may." "Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof"—at this "momentous crisis!" "Obsta principiis." "Nous verrons." "Verite sans peur!"

[It is proper to observe that the italics and SMALL CAPITALS used in the preceding extracts from the "Enquirer" were so marked by us—for manifest reasons]

BALTIMORE.

Foundations for new buildings, and the demolishing of old houses to be replaced by new, are to be seen in most streets of our city. The latter is perhaps a more striking symptom of improvement even than the former. The elevated situations near the cathedral, on Franklin street, and on the descent of the lofty hill between north Charles and Calvert streets, are rapidly occupied by new dwellings, most of them substantial, and some of them elegant buildings. Few cities possess sites more picturesque or healthy than this part of Baltimore, which will be farther embellished by the widening of the streets which meet at the Washington monument, and by the completion of the towers of the cathedral. In the south western district of the town, and throughout the suburbs, there is a very considerable increase of houses; and on Baltimore street, and those adjacent, the unsightly piles erected by the taste of our ancestors are altered, or replaced by others, in a better style. Granite from Maine or from the rail road, and marble from Baltimore county, are partially used in their construction. Seen from Hamstead hill, on a bright morning, the still enlarging city, spreading over a wide plain, and climbing its amphitheatre of hills, forms, with its busy harbor, the bay like estuary of the Patapsco, and the villas scattered over the woody heights, a gladsome and inspiring prospect, of which the statue of the father of his country, the pater patriæ, elevated high above every other object, forms an appropriate as well as imposing feature.

The cathedral. This edifice, justly admired as the principal ornament of our city, and a monument of the liberality and enterprise of the congregation by whom it was erected, remains, however, unfinished in some of its principal parts, wanting the portico and the two towers in front, which are included in the original design of the distinguished artist, the late B. H. Latrobe, by whom it was planned. We are gratified to learn that the congregation intend to commence immediately the construction of the two towers, according to the original plan, the drawings of which have of course been preserved. The wood work and other parts of the structure are already in preparation. We hope that few years will elapse before the whole edifice shall be completed, and properly enclosed and planted. The erection of the towers, and of the noble portico in front, will give due lightness and symmetry to the whole building, and complete one of the finest edifices in our country, both in the exterior and interior. The portico is to be of the Ionic order, and will consist of ten columns. As the cathedral occupies the highest point of ground in the city, its base being elevated 115 feet above the water, it is already one of the most striking features in a very picturesque locality, and, with these projected embellishments, will be much more so.

The whole height of each tower, from the top of the cornice of the building, including the portions of the towers already built, is 67 feet to the summit of the spire. At the height of about six feet above the present commencement, the towers assume a circular form, and consist each of eight piers, with intermediate arches. Above these are deep, bold, pannels, and over them again is the cornice, in keeping with the rest of the building. A step, or blocking course, rests upon this, supporting the saracenic dome, with its tall spire, that crowns the whole. The bell, which is of great weight and size, will hang on a level with the arches of the southern tower. It is proposed, we understand, to construct the piers and all the projections of stone, and the rest of the tower of brick, stuccoed. A brick dome covers the interior, and supports the dome and spire, which finish the towers externally.

The northern tower may probably be hereafter occupied by a clock. Were this illuminated at night, as is done in New York, it would be equally convenient and striking. [Baltimore American.

☞How would it delight the heart of that most benevolent and sweet-tempered gentleman—that lofty philanthropist and profound philosopher—that grave and sober and industrious statesman—that meekest of all slave-holders, and most consistent and worthy and republican of all tobacco-planters*—that "nuisance" or benefit, that "curse" or blessing, as Mr. Ritchie, seeing the strength of the "signs of the times" makes him out to be—that laborious and faithful representative of his country in foreign parts, the extraordinary minister for Russia—the "honorable JOHN RANDOLPH," if he could now pass through the streets of Philadelphia and Baltimore, and see the hundreds of old houses that are giving place for new and more splendid or convenient edifices, and the thousands of substantial dwellings that are being built on new locations—and learn that just as much business is doing in this way as there are materials and workmen to be procured! He would see "decayed, deserted, BALTIMORE,"* all life and activity—and perhaps he might count up, (if pleased to ascertain such facts), at least five thousand able-bodied freemen engaged in the various employments that belong to the building of houses and making of roads, only; and we could lead him into workshops where he might find thousands more, who would not bow themselves to the autocrat of all the Russias! And in PHILADELPHIA, "in a state of athropy," he would discover more "capital," by passing up a hundred alleys, respectively, than all his lands and slaves, and horses and hogs, on the Roanoke, are equal to—and ascertain also, that a lot on Market street, between 2nd and 3rd, only 25 feet front and 200 deep, on which is built an old house called the "Indian king tavern," has just been sold for forty-two thousand two hundred dollars, which, by reference to an old deed, was leased at fifteen shillings a year, a century ago—from which we "guess" that property has quite as rapidly advanced in value at Philadelphia, as on the "Roanoke!"

*We mention slaves and tobacco because that the "honorable" gentleman places all worth and value in them! Female virtue—the beaming kindness of the matron or the sparkling eyes of the maiden—the worth of WASHINGTON or value of FRANKLIN, are nothing compared with tobacco, and his negroes, Juba and John! We give the following extract from one of his speeches in the late Virginia convention, in proof of what we have just said. The speech at length is inserted in page 202, of the present volume.

"At that time, [before the "new order of things" in Virginia], sir, the commonwealth of Virginia was throughout a SLAVE HOLDING commonwealth: (WOULD TO GOD SHE WERE SO NOW!) And is it, then, so wonderful that SLAVES should have been a subject of taxation? Yes, sir: Virginia was then not only throughout a SLAVE HOLDING, but a TOBACCO planting commonwealth. You can't open the statute book,—I mean one of the old statute books, not those that have been defaced by the finger of reform,—and not see that TOBACCO was, in fact, the currency, as well as staple of the state. We paid our clerk's fees in TOBACCO: verdicts were given in TOBACCO; and bonds were executed payable in TOBACCO. That accounts for it all. While a large portion of the state has ceased to be a SLAVE HOLDING, and a still larger portion has ceased to be a TOBACCO planting community, the burden has rested on the necks of a comparatively small, unhappy, and I will say it, a proscribed caste in the community."

FOREIGN NEWS.

An arrival at New York, brings Liverpool dates to the 9th June inclusive.

POLAND.

In our last advices from this interesting part of the globe, the gallant Polish general and his brave army had driven the Russians, after a succession of brilliant affairs, across the Narew, and had compelled Deibitsch to retreat into Prussia for protection. This state of affairs existed on the 23d of May, but since then a bloody engagement has taken place between the main armies of the Poles and Russians, led respectively by Skrzynecki and Deibitsch, which resulted disastrously for the former; who, in his turn, has been driven back; some of the fruits of his recent victories wrested from him, and his main army was, at the last advices, resting under the guns of Praga for protection, his head-quarters again being established at Warsaw.

The Polish army under Skrzynecki was attacked by that of the Russians under Deibitsch, on the 26th May at Ostrolenska, when a sanguinary battle ensued, in which the Russian army was victorious. Ostrolenska was taken by storm by the Russians. The division of the Polish army, under gen. Geilgud, stationed at Lamza, has been entirely cut off, by the movements and successes of the Russians. The Poles acknowledge their own loss at 4,000 men.

In speaking of the battle of Ostrolenska, a writer says the oldest generals have no recollection of so sanguinary a combat. Generals Kicki and Kaminski and lieutenant colonel Gazenski, of the Polish army, were killed. In one of the accounts it is stated that 20,000 men, on both sides, remained on the field of battle. Quarter was out of the question, and the chief work was performed with the bayonet. The Poles, though much inferior in numbers, performed prodigies of valor, and amply sustained their ancient renown. Generals Bozuslowski, Pac, Skrzynski, Malachowski, and a great many other staff officers of the Polish army, are wounded. Three Russian generals are killed.

It appears from the bulletin of general Skrzynecki, that on the day previous to the bloody affair of the 26th of May, having effected the object of his forward movement, by conveying support to the revolted Lithuanians,

*See Mr. Randolph's speech of April 15, 1824, about the tariff and "privateering" at Baltimore—the want of "capital" in "over-built Philadelphia," and the "free negroes" there, and a variety of other subjects—some extracts from which may be found in page 81, of the present volume of the REGISTER.

he gave orders, for his troops to pass to the right bank of the Narew, which was effected on the evening of the 25th May, in good order. The rear guard under general Lubienski covering the passage of the army on the heights of Zekun and Lawy. In the morning of the 26th, the Russians attacked his positions with great impetuosity, under Deibitsch in person. General Lubienski retreated upon Ostrolenska, making a most vigorous resistance. His march was stopped by the city itself, which was set on fire by the mortars of the enemy. Having succeeded in passing to the right bank of the Narew, the Polish army attempted to destroy the bridge. This they were unable to effect, as the enemy were protected by a numerous artillery placed on the opposite bank. Several regiments of the Poles, under a most galling fire, attempted to arrest the progress of the Russians. The combat was for a long time one of slaughter—they fought man to man, and thousands were killed by being thrown into the dyke which passes along the marshy shore of the Narew. The Russians, it is stated in the official bulletin of Skrzynecki, towards night became exhausted and retired across the river, leaving only some sharp shooters on the right bank, who retrogaded as far as the bridge, the Poles keeping possession of the field of battle. The battle did not finally end until 12 o'clock at night, when the Poles commenced a retrogade movement on Pultusk, and subsequently to Warsaw.

The Journal des Debats states that several of the counties of Hungary have addressed representations to the emperor of Austria, in which they remind him of the services rendered to that country by Poland in the wars against the Turks, and of the great mistake committed by Austria, in permitting a country which protected her against Russia, to be sacrificed. They call also for the instantaneous revocation of the ordinances prohibiting the exportation of arms and provisions to Poland.

BELGIUM.

The national congress at Brussels, on the 4th June, elected prince Leopold king. He received 152 votes out of 196. There were 10 votes against him; 14 in favor of the regent, baron Surlet de Chokier; 19 of the members abstained from voting, and one vote was declared null.

The oath to be taken by his royal highness, prescribes that he shall swear "to observe the constitution and laws of the Belgian people, and to maintain the national independence and integrity of the territory," which includes the province of Luxemburg.

The London Morning Herald says that the ministers of the great powers have signified to prince Leopold that they will not agree that he should give this pledge, inasmuch as they had determined upon conferring that province on Holland. In this determination, it appears, prince Leopold concurs, and that he will consequently refuse the crown, when offered to him by the deputation, who were expected in London on the 8th June. It is said that lord Ponsonby had been instructed to break off negotiations and quit Brussels.

ENGLAND.

There had been serious disturbances among the workmen in the iron manufactories of Glamorganshire, who had struck for higher wages, and turned out en masse, menacing the superintendents if their demand was not granted. The military were called out, but the insurgents greatly outnumbered them, and drove them with stones to the town of Methyr Tydvil, where they took refuge in the houses, and were still assailed in them. The soldiers were provoked to fire into the mob, by which 14 were killed and wounded. The militia could not be depended upon. The mayor and several soldiers were severely wounded. The marquis of Bute, lord lieutenant of the county, was on the spot, and immediately sent despatches to the home office. The rioters are said to amount to 9,000, and the killed and wounded to 62. Two of the ringleaders, who had been taken into custody, declared on their examination before the magistrates at Cardiff, that the insurrection would not be confined to Wales, but that arrangements had been made for the simultaneous rising in other manufacturing and mining districts of the kingdom. A large military force had arrived at the theatre of riot, but the insurgents showed no disposition to return to their labor. The rioters took twenty barrels of powder from the Dowlain works.

IRELAND.

A large quantity of flour imported from Liverpool into Newry, had been seized by the custom house officers of the latter place, on the supposition that it was of American manufacture. A point had been raised on whom the onus probandi lay. The millers of Newry had taken the opinion of a Mr. Holmes, an eminent lawyer, who had decided that the proof that flour imported is of a British growth and manufacture, lies on the importer.

There had been some slight disturbances in Queen's county, which were aggravated by the police being permitted to fire into the people. In this county, provisions are abundant and cheap, potatoes being sold for a penny a stone. This is mentioned as being singular, in as much as there were 150,000 persons said to be famishing in Mayo and Connomaro, not more than sixty miles distant.

O'Connell left Dublin on the 1st June, for Limerick, to attend the commission in Ennis as counsel for the people. There were 276 persons in Ennis and 57 in Galway, awaiting their trial; 14 had been sentenced to transportation for life, for administering unlawful oaths. A deputation had arrived at Dublin from the Mayo central committee, to lay the state of the country before the government. All prosecutions for political offences had been abandoned. Emigration for America were never greater.

PORTUGAL.

It appears now that Don Miguel had refused to ratify the terms prescribed by the French government, and was disposed to abide the consequences. The French have captured five coasting vessels belonging to the Portuguese, off the mouth of the Tagus.

TURKEY.

The English ambassador at Constantinople has communicated with his government, that the sublime porte had given instructions for the establishment of a strict blockade of that part of the coast of Albania which lies within the Pashalick of Scutari, and of all the ports and harbors belonging to the same.

ITALY.

Paris, June 3. Letters from Milan, of a very recent date, speak of a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, between the new king of Sardinia and the Austrian government, by which the first is stated to place 60,000 men at the disposal of the second. The same letters add, that there are at Milan twenty-five Austrian generals, who have been called together to receive the instructions of gen. Frimont, commander-in-chief of the army in Italy.

POST-SCRIPT. Last evening's mail brought us London advices down to the 18th June, inclusive. We cannot do more than mention a few of the leading things stated.

Parliament had met, and Mr. Manners Sutton was re-elected speaker without opposition. No important proceedings had yet taken place.

Mr. McLane had declined a public dinner, previous to his return home, tendered by Americans in London, and has arrived at New York.

Paris appears to be a place of riot and disorder—the national guard was often on duty to put down the riotous, and had so far succeeded. Some blood had been shed. The people were calling out that aid might be given to the Poles. Much agitation prevailed.

It now seems probable, certain objections being waived, that prince Leopold will accept the crown of Belgium.

The ex-emperor of Brazil and his family had arrived in England, and proceeded to France.

It appears that the Polish army under gen. Chlapowski, gained a splendid victory on the same day that the bloody battle of Ostrolenska was fought—and have gained several other advantages. They have performed prodigies of valor. They are said to have fought a battle as bloody as that of Ostrolenska, and completely defeated the Russians under gen. Sacken—and that the army of Deibitsch had suddenly, and precipitately fallen back. The hope is freely expressed, that the Russians will be expelled and Poland be free! LAUS DEO!

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

☞The great length of Mr. Ingham's letter has excluded many things prepared for this sheet, and forbidden a detailed notice of the foreign news received last evening—London papers of the 26th June having arrived at New York.

The king opened parliament with a speech on the 21st June. The reform bill was read on the 24th, and ordered to a second reading on the 4th of July. France was tranquil. The news from Poland favorable—all was going on well. Deibitsch had been superseded in the command of the Russians, and is said to have died the next day of an apoplexy.

The prices of flour and cotton had fallen, and the demand was dull.

☞The current volume, which takes in the "Calhoun correspondence" and all the important papers that have grown out of or followed it, with an extraordinary mass of other interesting matter—is already running "short," and will not be sold separately for a less sum than a whole year's subscription; but will yet be furnished to new subscribers who desire to commence with it, paying for a year—such being the rule in this office.

☞The editor "returns thanks" for several flattering notices of him on the anniversary—and hopes that his "frolick" on that day will prove agreeable to many of his friends.*

☞Mr. Ritchie is so angry, that I'm afraid he won't enlarge his paper to discuss the tariff question with me!

☞Mr. Ingham's letter to the president will command universal attention. It unfolds some curious incidents, and prefers certain serious charges—but is rather vindicatory of himself; and does not much enlighten the public mind on the particular subject which now most interests the public feeling: but this is manifest, that the time is rapidly approaching when we shall have a free translation of Mr. Van Buren's "retiracy" letter, hitherto as incomprehensible as the mysteries of Isis, except to the initiated; and we expect further developements, with sincere regret for the character of them—but, avoiding rude and rough statements of editors, we shall feel obligated to preserve all such publications as are vouched for by names which ought to command the public respect.

The exact period when Mr. Ingham was offered the mission to Russia, might establish an interesting fact concerning Mr. Randolph, contested in the public papers. The charges against the president of his privity to the contemplated proceedings of Mr. Eaton, &c. are grave ones—and we suppose will elicit an authorized replication.

POLITICAL ITEMS. Mr. Van Buren was at New York waiting the arrival of Mr. McLane, and met him immediately after his landing.

Mr. John S. Barbour, of Virginia, again a candidate for congress, has explicitly avowed that he is not a "nullifier."

At a meeting of national republicans at Columbus, Ohio, arrangements were made for sending delegates to the convention to be held at Baltimore, in December next.

It was announced on Monday last—that Louis McLane, of Delaware, was appointed, by the president, secretary of the treasury—Martin Van Buren, of New York, minister plenipo. &c. to Great Britain, and Aaron Vail, of New York, secretary of legation to the same, in place of Washington Irvine, who had signified his wish to retire from that station.

The general election in Kentucky and several other of the western states, took place last Monday. The polls are kept open three days in Kentucky. All parties are anxious to learn the result. Some of the returns may be expected in our next.

From the elections so far as they have proceeded, it seems agreed that Mr. Mercer will be re-elected to congress from Virginia, and the venerable and good Newton be restored to his old place, from the Norfolk district. Princess Ann county, which in 1829 gave a majority of 2 against him, now gives a majority of 146 for him—200 votes more being polled in that county, (because of the extension of the elective franchise by the new constitution) than was ever given before. Mr. Stevenson has been re-elected.

COL. RICHARD VARRICK—the venerable and the worthy—the senior officer, we believe, of the revolutionary line in New York, died on the 30th July, in the 79th year of his age. His remains were interred with distinguished and well-deserved civil and military honors.

A RICH PRIZE. The princess of Orange lost her jewels in a mysterious manner, about two years ago—and, though large rewards were offered, no trace of them could be discovered. They were, however, particularly described, and it seemed probable that they would sometime be restored to the right owner of them.

On the night of the 27th inst. Mr. Swartwout, the collector of the port of New York, having reason to suspect that smuggled jewels were deposited in a house in Pearl street, obtained a search warrant and proceeded to examine—they were compelled to break open the house, and there found the jewels stolen from the princess of Orange, which were immediately transferred and deposited in the Mechanic's bank. They are supposed to be worth at least 100,000 dollars, and have been identified by the chevalier Huygens, minister from Holland. They were in the possession of an Italian named Carrara, who made his escape. Though these articles have been seized for a violation of our revenue laws, they will, no doubt, be given up because they were stolen. A large part of the jewels, however, is yet missing.

Carrara, alias Polan, has since been taken. He is a fellow of wonderful address, and seems to have had much experience in making hair-breadth escapes—but the well-laid plans of the New York police officers secured him, after a severe chase and desperate struggle. It is hoped that, through him, the rest of the articles may be recovered—and that he must needs have had accomplices, or have been entrusted with the jewels by those who purloined them. They were a nuptial present of the emperor of Russia to his sister, on her marriage with the prince of Orange—and it was pretty loudly whispered that the prince himself had abducted them!

"THE RUINOUS TARIFF." We might produce an hundred extracts from the speeches or writings of first rate "free trade" gentlemen, to shew the terror that beset them because that a protecting tariff would ruin the revenue and render a resort to direct taxation indispensable to support the government—and latterly, and from the same persons, the delightful hope that an abundant revenue will destroy the protecting tariff, and also preferring direct taxation as the most equita- ble mode of supporting the national government!!! The South Carolina "nullificators" are remarkable for such gross contradictions; as much so as on account of their topsey-turvey notions about "state rights." A few years since, the now high "nullifying" party, desperately resisted the election of judge Smith to the senate of the United States, because he did not think that all power was vested in the federal government—and latterly, they wickedly turned the same judge Smith out of the senate, for not believing that all power remained in the state governments! Mr. McDuffie, and his leading friends, have whirled about these points like a te-to-tum; on two of the sides of which are marked T for "take up," or P for "put down," as good management directs—or as the "wind blows;" which being at "north-east," the "difference between a hawk and a handsaw" may be clearly discerned! Some of these days, when I have an hour or two to spare, I may take up my "documents" and treat the public to a hearty laugh at the gentlemen who are nullificating themselves.

The following view of the prosperity of New York, which we copy from the Mercantile Advertiser, may be called common to all our chief places of commerce—especially the other great seats of trade, Boston, Philadelphia and Baltimore—which never were so flourishing as now: demonstrating the fact which the friends of the AMERICAN SYSTEM so confidently predicted, that the encouragement and protection of the domestic industry, by increasing the means of individuals to purchase, would add to the revenue of the government. And, though the duties on several important articles have been reduced, it is said that, in this high tariff year, the income from the customs will be four or five millions greater than it was last year—and yet so many new buildings were never going up in the United States, nor was money ever so abundant as at this time—never was the hum of industry more loud, nor its prosperity so great in the republic, as under the ruinous operations of the tariff laws!

From the New York Mercantile Advertiser.

"When we contemplate the immense amount of revenue collected here, we naturally think of the extent of our foreign commerce—the large fleets of vessels which crowd our wharves—the numerous enterprising foreigners who flock to our city, and our own merchants too, from every quarter of our extended republic, seek here a market for their produce, and supplies for their consumption. When we contemplate our rivers, canals, and roads, all leading to this metropolis, and the facilities afforded thereby for the transportation of produce and merchandize—and added to all, the capital and enterprise of our own merchants, we cannot refrain from feeling an inward satisfaction at the prosperity of our city, and predicting that at no very future day, New York, in population and in wealth, will outstrip the most sanguine anticipations of her citizens, and that she will, in all probability, before another century passes, rank among the first, if not the very first of cities in the world."

WOOL AND ITS MANUFACTURES. The price of this important article has a little declined, as every one foresaw that it must, when the speculators should begin to give way.* We have several times cautioned the farmers on this matter, and hope that none of them have a pound of wool to sell—provided they have obtained the cash for the product of their flocks, which should always be a first consideration when sales are made of commodities at extraordinary prices; and never neglected when such commodities, instead of being purchased by those who design to consume them, are monopolised by speculators †. These latter have recently been the chief purchasers of wool—the manufacturers only receiving so much as seemed absolutely necessary to keep their hands employed,—because of the arbitrary and artificial price of the article. We have always held a strong testimony against such speculations, but without much hope of preventing them—and they must and will "regulate themselves," like such dealings in flour, tobacco, cotton, &c. by which thousands have been, and thousands will be, ruined. They often yield apparent profits to agriculturalists,—but, in general, do material injury to society at large. Witness especially the many—the almost annual speculations that are made in flour, because of calculations on the foreign market—and the effects of them. Some farmers sell their wheat promptly, and do well; others hold on for a yet higher price, and obtain a much reduced one. Such are the "laws of trade," and we cannot change them. But it is always safe for producers to sell—if selling for cash only, on a rising market, if the price be considerably above the common average. This practice will succeed the best nine times out of ten. The advance price for wheat last spring, probably resulted in a general loss to the farmers—for it is also a "law of trade" that when price is forced beyond the real worth of a commodity, the current being changed, it descends lower than it should do, by a natural reaction. Every man's experience has taught him this—but how few are they who attend to it! The disposition to speculate seems implanted in almost every man's mind—and great caution is requisite to keep it within due bounds.

The price of wool was too high—that is, higher than the manufacturers could afford to pay for it. I know several manufacturers who sold to speculators the wool of their own flocks—clearly foreseeing that either the price must decline, or the operations of their factories be checked. Events might happen in Europe to advance the price of wool and cloths—but unless they should, or the duties levied on cloths were more honestly paid, wool, imported in cloth, would lessen the price of the home-production, or compel the manufacturers to shut up their mills; perhaps partially effect both, to the general injury of the country, in throwing many persons out of their usual employments—and so render labor less profitable. Wool, however, maintains a high price, and we heartily wish that it may steadily hold it, until the product of our flocks shall fully equal the demand; and then we shall have less of speculation to embarrass and distract the industry of our people. We chiefly desire REGULARITY in the market. We care less whether six or sixteen per cent. is made on capital vested in lands or factories, than that proprietors should know what they may reasonably calculate on. Here is the best guarantee of prosperity—the best assurance of profit; because that every prudent man, to use a trite saying, "cuts his coat according to his cloth." And in respect to wool, this principle is manifest—that, in proportion as the manufacturer flourishes, so does the farmer obtain good prices. In the present state of things, it is just as possible to separate the interests of man and wife, as these two kindred employments. The time may come when the profits of one may clash with those of the other, in the United States—but the present generation will hardly see it. It cannot happen until land becomes inaccessible to the industrious poor: then the principle of monopoly, involved in capital, may have effect—as well on land as on labor, and bear equally on either; the landlord exacting high rents, or the proprietor of a factory cheap labor—as in England and other European countries.

The high price of wool in Europe, in part caused by the mighty armies that have been recently raised and requiring new clothing, has had a considerable action on the price in America—seeing that our wool-growers are efficiently "protected," though such protection does not always advance prices—wool being very low in 1829. It may be generally observed, that the duty intended to be levied on raw wool is fairly paid—it cannot be more than partially avoided, because of the bulk and easily ascertained weight and quality of the article: but the intended reciprocity of protection to favor the manufacturers of wool, it is well known, is extensively evaded. The article below, copied from the "New York Evening Journal" is interesting on these points, and shews how wool may readily be imported almost free of duty. We wish the assertion carefully marked,—that our manufacturers of wool, because of the more extensive use of machinery, perform the labor of making cloth very nearly as cheap as it is performed by the half-starved and severely-worked operatives in England, and that the chief part of the advanced cost of making a yard of cloth, so far as it fairly exists, is more in the extra cost of the materials than in the manipulations of them. The tariff then is rather for the benefit of revenue on certain articles, or the protection of woolgrowers and indigo planters, than to give profit to the manufacturers: but each part belongs to a system, which, to be generally advantageous, should unite every interest—not only those named, but the growers of wheat, by an enlarged home market in consequence of the diversity of employments afforded. But all such British cloths as sell in our market at from 3¼ to 4 dollars, are either fraudulently imported—yield an enormous profit or incur an actual loss, to the owners of them. We shall demonstrate this with great simplicity.

All cloths costing more than 50 cents a square yard in foreign countries and not exceeding one dollar, are deemed to cost one dollar, and are subject to a duty of 45 per cent. on that valuation.

All cloths costing more than one dollar the square yard in foreign countries, and less than two dollars and an half, are deemed to have cost two dollars and an half the square yard, and are subject to a duty of of 45 per cent. on that valuation.

Cloth costing 6*s.* 9*d.* the running yard, 6-4 wide, exactly reach the dollar minimum. All costing more than 6*s.* 9*d.* are subject to the two and an half dollar minimum. Then Cents.

1 yard of cloth at 6*s.* 9*d.* sterling, equal to	150
Duty on 1½ square yards at 45 per cent. ad val.	67½
Freight and all other charges, say	32½
	250

And if the cloth sells for only 3¼ dollars, there is a clear profit of seventy-five cents on every yard!

On the other hand—
1 yard of cloth at 9*s.* sterling, equal to	200
Duty on 1½ square yards, valued at 250 cents the square yard, at 45 per cent.	*168¾
Freight and charges as before	32½
	400¼

And if this cloth is sold at even four dollars the yard, the owner must lose on every yard of it.

And hence we inevitably arrive at the conclusion—with almost as much moral certainty as that the sun shines when it is day, that all British cloths, selling at about 3½ dollars a yard, are fraudulently imported: AND THIS DESCRIPTION OF CLOTHS AT ONCE MAKE UP THE CHIEF AMOUNT OF THE IMPORTS, AND ARE THOSE WHICH DIRECTLY INTERFERE WITH THE BUSINESS OF THE WOOL GROWERS AND MANUFACTURERS OF THE UNITED STATES —PRODUCING ALL THE MISCHIEF THAT HAS LATTERLY BEEN COMPLAINED OF BY EITHER. A statement of these plain facts appeared indispensably necessary to a due consideration of the important subjects before us.

With these truths before the public—and which are, or should be, familiar to every one pretending to write on the subject, we see that earnest efforts are making, by politicians, to separate the interests of the woolgrowers from those of the manufacturers, and ruin both, that party may triumph! There are men like the witch in the fable, who disturbed "all h——" because "she had lost her little dog," that would bargain with "Satan for a seat upon his throne of fire"—many who have assumed the character of friends of "free trade" in the middle and western states, that their political dominion may prevail, themselves being bountifully provided from the public party-purse. Take the following extracts from the "Albany Argus" of the 18th ult. to shew how this thing is working:*

"Are the farmers of this country advised of what were the real objects of the convention of manufacturers recently held in the city of New York?

"Were not its objects political and mercenary?

"Was not one of its objects, a combination, to prevent the advance, or to reduce the price of wool; did not the members of the convention enter into such combination; and have not its consequences been already felt by the farmer and wool-grower?

"Was it not another of the objects of the convention to advance the interests of Mr. Clay to the presidency; and was not much of the labor of the convention, in and out of doors, directed to this object? Was it not, in short, a political convocation?"

The editor of the "Argus" is chief usher in the non-committal school. It is his business to insinuate what he DARES not affirm. The morality of such a course might well be questioned, if taught in any other than that school—but "all's fair in politics" with its precious disciples! I dare the editor of the Argus to put himself on the veracity of the things meanly hinted in his queries. There is not the shadow of a truth in them—and I must believe that he knows it. If otherwise, let us have his proof—these matters are too important to have been transacted "in a corner." I attended that convention, and had free and frequent communications with its members, in their public or private meetings, whether for business or friendly intercourse, and pronounce it FALSE, that political considerations were introduced to influence gentlemen. Indeed, because the convention was made up of persons of mixed politics, a restraint seemed to be laid which prevented even those common remarks which abound in almost every gathering of private individuals. I pronounce it false that any project "to prevent the advance or reduce the price of wool" was entertained; and that any part of the in or out-door labors of the "convocation" were directed to advance the interests of Mr. Clay to the presidency. The object of the meeting was boldly and frankly avowed—to prevent frauds on the revenue, and so secure to wool growers and the manufacturers that protection which the law intended to give them; and it was more than once stated, that the interest of the two were inseparable. No "trifle light as air" was passed on that could, by any possibility, be construed into either of the points insinuated by the editor of the "Argus," whether in public or private—in the body of the convention, or in social communication, to the best of my belief. I heard not a word said to have effect on the price of wool—though its high price was casually mentioned as productive of present injury to the manufacturers, and future harm to the farmers: but it was also said, that these things must and would regulate themselves. So much for the late convention at New York, of which I am bound to speak the truth, having been invited to a seat therein.†

---

* This high rate of duty was intended to secure the home market for the benefit of our wool growers and manufacturers—because that our wool was thought just fitted to supply the quality of cloths being between the minimums, of 100 and 250 cents; and if the duty was really and honestly paid, it would prohibit the importation of such cloths as sell for from 3 to 4 dollars a yard. But the duty on cloths costing 13*s.* 6*d.* the yard, is no more than on those which are one farthing above 6*s.* 9*d.*

* The affiliated presses, OF COURSE, abound in like articles—

The bell-sheep cries out "baa!—And all the throng,
"Ewes, lambs, rams, wethers, bellowing roll along."

† The profligacy of the things hinted at in the Argus, is shewn in the published proceedings of the convention. The agriculturalists, mechanics and manufacturers are invited to form state societies, with a view to the organization of a "national association." Now, however well it may suit the "Argus" and other papers of its caste, to put down the manufacturers as rogues—they certainly cannot be thought fools enough to invite the farmers into associations, the leading object of which is to swin-

The policy of the present duties on very coarse and very fine wools was much questioned, when first proposed—and by no persons more decidedly than the intelligent farmers, who attended at Washington in 1828, or otherwise gave their opinions on the subject, because believing that our country was not prepared to furnish supplies of such sorts of wool: and so it had been at the Harrisburg convention, in which the farming interest was fully represented. That convention petitioned that all wool costing more than eight cents per lb. in a foreign country, should, at once, pay a duty of twenty cents per lb. to be increased annually 2½ cents, until reaching fifty cents per lb. Thus, on the highest priced and very coarse wools, the duty would not be heavy; but on the middling qualities, (the crop of the United States), then averaging less than 40 cents per lb. the duty would instantly act as a protection equal to 50 per cent. on the selling value of the domestic commodity, and advance to 125 in process of time, becoming prohibitory in its nature, (if fraudulent importations of cloths could be prevented), as to the qualities then produced, or likely to be abundantly grown, in the United States. Duties upon the coarse wools were specially objected to, as uselessly advancing the cost of coarse cloths, of which the domestic manufacture soon promised to equal the demand. But whether the policy was right or wrong—no effort is making to change it; though it was universally believed that the duty on coarse wool, like that on molasses, was introduced to defeat the tariff bill of 1828—all the resolute opponents of the American System in congress voting for both. The old maxim, "tell me what company you keep, and I'll tell you what you are," was severely manifested on that occasion. We shall be glad if in the issue it shall appear, that both parties were mistaken, as to the operation of that duty.

There is nothing more clear than this—that the interests of the wool-growers, so far as they depend on the duties levied and collected, are much better secured than those of the manufacturers; but no complaint is made on that account. It offers no ground for jealousy to the manufacturers, so far as we have heard any opinion expressed; on the contrary, it has been satisfactory, in holding out the prospect of an independent supply of wool. But the interest of both parties equally required that wool, in cloth, should not be imported almost free of duty, as it is when cloths, entered under the one dollar minimum, are such as sell for 3½ dollars—wholesale price. But may not the farmer as well confide in the domestic competition for the price of wool, as that of wheat! If the manufacture of either flourishes—the value of the chief material advances; and new establishments will certainly rise up, for millions on millions of dollars are seeking new and profitable investments. There cannot be any "monopoly"—and it is IMPOSSIBLE that a "combination" should exist to keep down the price of wool. But without success in the manufacture, it is also IMPOSSIBLE that wool should bear a high price in the United States. Sheep are chiefly reared with us for their wool, in Europe because of their flesh. The value of the animal depends upon elements totally different—the carcass is an extra consideration in America, and is cheap; but wool is the extra profit in Europe, and, on the same principle, is cheap. But because of the easy access to land in the United States, the small cost of its fee or annual rent, were mutton half the price with us that it bears in Europe, we should soon export immense quantities of wool—20 millions of dollars worth probably, if the foreign market would receive it. The average value of land fitted for the support of sheep in the United States, must be less than one-tenth part of the value of such lands in England and Germany—and as land may be regarded as the chief material for breeding sheep, we should certainly raise them at much the lowest rate. No intelligent man can reflect a moment on this important matter, without seeing the force of what we have just stated. It is then the manifest interest of American manufacturers to encourage the growth of American sheep—as much so as it is that of the millers that grain should be plenty and good—the effect in both being reduced price because of an abundant supply: and equally the interest of the farmers to wish success to the manufacturers, that they may have a prompt and fair demand. The profits of the two are inseparably connected. As well might the belly quarrel with the members, or an arm with a leg. I once saw a drunken fellow severely whip his legs because they would not stand still!—and some, intoxicated with politics, are just as ready to lash themselves. To both we recommend a good fashion that prevails, of being TEMPERATE!

die the latter out of a fair price for their wool! This is "too tough." The surveyor of the port of New York is hardly reckless enough of honesty and truth, to present a case so much at war with a decent respect for the judgment of even his own heartless associates.

[From the N. York Evening Journal.]

FRAUDS ON THE REVENUE.

Mr. Jenks—In my communication for your paper of yesterday, I denied the assertion made by the Journal of Commerce, "that the manufacturers enjoy a protection of 50 per cent. against fraudulent importers."

First being distinctly understood to disavow the principle, that a protection to the home industry is a tax on the community, I will state to you my views on this subject, and challenge the Journal of Commerce, or any other print, to prove them untrue.

Every yard of cloth contains about two pounds of wool, which constitutes about one-half of its value. Now a dollar minimum cloth costs per running yard in England —$1 50: if it cost higher it cannot be legally entered at the dollar minimum.

2 lbs. of wool a c 37½ is	c 75
Duty on 2 lbs. of wool
First specific duty c 8
Advalorem duty 50 per cent. 37½
	45½
Whole amount of duty on one yd. 6*s.* 9*d.* cloth, is	c 67½
Duty on the wool	c 45½
	c 22

The manufacturer then has 22 cts. protection on the yard of cloth, the value of which being in England $1 50, the protection amounts to only 15 per cent.

Admitting the principle of the Journal of Commerce, fifteen per cent. is the protection the manufacturer receives, if the cloth be legally imported.

But suppose the cloth be entered at the dollar minimum, having cost 9*s.* sterling, which is—$2

The case will then stand thus—
Specific duty on 2 lbs. of wool	8
Ad valorem duty on 2 lbs.	50
	58 cts.
Whole duty on a dollar minimum cloth per yard	67½
Deduct duty on 2 lbs. of wool	58
	cents 9½

The manufacturer then has a protection of nine and a half cents on $2, which is four and three quarters per cent.

Thus it appears that instead of fifty per cent. protection, in all cases of fraud, such as I have stated, and thousands of pieces of such cloths have been, and they are continually so imported, the fifty per cent. protection of the Journal of Commerce is literally but four and three quarters per cent. It will be recollected that the great reason why cloths cost so much less in England, and consequently why it costs our manufacturers so much more to make them, is the great difference in price in the cost of wool; wool being from fifty to seventy per cent. higher in this country than in England.

The duty on the cloth is therefore clearly, as I have stated it, principally for the benefit of the wool grower; for if the duty were taken off from imported wool, the farmer would have no sale for American wool.

What now becomes of all the clamor raised against the manufacturer? Is not our brother Yankee ashamed of his ignorance of matters upon which he pretends to instruct the community?

How can any thing else be expected from men who are so blind, as to be continually asserting that the tariff injures commerce, when the least candid investigation of the subject affords the most ample and satisfactory proof, that a repeal of the tariff would cause the most serious evil to every productive industry of the country.

Palmam qui meruit ferat.

To the editor of the Evening Journal.

Dear sir—During one of those peregrinations to which the character of a crowded metropolis annually and instinctively propels man, to regain elasticity of nerve and brilliancy of mind, my inclination guided me through the verdant and luxurious undulations of Dutchess county. The delightful appearance of the country, its high cultivation, the convenient and elegant dwellings, and the spirit of order and wealth reigning every where, made me remember and exult in the general prosperity of our beloved country at this period, and, above all, that of the farming interest spreading its blessings more widely than any other.

To inform myself of the cause of such pleasing results, I referred myself to the practical knowledge of one of the most extensive farmers, who very intelligently expressed himself to this effect: "The farmer prospers; he finds a market at good prices for his productions; foremost among these, in this county, are the fleeces of his flocks; and such is the increase of revenue from this source, that about 300,000 highly improved sheep, furnishing above 800,000 lbs. of wool for annual sale, and producing formerly about $200,000, since the more prosperous state of the woollen manufactures protected by tariff, they have yielded

In which latter year the price received for wool was higher than at any time since the late war." He stated further that the benefit derived from this one article to all the wool growing states, would probably add this year $30,000,000 to the revenue of the farmer; and that the congenial climate and general character of this country would admit and soon effect an extension of the present number of sheep, computed at above 20,000,000, to 30 or 40,000,000, provided only that a home market were secured.

I proceeded, much gratified by this account of the golden fleeces and golden prospects of our country, and with a sincere wish that due credit might be given to the skilful and industrious woollen manufacturer, and, by attention to this evidently important interest, that he also might participate in the golden rewards that he has so long in vain struggled to obtain.

SCRAPS ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE PROGRESS OF THE AMERICAN SYSTEM AND INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS, &c.

The tolls collected on the "Pennsylvania canal" for the quarter ending June 30th, amounting to $19,835 89½.

The Poughkeepsie Telegraph says that the enterprise of the people of Hudson, in sending ships to fish for whale, has reduced the price of oil twenty-five per cent. in all the river towns. Here is a beautiful effect of domestic competition—always safe, and profitable to the people. A whaling company is about being formed also at Newburg, with an adequate capital.

The Kanawha Banner says—The following is an exhibit of the salt manufactured, inspected, and weighed in the county of Kanawha, for the quarter ending the 15th June, 1831, as abstracted from the returns of the inspector—289,892 bushels 35 pounds.

The value of the property conveyed through the Miami canal to Cincinnati, from the 5th March to 26th May, was $778,342.

In the month of June 8,109,952 lbs. of property arrived at Cleveland, Ohio, by the canal, and 2,365,560 lbs. ascended from that port.

Lead is now selling at Galena at three dollars the 100 pounds. This is a great advance, and we are glad to see it. The glut has heretofore been so great in market, owing to causes at war with the industry of the country, that the article has been sold at prices far below its real value. Great losses and much individual suffering was the consequence, in the mining districts.

The Lowell Journal states that a new Catholic church was consecrated in that town on Sunday last, and that there are now erected or erecting in that place eleven places of public worship. The editor says, he knows of no town in the country, where so large a portion of the people attend public worship, and no tax for its support has ever been assessed.

Over $1,200 was collected in Lowell for the Fayetteville sufferers.

According to a statement recently published, the flourishing and wealthy county of Lancaster, Pennsylvania, contains at this time, seven furnaces, fourteen forges, one hundred and eighty-three distilleries, forty-five tan yards, twenty-two fulling mills, one hundred and sixty-four grist mills, eighty-seven saw mills, nine breweries, eight hemp mills, five oil mills, five clover mills, three factories, three potteries, six carding machines, three paper mills, two snuff mills, seven tilt hammers, and six rolling mills.

The Lawrence Manufacturing company, at Lowell, was incorporated at the late session of the legislature, with a capital of $1,200,000. The purchases of mill sites and the contracts for buildings and machinery, were made in May, and the intention is to commence the manufacture of printed goods as soon as the necessary works can be completed.

The Tuscumbia rail way has been commenced in Tennessee. The length of the road is not stated, but it is expected to be completed in the present year, at the cost of about $3,500 per mile for a single track.

The Albany and Schenectady rail road is expected to be finished this month—August. Its length is 16 miles—cost about $300,000 for a single track, or 450,000 for a double one. Locomotive engines are to be used—one of Mr. Stephenson's is speedily expected from England, and a "Yankee" is building another. The stock is much above par. The numerous locks on the canal between Albany and Schenectady, have rendered this road almost indispensable, because of the great increase of business.

The proprietor of the Manufacturers Hotel, at Providence, addressed the following note to a clergyman who was soliciting aid to rebuild the Episcopal church at Fayetteville, of which church Mr. Brastow is not a member. The rev. Mr. Buxton was promptly presented with 200 dollars in Providence, though 2,000 had just been given for the relief of the sufferers at Fayetteville—

Providence, July 9, 1831:

Rev. Mr. Buxton, sir: The object of your visit to this place, was made known to me this morning. I have to request that you will tarry at my house as long as suits your convenience, and that when you depart you will not call for your bill. I am with respect, your obedient servant, S. BRASTOW.

The "Cincinnati Gazette" says—In consequence of a rise in the iron and nail market at Pittsburgh, of $10 a ton, the dealers in those articles in Cincinnati, have been compelled to advance the price in the same proportion.

Stock to the amount of 500,900 dollars has been subscribed to make a rail road from Troy, New York, to Vermont. Only 450,000 dollars were required.

A project is on foot to incorporate a company to make a rail road from New York to Albany, with a capital of 2,000,000 dollars.

One hundred and twenty-one thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven barrels of flour were shipped from Rochester from the opening of the canal, (15th April), to the 15th July.

Sixty-three boats, with 2,206 tons of coal, came down the Schuylkill last week; making a total of eight hundred and two boats with 26,970 tons.

In the course of a late week, thirty-eight boats descended the Reading locks, freighted with lumber, grain, &c. and above five thousand bushels of bituminous coal. Forty-two ascended; of which twenty-three carried merchandise, salt, &c.

The tolls collected on the Morris canal, in 10 days, ending 19th July, amounted to eleven hundred dollars.

One acre of land near Boston, produced as many cucumbers as sold for five hundred dollars, up to the 16th July!

The Nantucket Enquirer says—"the building of vessels has at length commenced in this place—and adds, that this happens in "spite" of the tariff. Well—we are glad that it happens "any-how."

The village of "Great Falls," in Somersworth, N. H. stands on what was one of the rudest and roughest parts of the "Granite state," seven or eight years ago. It now contains between 3 and 4,000 inhabitants, remarkable for their industry, morality and comfortable condition. "Salmon Falls" a little below, is another beautiful village. Dover, not far distant, is one of the largest inland towns of New England—it has 7 or 8,000 busy, thriving inhabitants. Ten years ago it was a small village, and the "loath of decay" was gnawing its foundations, as the Hartford Review well observes. The church spires, factory cupolas, and neat white houses, that abound in these and other manufacturing villages, present a delightful appearance to the eye, while the sober industry and cheerful morality of the working people, gladden the heart of philanthropy. As Dr. Franklin said, they may be called "generative" establishments—for, by increasing the means of subsistence, "they encourage marriage." The doctor regarded population as the first principle of national power, and hence he advised that our workshops should be at home.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

The postscript in the last Register gave a hasty sketch of the news brought by the last arrival from New York. The latest London paper is of the 18th June.

The only business transacted by the new parliament which met on the 4th June, was the re-election of the speaker and the putting in the customary demands of the commons of liberty of speech, &c.

The two Landers had arrived in England from Africa, by the way of Rio Janeiro.

Mrs. Siddons, the distinguished actress, died in London on the 12th June.

[Prince Louis Napoleon Buonaparte, second son of Louis Buonaparte, and Achilles] Murat, had arrived in London, and waited on earl Grey. They were staying with the duchess of St. Leu, formerly queen of Holland.

The earls of Fingall and Sefton, lord Kinnaird and Mr. Agar Ellis, have been created barons of the United Kingdom.

The government of England had ordered a strict quarantine to be performed to prevent the introduction of the cholera. All vessels coming from suspected places are to be sent to the Lazarettoes.

There was lying at Spithead a large fleet, where a vice-admiral and a rear-admiral have each their flags flying on board a first rate of 120 guns.

The duke of Wellington, on the anniversary of the battle of Waterloo, was to go to Windsor to present to the king the annual tri-colored flag, the presentation of which is the tenure by which he holds the lands and manors purchased for him with the people's money.

The colliers and miners had turned out to the number of 20,000, and the military had been called in to the aid of the civil authorities.

SCOTLAND.

The reverend E. Irving has been, by a vote of 147 to 40, excluded from preaching in any of the churches in Scotland, under the jurisdiction of the general assembly. His offence consists in having written a work in which he contends for the peccability of Christ.

IRELAND.

The number of convictions at Ennis, in the county of Clare, are said to be great. The culprits were generally sentenced to transportation for life. Several executions for murder had taken place. The presence of Mr. O'Connell seems to have had a good effect on the peasantry, many of whom delivered up their arms to him. There were still 307 prisoners in the jail at Ennis, when the commission adjourned.

In the starving counties, potatoes are but 2*d.* per stone, 14lbs. but so completely have the absentee landlords drained the district of money, that the people have not even 2*d.* to give to save their unhappy families and selves from starvation!

FRANCE.

Paris had again become the theatre of tumult and disorder, and each night during the greater part of the month of June but added to the tumultuous scenes of the preceding ones. The Fauburg St. Dennis had been the principal place of riot. The destruction of property, and the maltreating of individuals, were nightly occurrences in that quarter, and the mobs were adroit enough to consummate their mischief and get off before the arrival of the national guard, who were upon each occasion called out. A jeweller who struck a balladsinger for crying "A history of Napoleon's hundred days," had his house mobbed, and imprudently firing two pistols into the mob, the multitude became exasperated, and entering his dwelling, threw his furniture into the street and there burnt it. The jeweller was arrested and carried to prison.

POLAND.

Intelligence from Warsaw to the 6th June states that on the same day that the battle of Ostrolenka was fought, that general Chlapowski brought the Russians to battle and gained a complete victory. The Russians were commanded by general Sacken, and the conflict took place at Mariampol, and must have been a dreadful one, as the town was retaken twice and taken thrice by assault. The Russians were finally expelled and dispersed. The Poles were greatly aided by the revolting people, who joined them in the battle of Mariampol. In several minor affairs, the Russians had also been defeated and sustained considerable loss. At Bialostockily, 120 Russian wagons were taken by the insurgents. In Volhynia the fortress of Herman fell into their hands, after a well contested and sanguinary battle, in which the Russians left 1,200 dead on the field of battle. The Russian army had begun to move to the right bank of the Narew. The Polish general Lubienski, in his retreat from Chirchnowiec, with 6,000 Poles, cut his way through 40,000 Russians.

The Jews at Krukiszew and Laszezow assisted the Russians, and pointed out to them the houses of the Polish patriots.

Prince Czartoryski, it is supposed would be appointed regent of Poland; by this step it is thought greater unity would be imparted to the government.

The landholders in Lithuania, in order to render the revolution popular, had emancipated their peasantry. These successes of the Poles and the retreat of the Russians, will, it is said, carry the war into Russia.

A Polish commandant of artillery galloped up to the Russian infantry, during a battle, with twelve pieces of artillery, and discharged them seven or eight times at the distance of fifty paces. He is said to have annihilated twenty battalions!

The wide spread of the insurrection is proved by the late bloody battle at Herman, on the Ukraine, nearly 600 miles from Warsaw, on the very verge of south eastern Poland. This feature of the war inspires a hope that Poland will be free.

PORTUGAL.

Don Miguel continues to refuse answers to the demands of the French government, and alleges that the consul is incompetent to make them.

The French had completely blockaded Lisbon and no vessel could pass over the bar. They had captured many Portuguese vessels.

The minister of the interior and of the marine have sent orders to all the smaller ports of the kingdom, not to permit a single ship to put to sea, taking care to state that this arrangement was but temporary, and would last only until the allies of Portugal could send a fleet to set things to rights.

Every sea-fort, in a condition of resistance or offence, has been garisoned.

TURKEY.

The refractory spirit manifested by the pacha of Scutari, may be considered as subdued.

GREECE.

Accounts from this country are unfavorable to its tranquility. The people are suffering exceedingly.

A subsequent arrival at New York from Havre brings Paris dates to the 20th June, inclusive.

FRANCE.

The disturbances in Paris have been quieted.

General Lafayette has published a long address to his constituents, offering himself for re-election. He does not think that the new government has moved according to the principles of the revolution of July, 1830, and looks to the result of the approaching elections to induce a return to them, and thus complete the work so well begun. Hereditary peerage he thinks cannot stand.

BELGIUM.

The congress at Brussels have disavowed the partial attacks made on the Dutch, and declared its determination to punish the perpetrators of all similar assaults, in future. The late advices from London are favorable to the belief that Leopold will accept the crown. There had been skirmishing at Antwerp on the 15th June, between the Belgians and Dutch.

A paper was circulated in Brussels for signers' demanding the regent to march against the Dutch, and declaring war the only thing that could save the liberties and honor of the country.

The regent had addressed a letter to prince Leopold, asking his interference with the commissioners of the great powers, at London, to secure to Belgium her just rights—the regent asks this as a pledge of his love for the Belgic people. Upon the result of the determination of these commissioners, he states, depends the peace of Europe.

POLAND.

The Havre Journal of the 21st June, states that Deibitsch, the Russian commander in chief, had been superseded by general Paskewitch, and gives as its belief that government had determined to act for Poland, in connection with Great Britain.

BRIEF NOTICES.

Dr. Webster. In a lecture lately delivered at Portland, Dr. Noah Webster stated "that, to prepare himself for the great and principal work of his life, his dictionary, he made himself acquainted with twenty different languages."

Dogs. Six hundred and twelve dogs were regularly killed and buried in Philadelphia up to the 15th July, in the present season. These animals, we hope, are about to cease being nuisances in our cities. We hear of several new cases of hydrophobia—on account of which, and for destroying sheep in the country, the breed promises to become less numerous than at present.

A windfall. We understand (says the Philadelphia U. S. Gazette), that a respectable mechanic, now residing in this city, received a letter from London by the packet ship Corinthian, on Saturday last, announcing the fact, that he had fallen heir to a title and estate worth £80,000 per annum. The subject of this paragraph is, as we learn, a very respectable and pious man, of the Methodist persuasion.

[We believe that the Philadelphia mechanics have furnished three lords for Great Britain, and hope that they will improve the stock of nobles, in that land of lords and paupers. It wants mending, sadly. Six of Mrs. Jordan's children have lately been thrown into the "Corinthian order" of British society.]

Bene plant. It is stated that the Bene plant, which is to be found in some of our private gardens, is an infallible cure for the summer complaint—the lives of many thousand children have been saved by this valuable remedy. A single leaf of this plant, put into a half pint tumbler of pure water and stirred round, the water immediately becomes ropy, but not discolored; it is perfectly innocent—the taste not disagreeable—it has been administered with perfect safety to children, and in some instances to infants only a few days old.

Change of opinion. Recollections of July. "I received a ball in the thigh on the 28th, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, near the Pont des Arts. I was carried to the hospital with some twenty other wounded, and M. Deputren came in an hour to visit us. He treated us pretty roughly, called us canaille, and asked us whether we had not much better have remained at home, than come out to be shot. He also added, "I shall cure you very soon, that you may be sentenced very quickly also. The next day (the 29th), he came in the morning. He spoke to us with much mildness, and gave us to understand that our imprudence would probably be pardoned. On the 30th he visited us again, asked us a thousand questions, each one more paternal than the other, and finished by praising our courageous devotion. I have read within a few days in the Moniteur, a public acknowledgement of the generous interest with which he attended the wounded." [Paris paper.

"The Magdalen report." The feelings of the people of N. York have been exceedingly outraged by a report lately issued by the "Magdalen society" of that city. It encourages the belief, or rather states, that about 27 per cent. of all the women in New York, are prostitutes! This abominable libel on the females of that city, will be pleasant as a "precious ointment," to the "London Quarterly Review," &c. The authors of this report are justly reprobated—and should be condemned to live at the "Five Points," all the rest of their days.

Spontaneous combustion. The ship Isaac Hicks, lying at Charleston, S. C. laden with 1,430 bales of cotton, was recently discovered to be on fire, which was not extinguished until 13 or 14 feet of water was forced into her hold. The cotton had been taken on board when damp, and no doubt was entertained of a spontaneous combustion. A large part of her cargo was entirely ruined. The ship, herself, not much injured.

The cholera infantum, or "summer complaint." Eighty-three children died in Philadelphia the week before last.

Old times. The first vessel built in New England, was in 1622, at Plymouth, and was a large boat or shallop.

The second was the "Blessing of the Bay," a vessel of forty or fifty tons, built by gov. Winthrop, in 1631, at Mistick now Medford, and launched on the 4th July.

The third was built in 1636, at Marble Harbor, (Marblehead), by the "Salem people." This vessel was 120 tons burthen, and called the "Desire."

In 1641, the "Plymouth people" built another of 50 tons. [Boston Transcript.

A lad of spirit. The Cincinnati Gazette states that a lad recently climbed the court house steeple, 150 feet from the ground, and straightened the vane, which from politics, or some other cause, needed reformation. He demanded one dollar, but the public officer, exultingly looking at the reformed vane, would give but 50 cents. The boy turned on his heel and when the officer, looked at the vane 20 minutes after, he found it had been Nortonized. The reformer had again ascended. Since then several offers have been made to have it fixed, but no man could be found to peril his neck.

Diving for silver. It will be recollected by many that the British frigate Thetis was wrecked off the coast of Brazil with a million of dollars on board, all which went down with her; but the captain of the British vessel of war, Lightning, has fished up 100,000 dollars, and said that he expected to get the whole million.

Oregon. The St. Louis Republican says—"The American society for encouraging the settlement of the Oregon territory," propose to enlist 1,000 men for the purpose, to rendezvous in this city, in January next. Each man will receive gratuitously a lot of land. There is said to be "an immense water power up the Wallamot or Multnomah." We think the water power at St. Anthony's fall quite as great.

Copper boilers. A most lamentable accident, the consequence of inexcusable negligence, happened at the hospital of the St. Esprit, at Toulon, (France), on the 17th of May. The previous evening there had been a distribution of soup to the poor; but the whole supply not being exhausted, the remainder was put in the copper boilers in which it had been made till the next day, when it was divided between 12 poor old women, and within a few hours after, every one of them expired in dreadful agony.

Memorable saying of Kosciusko. When this brave Pole arrived at Cracow, where the revolution commenced, he made, to the little band of patriots under his command, the following heart-stirring speech. "We are not strong enough in number to be victorious, but we are enough to die with honor in defending."

Stones of a ton weight were lodged in the second story of a mill at Chambersburg, by the late flood!

Smyrna. Very alarming earthquakes were lately felt in this city, and it was apprehended that most of the houses would be thrown down, had the shocks lasted much longer.

Judge McLean. The Springfield "Western Pioneer" says—We understand that the remarks of this gentleman, in reply to the complimentary toast given to him on the 4th ult. were very inaccurately reported. Instead of saying, that he was "little used to public speaking," he said that it was not customary, he understood, for the members of the supreme court, to indulge on such occasions, in a course of general remark, and he should offer that as an apology for not doing so. That, under other circumstances, custom had so fully established the practice of responding to such expressions of kindness, he should yield himself to its influence, &c.

He also observed that he was particularly gratified to learn that both political parties had united, on that occasion, to celebrate the national festival.

Carter Littlepage, esq. clerk of the Nansemond county court in Virginia, has been superceded by Mr. J. T. Kilby, who, it seems, had long transacted the business of the office, as a deputy. Mr. Littlepage was appointed to the clerkship previous to the revolution—and was thought to be the only man in Virginia that held a place by virtue of a British commission.

Mother of Washington. The treasurer of the monumental committee, acknowledges in the Fredericksburg Herald of the 8th ult. the receipt of $775, towards erecting a monument to Mrs. Washington, on or near the spot where her ashes repose. Of this sum, $550 was collected in New Orleans.

That paper says that Silas E. Burrows, esq. of New York, some weeks since, offered to erect the monument at his sole expense—this, not comporting with the designs of the committee, was declined. He has subsequently, however, taken upon himself to furnish the whole of the iron railing that may be wanted.

Slavery. Two thousand negroes were landed at different ports in Cuba, from the first of February to the first of March, notwithstanding the many vessels that are cruising to suppress the slave trade. A slave at Old Harbor, Jamaica, has been convicted of the crime of preaching, and sentenced to six months imprisonment, and to be flogged! This is beautiful!

[Greensboro, (N. C.) Pat.

Yankee wit. A number of sailors were dining together at a boarding house in Havana, when one, an exclusive yankee, hastily rose from the table, and in a threatening posture, flourishing his knife, bawled out, "who dare to say he don't like roast beef?" "I dare say so," cried an Englishman at the opposite side of the table. "Well," said Jonathan, coolly taking his seat again, "then you may eat mutton."

A bear weighing about 400lbs. was killed at Exeter, Me. on the 11th inst. after a desperate battle, in which he received 16 musket balls.

Fayetteville. The "Observer" says—"Our jail is still without a tenant, which cannot be said of any other house in town, we believe."

Two sharks. of the tiger species, were lately taken with a hook in Charleston harbor—they were both large, the largest 10 feet 2 inches long, and 3 feet in circumference. They were nullifiers.

"A horned frog," or lizard, has lately been deposited in the Columbian institute, Washington. It was brought from the prairies of Upper Arkansas. It lived without food or drink from April to December, 1830. It is said that the sprinkle of a few drops of rain kills this animal.

Four slaves have been sentenced to death by Fayette county court, Kentucky—one for a rape committed on a young white lady, and murdering her mother, who interfered to save her child—one man and one woman for poisoning, and the fourth, a man, for arson.

Provident institution for savings—at Boston. The aggregate of the deposites, &c. in this institution, amounted to the large sum of $1,284,524, on the 1st July last—which appears to be very prudently invested in various public stocks.

The Declaration of Independence was signed by 9 natives of Massachusetts, 9 of Virginia, 5 of Maryland, 4 each of Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and South Carolina, 3 each of New York and Delaware, 2 of Rhode Island, and 1 of New Hampshire: and 3 natives of Ireland, 2 of England, 2 of Scotland and 1 of Wales.

Emigration. It seems probable that the amount of settlers arriving in Canada the present year, will not be less than fifty thousand!

Seduction. A man named Dandy has been required to pay six thousand dollars in a case of seduction. The case was tried before the New York city court, and appears to have been one of a most cruel nature.

Honorary degrees. The college at Georgetown, Columbia, has conferred the degree of L. L. D. on Wm. Gwynn, esq. editor of the Baltimore Gazette; and at the late convention at Oxford, England, that of D. C. L. was conferred on Washington Irving, esq.

Explosion. The boiler of one of Mr. Gurney's steam carriages exploded at Glasgow, and demolished the whole concern, much injuring two persons.

Sixty attorneys were admitted to practice in the supreme court of the state of New York, at the late July term, held at Utica. Should the increase at each term be in the same ratio for several years to come, it would require a large court house to contain them all.

Colonization society. The amount received by the Colonization society in the year 1830, was $27,809 39—exceeding the amount received in 1829 by nearly $8,000.

Longevity. It is stated in the Concord Gazette that William Walkup, aged 91, Eben. Hemenway, 91, and Silas Winch, 88, who served in the old French war, and under the continental congress, are now living in Framingham, Mass. They performed their regular day's work last season.

Goods pawned. The amount of property left in pledge with twelve pawn-brokers in New York, during the year ending January, 1831, was $108,000. Among the articles pledged were no less than 120,000 garments, and 16,000 sheets, blankets, and counterpanes.

INDIAN DISTURBANCES.

Despatches received at the department of war.

Belleville, Illinois, 7th July, 1831.

To the honorable the secretary of the department of war:

SIR: I consider it my duty to inform you of the late Indian hostilities, and of the measures which were adopted to repress them.

The Indians, with some exception, from Canada to Mexico, along the northern frontiers of the United States, are more hostile to the whites than at any other period since the last war; particularly the band of Sac Indians, usually and truly called, "the British band," became extremely untriendly to the citizens of Illinois and others. This band had determined for some years past to remain, at all hazards, on certain lands which had been purchased by the United States, and, afterwards, some of them sold to private individuals by the general government. They also determined to drive off the citizens from this disputed territory. In order to effect this object, they committed various outrages on the persons and property of the citizens of this state.

That this band might the more effectually resist all force that would be employed against them, they treated with many other tribes to combine together for the purpose of aiding this British band to continue in possession of the country in question.

These facts and circumstances being known to the frontier inhabitants, they became much alarmed, and many of them abandoned their homes and habitations.

In this situation of affairs, I considered the state to be "actually invaded," and the country in "imminent danger;" so much so, that I immediately called on part of the militia nearest to the disputed territory, to be ready to march to repel said invasion, and to restore peace to the frontier. I informed gen. Gaines of the situation of the state, and of my preparatory movements. After the general had become acquainted with the numbers and disposition of the Indians, and the exposed situation of the frontier, he very rightly determined on making a requisition on me for a number of mounted militia. These mounted volunteers, whom I had organized for the same purpose, cheerfully marched at the call of the United States.

The great extent of the frontier from lake Michigan to the Mississippi in this state, including part of the mineral country, made it necessary to have the service of mounted men to protect the citizens. There are great numbers of Indians, who reside near the northern border of this state, and it was probably that all might be joined in a war.

I have no hesitation in stating that it was necessary to make the call, and that a considerable number of mounted men ought to be employed in this service.

It has been the case in many military operations that a sufficient force has not been in the first instance employed, and the consequence has been disaster and defeat. This was not the case in this military movement. A sufficient force of mounted men was immediately called into the field. This efficient and bold movement intimidated the Indians, and compelled them to abandon their hostile attitude without bloodshed. Whereas a small number of mounted men would probably have led on to a general war.

Thus I have presented to you the general outlines of this military movement, which has terminated so fortunately to all concerned.

In the council or treaty with the Indians, gen. Gaines requested me to be associated with him as a commissioner. You will see by the agreement, that the Indians are to remain in future on the west side of the Mississippi. The policy to separate them from the whites, is the only sure course to preserve peace with them. I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

JOHN REYNOLDS.

Head quarters, western department,
St. Louis, 6th July, 1831.

SIR: Having been joined on the 25th ult. by his excellency, gov. Reynolds, with general Joseph Duncan's brigade of Illinois mounted volunteers, I, on the following morning, took possession of the Sac village, previously occupied by the British band of Sac Indians.

The appearance of the mounted volunteers on the one side, and the regular troops with two pieces of artillery on the other, aided by a steam boat armed with a piece of artillery, and some musketry and riflemen, induced these Indians to abandon the village previous to our arrival, and without firing a gun. Deserted by their allies, this disorderly band was left alone to seek security in a speedy flight to the right bank of the Mississippi, where they were found the next day under the protection of a white flag. They immediately sued for peace, whereupon the enclosed articles of agreement and capitulation were entered into and signed.

His excellency, gov. Reynolds, very cordially co-operated with me in this measure; and he unites with me in the opinion that the chastisement which a part of these Indians merited, could not have been inflicted without subjecting many of the innocent frontier settlers, as well as some of the unoffending Indians, to indiscriminate ruin and destruction. And we are of the opinion that these Indians are as completely humbled as if they had been chastised in battle; and that they are less disposed to disturb the frontier inhabitants.

I shall take an early occasion to collect and submit, for the information of the president, such facts as have been ascertained to exist touching the extensive alliances which these Indians had endeavored to form against our frontier inhabitants. I am, with the truest regard, your friend, EDMUND P. GAINES.

Hon. secretary of war.

Superintendency of Indian affairs,
St. Louis, July 6, 1831.

SIR: Gen. Gaines has removed the band of Sacs (called the British band), to the west of the Mississippi, and returned this morning with his regular troops to this place.

The Indians of this band were, it appears, very insolent, depending upon an increase to their number from the discontented parts of the Kickapoos, Pattawattamies and Winnebagoes, within the state of Illinois. They exhibited a daring opposition to gen. Gaines' regular force, until the near approach of 1,400 mounted volunteers; at which time, I am informed, their allies abandoned them. They then crossed the Mississippi, and sent a flag to the general, requesting terms, &c.

This show of force, with the cool and determined course pursued towards this disaffected band of Sacs, has produced the desired effect, and I have no doubt will tend to convince the disaffected parts of tribes, on this frontier, of the folly of their opposition to the United States, without a just cause.

It will, in my opinion, be necessary for a strict watch to be kept over this discontented band of Sacs, as well to prevent any acquisition to their numbers, (of disaffected Sacs), as to prevent difficulties between them and our northern and western frontier settlers. I have the honor to be, with high respect, your most obedient servant,

WM. CLARK.

Hon. secretary of war.

FROM THE NASHVILLE BANNER.

Extract of a letter from gen. E. P. Gaines, dated Rock Island, 20th June, 1831.

"I have visited the Rock river villages with a view to ascertain the localities, and as far as possible the disposition of the Indians. They confirmed me in the opinion I had previously formed, that, whatever may be their feelings of hostility, they are resolved to abstain from the use of their tomahawks and fire arms except in self-defence. But few of their warriors were to be seen—their women and children, and their old men appeared anxious, and at first somewhat confused, but none attempted to run off. Having previously notified their chiefs that I would have nothing more to say to them, unless they should desire to inform me of their intention to move forthwith as I had directed them, I did not speak to them, though within fifty yards of many of them. I had with me on board the steam boat some artillery and two companies of infantry. Their village is immediately on Rock river, and so situated that I could from the steam boat destroy all their bark houses (the only kind of houses they have) in a few minutes, with the force now with me—probably without the loss of a man. But I am resolved to abstain from firing a shot without some bloodshed, or some manifest attempt to shed blood, on the part of the Indians. I have already induced nearly one-third of them to cross the Mississippi to their own land. The residue, however, say, as the friendly chiefs report, that they never will move, and, what is very uncommon, their women urge their hostile husbands to fight rather than to move and thus to abandon their homes. Should the appearance of gov. Reynolds' mounted men fail to move them—their chiefs will then be arrested and kept in confinement until disposed of by the civil authorities, and the others will be landed on the opposite bank of the Mississippi, and notified that if they return they will be punished. The reports of other tribes having engaged to assist this band in defending themselves against us, are entitled to but little credit. Several other tribes, such as the Winnebagoes, Pottawattomies and Kickapoos, have been invited by these Sacks to assist them, but I cannot positively ascertain that more than two hundred have actually joined, and it is very doubtful whether these will remain true to their offending allies. I was assured by gov. Reynolds in his last letter that he would be here on the 19th or 20th. I therefore look for him momently."

A letter from St. Louis, dated July 6, says—"Generals Gaines and Atkinson have returned this morning with the troops from Rock Island, the differences with the Indians having fortunately been settled without bloodshed.

The preceding letter from gen. Gaines has been a subject of some pointed remarks in the "National Intelligencer" and other papers. The calling out of such an expensive and numerous force—and the disposition manifested to drive them beyond the Mississippi to lands which are "their own," are particularly objected to, as unnecessary and severe, and not sanctioned by law. On the other hand "an officer in the army" says in the Intelligencer, that gov. Reynolds called out the Illinois militia without consulting gen. Gaines, and that the Indians occupy a disputed territory since 1804—when, it is alleged they ceded it by a treaty made by gen. Harrison, as commissioner on the part of the United States, and received goods to the value of $2,000, and a perpetual annuity of $1,000, in exchange for the lands—that they have been repeatedly ordered to remove, &c. And that the large and expensive force called out, may be excused in the desire to put down opposition without the sacrifice of life, &c.

THE NEW OLIVE BRANCH.

To the citizens of South Carolina.

Friends and fellow citizens: It is confidently asserted by the friends of nullification, that intense distress prevails in your state; that it is the necessary and obvious result of the tariff, which restricts your trade, and limits the sale of your grand staple by the heavy duties levied on the imported articles received in return; that the duties on those imports, to the amount of about 30 per cent. are paid by the producers; and that, in consequence thereof the cotton, tobacco and rice planters, contribute to the support of government, at least 12,000,000 dollars per annum.

That distress exists in the state, particularly on the sea board, may be admitted—but I am credibly informed that it is greatly exaggerated, and that the upper country is in a prosperous situation.

If the distress and suffering were as great as is supposed—if they could be traced to the tariff—if there were no hope of relief, from the government—and, if the alternative were, a continuance of that state of suffering, or a secession from the union, it might perhaps be conceded that self preservation, the first law of nature, would warrant you in attempting to relieve yourselves from so unequal a burden. It might then be justifiable to "calculate the value of the union," and see whether those disadvantages did not far outweigh, so far as you are concerned, all the benefits it confers.

But if I can prove satisfactorily, even to judge Cooper and Mr. McDuffie, that whatever may be your distress, it has no necessary connexion with the tariffs of 1824 or 1828, (the tariff of 1816 is allowed, on all hands, to have been a tariff almost altogether for revenue)—if I can incontrovertibly trace the origin of the distress, to a source entirely different and entirely adequate to account for it—we may hope, that all good citizens, even those who have been the most ardent partizans of nullification, will exert themselves to dispel the mists of delusion under which your citizens have labored, and, as far as in their power lies, tranquillize the public mind, and allay a ferment, which endangers the peace and happiness of the country, not merely in our day, but in the days of our children and grand children.

To give a full view of the subject, it is necessary to take a retrospect of some years previous to the late war, and subsequently to its close; at which latter period, the seeds of distress were sowed which have since germinated so luxuriantly.

The average price of cotton in 1809, '10 and '11 was only 15 cents.* In 1812, '13, and '14, it averaged only about 11 cents.* After the war it rose extravagantly—

In 1815 the average price was	26*	cents.
1816	27*	"
1817	26 1-2†	"
1818	32†	"

Tempted by these extravant prices, the cultivation was greatly extended—negroes and lands were purchased at prices unheard of formerly. The purchases were, in some instances, made wholly, in others, principally, on credit, payable by instalments, with interest, from year to year, in full confidence, on both sides, that this state of prosperity would continue, and that the payments could be easily made.

These high prices, moreover, produced, as is always the case, in similar circumstances, an extravagant style of living, far beyond that to which the citizens had been accustomed.

In the midst of this dazzling scene of prosperity, an awful hurricane arose, which blasted and withered the flattering prospects, and produced scenes of distress and wretchedness, not often paralleled. Cotton fell from 32 cents in 1818, to 22 in 1819‡—and to 16 cents in 1820 ‡ To those who had purchased on credit as the most part had done, and who still owed several instalments, this was certain ruin. With the price of cotton, the price of lands and negroes fell, and somewhat in the same proportion. And so great was the reduction, that in numerous cases, the lands and negroes would not sell for enough to pay the instalments still due; so that the whole amount paid was sacrificed. In some instances patrimonial estates were sold to pay the deficiency.‖

It may be asked, to what cause were these ruinous reductions owing? Was there then no tariff, on which to charge the ruin?—to justify nullification, with all its horrors?—or to lead to any "calculation of the value of the union?"

The answer is easily given.—The fall of 1818, arose from the large importations of East India cotton, in that and the preceding year—amounting to no less than 345,300 bales; whereas in 1814, '15 and '16, the importation had been but 78,800 bales, or an average of 26,200 bales per annum. It is true, its inferior quality considerably limited the use of it—but still, enough was used, to produce, as we have seen, a reduction of about 30 per cent.

The desolation was completed by the great increase in 1820 of the exportation of cotton from this country, which, in 1819 had been only 80,508,270 lbs. of uplands; whereas, in 1820, it rose to 116,291,137 lbs. being an increase of above 40 per cent. It is true, the consumption of this staple, increased in England and in every part of Europe—but by no means in the same proportion. The consumption in England—

In 1817	was	397,000 bales.
1818	"	415,000 "
1819	"	428,000 "
1820	"	470,000 "
1821	"	499,000* "

It is not therefore wonderful, when the consumption increased only 25 per cent. in five years, and the supply from the East Indies increased seven-fold, from 31,000 bales in 1816, to 227,300 bales in 1818, and 40 per cent. from the United States, from 1819, (213,000 bales), to 1820, (301,524 bales), that the price was extravagantly reduced, and that the most intense distress followed.

The following is a statement of the exports of uplands, from the United States, for seven years:—

In 1819	80,508,270	lbs.
1820	116,291,137	"
1821	113 549,339	"
1822	133 424,460	"
1823	161,586 582	"
1824	132,843.941	"
1826	198,567,563	"
1827	279,169,317	"

Thus it appears, that the export was increased more than two-fold from 1819 to 1823,—and more than three-fold from 1819 to 1827!

Let us see the effect of this wonderful increase—

The quantity of uplands and sea islands, was—

In 1819	87,997,645 lbs.	dolls.	21,081,769 value.
1822	144 675,092 "		24,035,068
1823	173,723,270 "		20,445,520
1824	142,369,663 "		21,947,401
1826	204 535,415 "		25,025,214
1827	294,310,115 "		29,359,545†

This table deserves to be very carefully studied. It is fraught with important instruction, on the subject of glutted markets. We see that 87,000,000 lbs. produced in 1818, half a million of dollars more than 173,000,000 lbs. nearly double the quantity, in 1823—that the latter quantity produced a million and a half of dollars less than 142,000,000 lbs. in 1824—that 144,000,000 lbs. in 1822, produced nearly as much as 204,000,000 in 1826—and finally, that in 1827 we increased the export 45 per cent. whereas the proceeds increased only about 17 per cent!

It is, I trust, impossible to examine the preceding tables and the deductions from them, with the attention to which the magnitude of the subject is entitled, without a conviction that all the embarrassment, distress and suffering, so loudly complained of, to the south, have arisen from one single efficient cause, glutted markets,—and instead of wondering that the prices have fallen from 32 cents in 1818, to 16 cents in 1820, and to 9, 10 and 11 cents at present, the wonder is, that the reduction has not been greater.

The foregoing facts would be sufficient to settle the question finally, and for ever, and to exonerate the tariff from the foul charges brought against it. But strong, and pointed, and decisive, and irrefutable as they are, fortunately the mighty question at issue, which is to decide whether we are to continue an united band of brothers, or discordant petty states, rending each other in pieces, like the ill fated South Americans, does not rest wholly on them. I submit incontrovertible evidence, to prove that as great if not a greater degree of distress and suffering prevailed to the south before the enaction of the tariff of 1824, than has been felt since, and that therefore the nullifiers are disarmed of those plausible, but fallacious pretexts, whereby they have so highly excited the passions of their fellow-citizens, and prepared so many of them to "renew the scenes of the revolutionary war."

‖Extract of a letter from a respectable citizen of South Carolina dated Charleston, June 25, 1823.

"The peace of 1815 produced a complete revolution in the do-"mestic concerns of this country. Cotton and rice rose beyond "the most sanguine expectation of the growers, and in proportion "to their value, was every other article sacrificed to them. The "indigo vats were destroyed; lumber and tobacco abandoned; even "provisions were neglected: and we turned our eyes to Virginia "for corn, and to Tennessee and Kentucky for live stock.

"This did very well while cotton and rice continued high, and "would perhaps have been attended with no serious disadvantage, "but from the fact, that lands and negroes, the prices of which "are in this country regulated by the prices of cotton and rice, "rose also uncommonly high.

"The quantity of money which the high prices of these articles "brought into the market, greatly diminished its value, and in "proportion increased the prices of lands and negroes. A system "of credit, too, found its way into the interior; and the hope of

"soon realizing a fortune, plunged the people deeply into debt for "this species of property, at a price perfectly unjustifiable, even "at the then high price it produced.

"All classes have become largely indebted, and the fall of cotton "left them in a situation by no means enviable. The commence-"ment of this reaction may be dated in 1820, from which period "has the planting interest of this country been very much per-"plexed. Lands that cost 30 dollars per acre, are now sold for 5 "dollars, to pay the debt incurred by the purchase; and negroes "that cost 1,000 dollars may now be had for 400 dollars."

*Liverpool prices current.

"ed, the arm of industry is now paralyzed. Large and ample "estates, once the seats of opulence, which supported their proprie-"tors in affluence and comfort, are now thrown out to waste and "decay."

Mr. Garnet in the same debate stated, that—

"The population of Virginia was driven into distant lands, and "reduced to beggary—and that desolation was spread over the face "of the land."

Extract from a memorial of the citizens of Charleston, adopted about the close of 1823, and read in congress, February 9, 1824.

"The cultivation of cotton, encouraged by the very prosperity "which has just been noticed, has been so prodigiously extended "in this and other states, as well as in foreign countries, that not-"withstanding the unprecedented increase of the trade with Eng-"land, every market in Europe is already glutted with it; and as the "evil is every day growing with the growth of the new countries, "into which enterprise is pushing its adventures, there can be no "doubt but that in the course of a very few years this commodity will "like all others where there is a free competition in trade, be reduced "to the lowest possible price. In the mean time, the effects that have "already been produced here, by this mighty revolution, are de-"plorable in the extreme. Property of all kinds is depreciated be-"yond example. A feeling of gloomy despondence is beginning to "prevail every where in the lower country. Estates are sacrific-"ed to pay the last instalments on the bonds given for the purchase "money. No body seems disposed to buy, what every body is anxious "to sell at any price. In short, it is manifest, that the extraordi-"nary prosperity which South Carolina, in common with the "other southern states, enjoyed some years ago, is gone forever; "and it will require all the skill and industry of our agricultu-"rists, in future, to maintain their place in the market, even at "the most reduced prices of produce"

"HUGH S. LEGARE,
"SAMUEL PRIOLEAU,
"WILLIAM SEABROOK." } committee.

It is presumed that no man who values his character for veracity, will ever after the examination of these documents, bring it into discredit by charging southern distress to tariffs. It would be an outrage on the common sense of the nation.

P. S. The increased culture of cotton in this country was in a great degree caused by the destruction of manufactures, by the fatal tariff of 1816, carried in congress by the predominance of southern influence. It drove thousands of the manufacturers to farming—converting customers into rivals, and depressing farming—and impelled the farmers in Virginia and Maryland, and the emigrants, into Alabama and other south-western states, to enter largely into the culture of cotton. Thus the withering policy of the south recoiled on itself. HAMILTON.

POLITICS OF THE DAY.

From the United States Telegraph of August 2.

MR. INGHAM TO THE PRESIDENT.

New Hope, July 26, 1831.

SIR: I received on the 13th inst. a letter from Mr. Trist, of the 7th, postmarked the 9th, purporting to be written by your direction, in answer to mine of the 30th ult. The same mail also brought me the Globe of the 11th, containing, in addition to the letter of Mr. Trist, an accompanying expose of the relations heretofore existing between you and myself, connecting the matter of this correspondence with circumstances alleged to have occurred long antecedent to the date fixed by me for the origin of the feelings which have led to it. This expose bears the impress of your authority, not only in the disclosure of topics, which could only be known to yourself, but in a letter from your own desk, used to give stronger color of probability to the points insisted upon throughout the article. I cannot possibly do you injustice under these circumstances, in referring to it as a contemporaneous exposition of your sentiments and feelings, and using the light it furnishes to aid me in penetrating the mysterious course of proceeding which has been directed against me, and still seeks to destroy my reputation—the only inheritance I expect to bequeath to my children. Thus impressed, I may feel it to be necessary to address you with more freedom than fastidious minds, differently circumstanced, might deem compatible with a proper respect for the chief magistrate; but when such shall have imagined themselves in my situation, they will then only be able to appreciate my feelings, and judge correctly of this resort to the right of self-defence. I am perfectly aware of the disadvantages of my position in such a controversy; I have not a numerous body of persons impelled, or prompted by interest or fear, to applaud whatever I may say or do. My reliance is wholly of a different character; I have no agent or instrument at command, except pen, ink, and paper; no power but that which is derived from truth, addressed to intelligence and virtue; and no claim to confidence, but in my own humble character, and the success of the demonstration I shall be able to give of all that I may attempt to maintain. I have, however, a better opinion of mankind than to attribute to the mass of those who may be considered, as dependent on you, a disposition to advance their interest by means discreditable to their integrity—many of them are known to me to be incapable of such a purpose. Be this as it may, the history of these events will outlive your official power, and at the period which I deem most desirable for the impress of a good name, there will be no motive to do injustice to mine. I have never seen an honest appeal, in a good cause, made in vain to the disinterested judgment of the American community; and forced, against my will, into a conflict where I have no choice but to sink under an oppressive hostility, or use the means in my power for my own defence, I must meet the duty at whatever hazard.

It distinctly appears, by the expose to which I have alluded, that you have now declared an unrelenting war against me, by assailing my honor and integrity from the beginning of my official connection with your administration down to the date of your last public notice of my name. It is the purpose of this communication, which to my regret, has been delayed by indisposition, to review the several imputations and charges thus promulgated, and conclude with a distinct reply to your letter of the 7th inst. by Mr. Trist.

These imputations and charges will be found embodied in the following syllabus of your expose: It is therein alleged, that I accepted the appointment of secretary of the treasury with a full knowledge that maj. Eaton was to be my colleague, and no sooner was my commission safely in my pocket, than I joined Mr. C's. friends to drive major Eaton out of the cabinet. That I, in effect, told you, that you had associated in your counsels an individual who was a blot upon your administration. That you thought fit to overlook the implied insult offered to yourself, and sought only to reconcile the difficulty in your cabinet. It was made ostensibly, by those originating it, altogether an affair of the females of their families. It was said that, with regard to maj. Eaton, they entertained the best feeling, and could unite. This was all you required. At the succeeding session of congress, meetings of the friends of Mr. Calhoun took place, with a view of addressing you to remove maj. Eaton, and Van Buren was denounced—arrangements were made in congress to embarrass the measures of the administration in that body. The Calhoun Telegraph and Ingham Sentinel evinced their disaffection. The appointment of Baldwin was denounced in advance. Remote editors, as has been proved, were sounded, in the hope of bringing them out in opposition to your re-election; and, finally, Mr. Calhoun came out with a horrible plot. When the issue was made with yourself, you found your cabinet divided, and an entire re-organization was determined on. Notwithstanding you believed that I had taken sides with your adversaries, you treated me with kindness to the last, and gave me credit for my capacity and fidelity. Being the representative of Pennsylvania, I was entitled to respect. Grateful to Pennsylvania for your election, you were unwilling to mortify her by letting her suppose that you wished to put a mark of disgrace upon me, by desiring me to retire from the cabinet. You, therefore, offered me a position quite equal to my deserts—but I thought my interests and ambition would be better promoted by a warfare on you, and sedulously sought a pretext on which to found it. As an evidence of my seeking such a pretext, I took exception to the form of an address in a note on business, in which you designated me as 'acting secretary of the treasury.' That, failing in this, I sought in another quarter some ground of quarrel to carry with me to Pennsylvania, and, as a justification of the hostility I meant to wage, I wrote Mr. Barry an angry letter, telling him that I had heard one of his assistants had said that the department possessed a certain bond, which would be held in terrorem to keep me quiet. That not being able to make any thing out of this correspondence, I dropped it but remained at Washington, and kept up such an intercourse with the editor of the Telegraph, that major Eaton felt assured I was the prompter of the scurrilous attacks on his wife, for which he felt it due to himself to make a demand of Mr. Berrien and myself, to know whether we authorised the statement in that print. That, when called upon, I refused to disavow, and added insult, and when threatened with personal violence, instead of appealing to the civil authority, I called in aid certain persons, and became myself a threatener of the peace. That I had now accomplished my purpose, and made a pretext for something like a justification in my meditated opposition to the president on my return to Pennsylvania. That I made an outcry about a conspiracy, and sought to involve the friends of the president in it, as accessaries. The expose concludes with a declaration, that it will be seen what proof I will be able to bring in support of my charges, and it will probably turn out, like Mr. Calhoun's plot, of which it may be considered an act; adding, that it will be susceptible of no proof, and that the public must take denials for confession.

It will be perceived that these allegations purport to give a concatenation of events, commencing with my official connexion with the administration, and terminating with the day of my departure from the seat of government.

It cannot be doubted, that it was intended by you to connect me with all the transactions referred to in this document; any other conclusion must be founded on the extravagant supposition that I was thus to be held responsible for the acts of others, in which I had not even an implied agency. I, therefore, have a right to regard this expose as avowedly made for the purpose of presenting to the public eye the series of offences which I am alleged to have committed, that have led to the embarrassment of your administration, and the final dissolution of your cabinet. It may be proper, however, to observe, that I have framed in my own mind a division of the matter of this discussion into two parts, which may be designated by the terms official and unofficial. As to the former branch, regarding my duty to the country, always paramount, and its interests as requiring that a proper confidence in relation to matters within the pale of the executive councils should be inviolably maintained as long as it may be even tacitly enjoined by the chief magistrate, I shall not advert to such matters except when they have been introduced by you; and then found in the papers before me. As respects unofficial transactions, I shall notice at this time only a small part of what lies at my disposal, and none not immediately conected with the subjects referred to in your expose. With these remarks, I proceed to the unpleasant task of defending my character against the aspersions attempted to be cast upon it by the chief magistrate of the United States. This has been irresistably forced upon me at the moment of my retirement from public service, and when satiated with its enjoyments and fortified by vivid experience against its allurements, I had fondly cherished the hope of spending the remainder of my days in the quiet of domestic life, out of the reach of the disturbing conflicts of political controversy.

I perceive, in the first of the alleged incidents of your expose, the bane which has poisoned the cup of your happiness; and which, being thus spread before the public, must tarnish the page of your history, while history continues to carry to future ages a true account of the acts of public men. Having been for the last two years, a close, and, for the most part, a silent observer of the actors in the various scenes of the great drama of state, in which you were the chief character, I have carefully studied, not only your own, but the character of those around you; and cannot easily be mistaken in the considerations which characterised your leading unofficial acts, and their bearing on the public interest. Much less could I be mistaken in the facts which are now made the groundwork of your imputations against me, and the evidence of discord which induced the determination to reorganize your cabinet. I hesitate not to say; in the face of all who are implicated; in the face of the world, nay, in the face of heaven, that every allegation made, intended, or tending to connect me in any one of your long lists of incidents, with a design to insult you, or embarrass your administration, or with any other of the imputed designs, is destitute of the shadow or shade of truth. I might close this part of this communication here, by insisting, as I have a right to do, upon the production of the proofs of these imputed plots and conspiracies, and of my agency in them; or that as an act of sheer justice, the charges should be withdrawn as openly as they have been made. But I cannot permit myself to rest upon this ground alone, however, solid and immovable it must be. I must, therefore, call your attention to some of the most prominent points, and demand the proofs more specifically. On what ground am I charged with having "no sooner than I got the commission safe in my pocket, joined Mr. Calhoun's friends in the effort to drive major Eaton out of the cabinet." I ask where is the evidence that Mr. Calhoun had any class of friends who were not as devotedly your friends; or that any object was entertained, which could be beneficial to him and injurious to you? Or that any persons under that designation, joined to drive major Eaton out of the cabinet? And, lastly, where is the evidence, if such a plot existed, that I was privy to, or an actor in it? If the isolated circumstance of the refusal of any of my family, with my approbation, to associate with that of major Eaton, be deemed evidence of this charge, I freely admit that fact; but you perfectly well know, whatever appearance circumstances now compel you to give it, that the sole cause for this refusal was based in the belief of the society in which she had always lived, as to the character of his wife, and not in any feeling of hostility or even unkindness to him. It was, however, known to me, that two or three gentlemen whom I had never heard designated by their personal attachment to any political man other than yourself; and who were known to be among your best friends, did remonstrate to you against the appointment of major Eaton to a seat in your cabinet; and I also heard that they cotemporaneously, or at least two of them, made known to him all they had said to you. Their names are known to you, and they can bear testimony to this fact. Two of these gentlemen, the only ones of whose purpose I had any knowledge at the time, will, if their memory serve, for I know them to be incapable of misrepresentation, testify, that so far from encouraging their views, I endeavored to reconcile them to the appointment of major Eaton. I will not bring their names before the public, but will, if desired, furnish them to you, that you may satisfy yourself of the flagrant injustice you have done me in this respect. But, in addition to this, what motive had I to desire to drive major Eaton out of the cabinet? We had been for several years, personally intimate and friendly. I had formed a favorable opinion of his disposition and general character; and, notwithstanding all that has occurred, my opinion, as to these qualities at the time, is unchanged. In the absence of motive, in the absence of facts and circumstances, nay, in the face of facts now tendered to you, what is there in the relation between the highest officer of the government and the humblest citizen which can justly preclude the latter from the right of demanding that a charge so injurious to him shall be either proved or retracted? It should now be understood that this charge, thus shown to be a mere phantom, is made the "head and front of my offending," and the main point upon which my reputation is assailed. You have professed to regard my conduct in this particular, as bearing an "implied insult?" to yourself, which imagined insult has been fostered in your breast up to the present moment; and constantly cherished, with its predisposing influence to give form and substance to every other shadow which jealousy and suspicion could contrive, or credulity could be prevailed upon to embrace.

What are these shadows which have been thus embodied? "At the succeeding session, Mr. Calhoun's friends held meetings for the purpose of addressing you to remove major Eaton." Three things are necessary to be proved to maintain this charge and bring it home to me. 1st. That Mr. Calhoun had a class of friends distinct from yours. 2d. That they held such meetings. And, 3d. That I was privy to, and gave aid or countenance to the measure.* As to the first, I know of no such class. As to the second, I know of no such meeting. And thirdly, I, of course, could have given it no aid or countenance. If, however, there was such a meeting, its character and objects must be subjects for proof; and if it did address you, the names must show that it would seem only to have been a conspiracy of your own friends to persuade your head in opposition to your heart. Be this as it may, you have my denial of all knowledge of it; and my demand for proof on this point cannot be evaded.

Then "Mr. Van Buren was denounced!" When? In what manner? And by whom? And how am I responsible for it? It is true I did not enter into the views of those who were generally supposed to constitute your confidential political council, by exerting myself to promote him for the succession; nor did I follow the supposed changes in your mind, as to the propriety of using your power to promote the election of your successor; but I gave to Mr. Van Buren a fair and just support in all his official acts, which were presented for my cooperation; nor have his personal friends the slighest ground to complain of my treatment to them. I cannot, however, be responsible for what others said of him: my relation to you or to him, did not require that I should bear so unreasonable a burden; nor was it your custom to hold him, or any other of your friends, accountable for the denunciations against me, which were so carefully laid on your table day after day. If such a rule had been adopted, it ought, at least, to have been made known, that each might understand what was required, and have the opportunity of sharing its benefits.

The next charge in order is thus announced: "Arrangements were made in congress to embarrass the measures of the administration in that body." I beg leave to require, as a matter of obvious justice, that the particular object of these imputed arrangements be specified; by whom they were made; and what motive had the alleged actors to embarrass the administration? And, lastly, at what point was I connected with them, what act of this nature was done, or advice given by me, and what motive could I have had for embarrassing the measures of the administration with which I was connected? It does not belong to the human mind to act without motive;—even jealousy itself will not believe all the evil it hears of the object of its suspicions, unless the evidence be corroborated by the appearance of some rational motive to control their actions. In this case, I can imagine none. It remains, therefore, for you to show how this charge can be made to reach me. Here I leave it with my unqualified denial, whatever form or shape it may assume.

"The Calhoun Telegraph and Ingham Sentinel evinced their disaffection." Again, I demand the evidence. Let the columns of these papers be examined for the fact of their disaffection. The former was deemed the paper of the administration, and the only article which, up to that period, I have heard of having been ascribed to such a feeling, the editor says, was dictated, in substance, from your own lips, and approved in form by you before publication. As to the latter, I have had no political correspondence with its editors from the time of my appointment to that of my removal. Those gentlemen (and none who know them will doubt their word) will bear me out in this declaration. I admit that I regard them as my personal friends. They have long conducted, in the capital of Pennsylvania, the leading paper of the political party with which I have always been connected. They are men of tried moral and political integrity. Had I been engaged in any of the purposes thus attributed to me, it is scarcely possible that I should not have corresponded with them, and some others of their editorial brethren in Pennsylvania, or elsewhere, on these subjects. All are now at liberty to publish whatever I have written in respect to this or any other matter contained in your charges.

Next: "The appointment of Mr. Baldwin was denounced." This from you is most unexpected, to whom it must be well known that, in all your conversations on that subject, whatever my preference might have been, I refused to say any thing to depress Mr. Baldwin; and it is with great surprise, notwithstanding all I have before seen, that I am made responsible for the denunciation. What may not be proved when such evidence is relied on?

The expose proceeds: "Remote editors were sounded to bring them out against your re-election." The only evidence which I have seen or heard of in support of this charge, is in a statement of Gideon Welles, of Hartford, Ct. who, though he was "shocked and astounded" at the alleged suggestion, it since appears, had, some time after, written a letter to the same gentleman whom he charged with making it, sending his best respects to Mr. Calhoun, and expressing his own private opinion that you ought not, on principle, to stand another poll. It is a remarkable fact, that this same witness, now so much relied upon to sustain a far-fetched assault upon me, had written another letter to the same person, soon after this shocking overture was said to have been made in which he said, among other things of the same kind, that major Eaton was a disgrace to your administration. So much for this charge, and the witness: but if all he says, in the face of his letter to the contrary, be true, he only testifies to a conversation with another person, of which none pretends that I had any knowledge. Of its supposed object I never heard till it was brought out by Mr. Welles' perilous statement. But if there be ground for offence to you in such an act, it must be found in the supposition that, contrary to the general expectation, you were then anxious for a re-election, and had seized upon and laid up the mere expression of a doubt of its expediency as evidence of base designs against yourself and your administration. It is surely an act of supererogation further to deny and ask for proofs of such a matter.

The last and most prominent allegation at this period, is, that Mr. Calhoun came out with "a horrible plot," and "when this issue was made with the president, he found his CABINET DIVIDED, and an entire re-organization was determined on." I shall not inquire by whom, or for what purposes, this plot was begun, but I may emphatically demand in what point it can, by the remotest possibility, be brought in contact with any act of mine, official or otherwise. I have reason to know that it was not the preface to the correspondence, nor the letters in it, which made the issue so personally offensive to you. The first was revised by your particular friend, and every expression which he thought liable to such interpretation was erased at his suggestion; and long after the letters were written you had intimated your willingness to receive Mr. Calhoun, as usual, and invite him to your table, if he would leave a card for you. I know through the same channel of common friendship, that he objected to an attempt at reconciliation without explanation, which should remove the cause of the difference; adding, that his honor and integrity had been impugned, and, until this matter was explained, there could be no cordiality in your intercourse, and that he could not submit to an ostensible reconciliation with one who persevered in maintaining such unfounded aspersions against his character.

You were willing to be reconciled after all the offence contained in the correspondence was fully before you: consequently, the issue spoken of as "made with (yourself) personally," must have been made by the publication, not by the matter of the correspondence. This could not be changed by its transfer to the printer's ink. The whole iniquity of this "horrible plot" is therefore displayed in the act of publishing the correspondence. From this cause alone, it would seem that you found (your) cabinet divided, and determined on its re-organization. All this is now placed at my door, as the consummation of an accumulating series of plots and conspiracies, of which my letter of the 21st ult. is considered an act. I cannot content myself with merely requesting the proofs of my connexion with this affair, but must be permitted to demand how, when, and on what points, were the cabinet divided, either by the matter of the correspondence, or the publication of it? Was it, or any measure connected therewith, ever brought before the cabinet, or introduced into their deliberations? Was any act of the government influenced by it, or could any one be made to depend on the speculative opinions of the cabinet members, as to the propriety of having that document in possession of the public, rather than confined to the desks of Mr. Calhoun and yourself? Yet such is the alleged foundation of the horrible plot which compelled you to "determine on an entire re-organization of (your) cabinet." The responsibility of which, it now seems, is to be mainly thrown on me. I have already proved that the origin of this whole drama was but a phantom, and it is now demonstrated that the immediate cause of its catastrophe is something, if possible, less substantial. The history of the world, I am sure, cannot furnish such another exhibition of preposterous suspicions and imaginary conspiracies; of agents for espionage and information, to collect and report materials; of such lamentable credulity for their reception, and reckless temerity in determining matters of high moment on grounds so baseless as have been thus shewn to have pervaded your council chamber, almost from the first moment you entered it, until your re-organization was carried into effect. I beg leave to pause here, and inquire, if these alleged causes for the re-organization of your cabinet be the true causes, what are we to understand from the letters of the secretary of state and secretary of war, in which are given their reasons for their voluntary resignation?

If the re-organization was a primary determination of your own, grounded upon the series of events indicated in your manifesto, and ripened into maturity by the publication of the correspondence with Mr. Calhoun, wherefore is it that the secretary of state gave one reason, and the secretary of war another, for their retirement, neither having the slightest reference to any of the causes you have assigned? I will not pursue the pregnant topic further than to remark, that, as there is an obvious error in the reasons given for the re-organization of a part of the cabinet, there may also be one in those given as to the remainder. Amid so many embarrassing and irreconcilable inconsistencies, I apprehend the public will be ready to conclude that the true reason has within it something deemed so revolting to the moral sense of the American people, that it cannot be approached; and hence the labored and incongruous explanations which have been attempted.

My great offence, as alleged at this crisis, it seems was, in having "taken sides with your adversaries," which, I suppose, also embraces my associates who were invited to resign; but, it is added, that being a representative of Pennsylvania I was "entitled to respect," and was therefore "treated with kindness to the last," and, in the next line, the public are told that you gave me credit for my capacity and fidelity. The kind treatment and respect were not, however, for these qualities, but because you were unwilling that Pennsylvania should suppose you wished to put "a mark of disgrace upon me." I am, indeed, gratified at finding that I owe to my native state, rather than to your insincerity, the "kindness and respect" with which I was said to be treated. But to what feeling am I to attribute your testimony to my "capacity and fidelity?" If that testimony was sincere, what becomes of the black catalogue of previous plots and base designs portrayed in your expose? If it be not sincere, you have promulgated to the American people, whose chief magistrate you are, under your own hand, that which you did not believe! Which alternative shall I choose in pursuing this discussion? I cannot make a choice, and will drop the curtain, leaving to the historian of this part of your life to seek for other lights to solve the paradox, or invoke a patriotic tear to blot out the record of it. It now appears certain, however, that I was retained in office most reluctantly, notwithstanding my "capacity and fidelity," merely because you were unwilling to mortify Pennsylvania by letting her suppose that you wished to put "a mark of disgrace" upon me. I now perfectly comprehend this announciation in another point of view. It identifies the declarations, which, from time to time, emanated from those who were alleged to be in your special confidence, and to have constituted your most influential council. It was declared by those persons that I had no share in your confidence, that you would be glad of a pretext to remove me, and that you had endeavored in vain by "courtly hints," to let me know that you wished me to resign, and relieve you from the responsibility of the act; to all of which it was added I was utterly insensible. It is also evident from this admission, that, although I was, during all this period, laboring with the most intense assiduity for the country, and for the benefit of your fame, that you were seeking with scarcely less diligence, for some pretext which would enable you to encounter with safety, the political hazard of mortifying Pennsylvania by putting "a mark of disgrace" on me. It further appears that, while these things were doing, the persons, above referred to, were carrying their warfare against me into the papers of Pennsylvania. One of them, at least, was conducting the influence of your name into the elections in that state, to the disadvantage and injury of one of your own political friends, and for no other reason than because he was my personal as well as political friend, and to be an enemy of mine, and of the administration of my native state, was known to be the direct passport to the favor of this council. I say, while these and many other such things which I might disclose without violating the rule I have prescribed, were daily at work, you "treated me with kindness to the last!!" I reposed on your reputed frankness and sincerity, treating the "malign influence" which surrounded you with silent indifference, determining that it was not less due to your character than to mine that I should not seem to give credit to the assumed authenticity of acts so discreditable to your fame, and that I should expect from yourself alone the only information upon which I could act in such a case, not indeed in courtly hints, but in the honorable ingenuousness of republican frankness, and simplicity. It is now proved, by the documents so often referred to, that the character which I had thus formed, and thus relied upon was but an object of my imagination, and that instead of the "respect" with which I was "treated to the last" coming from the heart, it was but a covering for deep rooted hostility, which was only suppressed through fear of "mortifying Pennsylvania," and that I have been, during the whole period of my political connexion with you, an object of your unqualified, and, now, undisguised enmity, as well as a subject for the suspicious and scrutinising espionage of those who, it now appears by the verification of their sayings, acted under your special authority. I cannot but deplore that you have made it necessary for me, in my own defence thus to speak of these things; but, since it is so, I rejoice to find in the labored assault upon me, such clear internal evidence of the truth as it is. But you allege that you "offered (me) a position of dignity and trust, quite equal to (my) deserts." It is true you offered me the mission to Russia; but after what has been now seen can any doubt in what light I must have understood that offer, at the time it was made? and, although you have been unable to find any motive for my refusal but "ambition and interest," there are not a few, I trust, who looking into their own hearts, can realise that when office is tendered to beguile integrity, it cannot be honorably accepted; still less could I have accepted it as a sop to reconcile Pennsylvania to the agency of an inmate of your household in forming a new party there for the benefit of your designated successor. "Ambition and interest!"—The former seeks high station, and the latter emoluments: both were offered, but "the circumstances" in which I found myself placed, forbade the acceptance, and I sought only retirement to domestic life, not imagining that this was to be further disturbed.

I now pass to the sequel of this extraordinary document, in which I find a labored attempt to adduce facts in support of an idea previously inculcated, viz: that I was the aggressor in all the differences which existed in your imagination, and was seeking to the last for some "pretext for a quarrel to carry home to Pennsylvania." What are these facts?—soon after I had appointed certain officers in the custom house of Philadelphia, disregarding the officious and improper interference of the second auditor of the treasury, who, as I was informed, had been some time on a political visit to that city; and after I had heard that the persons who formed his circle there, spoke of my appointments as unwarranted in my then situation, I received a note from you, in which you designated me as "acting secretary of the treasury," not only on the outside, with marked peculiarities, but also in the body of the note. I could not suppose it to be an inadvertence. It was not recurring to a familiar address from an unusual one, but the reverse; and being the first time you had ever addressed me in that manner, carried, as I thought, on its face, evidence of deliberate intention. The notes which passed between us on the occasion have been published; and I am content that an impartial public should decide, from the face of our two first notes, even unconnected with the visit of

maj. Lewis to Philadelphia, which of us has the appearance of "seeking cause of offence" in this transaction.

The next fact is, that I wrote an angry letter to Mr. Barry, informing him that I had heard that one of his assistants had said the department held a certain bond in terrorem over me. I will publish this correspondence also, though an inconsiderable item in this scrap of history, from which it will readily be determined, whether the disposition to quarrel began with me, or those who had entertained a purpose so injurious to my character, as to have it believed that the silent repose which I was looking to, must be attributed to the base motive of avoiding the payment of a debt to the government. I could not doubt the report, and wrote, not an "angry," but a respectful note to Mr. Barry, stating what I had heard, and requesting him, if he supposed I was indebted to the department, to bring suit, as I could not believe that he would make the collection of a debt depend on such considerations. His reply was mainly in the same temper, although I thought he unnecessarily introduced some political matter into his letter, but it was not offensive; nor, though I declined the discussion, did I reply to him in that feeling. I supposed he had misapprehended a single point in the case, and explained it for his information; but his last letter convinced me of the truth, not only of what I had heard as to the threat, but that it had been written to give all the effect he could to the object of the original declaration of his subordinate. I saw too, in that letter, a germ of the feeling since so fully disclosed, and disposed of the matter as I thought it merited, without further notice. I should have deemed these incidents too unimportant for such notice, but for that which you have given them. They certainly constitute no proof of a disposition in me to "seek cause for a quarrel." They are of the same character with the absurd imputations as to the publication in the Telegraph, with which I had no more to do than major Eaton had: and because I would not disavow, under a menace, I am represented by you as the aggressor; and because I would not present myself without defence to his pistols and stiletto, or neglect my duties to call in aid the civil authorities, I have become in your judgment, a "threatner of the peace!" To the mind which has long been perverted by the workings of suspicion and passion, it is difficult to present the most clear and sober truths with effect, and I may not have satisfied you of the injustice of any of your suspicions. I can, therefore, only add, that nothing was further from my intention than to have had any difference with you, or any member of the administration, on my retirement from the government. I am not to expect, however, that either arguments or evidence will now produce a change in your opinions, or dispel the error which has so unhappily enveloped your short career in civil station, and so effectually blighted the fair prospects which attended your induction into office.

You will observe that I have confined my remarks almost exclusively to the effects; I have but touched the corroding cause of all the diseases of your administration. Nourished by a deplorable infatuation, its operations have been most extensive and injurious. Had I consented to bring my family within the sphere of its influence, I should have been among the chiefest of your favorites; but I would not thus consent to expose them, and therefore have, as it appears, experienced the efforts of your secret and abiding hostility.

I now take leave of your expose, and proceed to reply to your letter by Mr. Trist, already referred to. I cannot but regret to find the same apparent misapprehension of the nature and object of my letter of the 21st ultimo still existing, which had pervaded your previous proceedings on this subject. The representations I made to you of the transactions of major Eaton and others, was not induced by any alleged injury done to me. This was distinctly disclaimed. The object was simply to bring to your notice a meditated outrage against the majesty of the law, which I deemed discreditable to the government, and considered it to be my duty to lay before you. In furtherance of this object, I suggested such prominent facts as I thought necessary to enable you to give a direction to any investigation you might order, which would most readily disclose the whole truth. The facts presented by me for your consideration, were, that major Eaton and Mr. Randolph had resolved to assault me; that, for effecting their object, they occupied, as a rendezvous, certain lower rooms in the treasury building, near which, as the head of the department, I must necessarily pass in the discharge of my official duties; that the officers occupying these rooms, with one other, were in the company of major Eaton and Randolph, whilst they were thus awaiting an opportunity to make the intended assault. I further stated, that the principal persons thus engaged, viz: Eaton and Randolph, with a recruited force, beset my dwelling for two successive nights, indicating, by words, actions and armament, hostile designs. All these matters are brought before you, believing that all who had in any manner aided or given countenance at the time to the designs of the principal, were guilty of a high offence against the laws of the country. The matters for investigation under this statement of facts, were simply as follows:

1. Did Eaton and Randolph, or either of them, arm and lie in wait for the purpose alleged, or for any other criminal purpose?

2. Did they use the rooms of the treasury building as places of rendezvous for such a purpose?

3. Were the officers who occupied those rooms present while they were so employed by Eaton and Randolph, or either of them?

4. Did Eaton and Randolph, with a recruited armed force, threaten an assault on my dwelling, for two successive nights, till a late hour?

If so, then is all I have stated true to the letter. I am sure it will not be contended that it did not concern the character of the government, to have a severe scrutiny made to ascertain the truth of such allegations, and, if found to be true, to know especially how it had happened that any persons, much more those in your particular confidence, should have dared to occupy the rooms in the treasury department, in order to make an assault on the life of its chief officer; and to what extent, if at all, the officers accompanying them, had any knowledge of, or given aid or countenance to so disgraceful an outrage. The facts which then had come to my knowledge were embodied in a letter addressed to you, on the eve of my departure from the seat of government, (the only moment at my disposal for that purpose), believing that you would conceive it your duty to cause the subject to be investigated in such manner as the long experience of the most enlightened communities had found best calculated to elicit truth and promote justice. But you have not thought proper to do so. You have contented yourself with drawing out and spreading before the public, the excuses and denials of a portion of the persons referred to, without taking the slightest notice of the principal and avowed offender, rejecting all offers to adduce additional testimony. An examination might very possibly have implicated persons not before thought of, or resulted in the acquittal of others who were suspected. But that the facts should have been investigated, will not be denied by any one who duly appreciates the sacred duty of repressing, among the officers of the government, within the walls of the public edifices, all disposition to violence, I have only to add, that, when such a scrutiny shall be made, all I have alleged will be substantially proved; the subsequent prevarications of the minor coadjutors to the contrary notwithstanding. I do not complain that you have not instituted an investigation; I have no right to do so, more than any other citizen of the United States. You are responsible for the due execution of the laws of the district; and when these fail to afford personal protection, I hope to be as able as most others to protect myself. But I think I have a just ground for complaint, in your effort to transfer from yourself and your officers, who are constituted for that service, to me, a private citizen, at a distance, and without special interest, the labor and responsibility of carrying on a criminal prosecution, for an offence committed exclusively against the United States, even after the principal offender had confessed more than enough to justify a public prosecution. But I find a still more serious cause of complaint, in your additional effort to divert the public mind from the primary and real question before you, to the consideration of a collateral and false issue, between myself and the companions of Eaton and Randolph, whilst at their rendezvous; whereby you might ostensibly impeach my veracity, without contradicting one of my assertions. Not content with framing such an issue, thus calculated to do me injury, and to defeat every purpose of justice, I find in your letter, and with deep regret feel myself obliged to expose it, indubitable evidence of a deplorable bias in your mind. As an apparent cause for the embarrassment interposed, you have made a gratuitous offer of your protection to me if I should engage in those prosecutions. But not having sought such protection, nor deemed it desirable, it removes none of the difficulties previously and subsequently thrown in the way. I asked an assurance of protection for the witnesses who might hold offices at your disposal, from injury in consequence of giving testimony, but this is given in a form which they will regard as a threat, rather than an assurance of protection.

As no witness would be required to inculpate himself by his own testimony, the condition annexed to your assurance, that "it must not be construed as affording impunity for their own misconduct, which the investigation might unfold," could have no meaning that I can imagine, unless intended for a menace. I have also observed in your letter another obstacle to any scrutiny before a tribunal of the district. It is stated by you that, "should any person be found to have formed a part of a recruited force to engage in hostilities of any kind within the precincts of the department, or elsewhere, (you) will feel it to be (your) duty, in addition to the penalties of the law, forthwith to dismiss the offender from public service;" and in the next paragraph you prejudge and promulgate the acquittal of the "acting secretary of war, and others" (alleged to have been charged by me) of any offence whatever, having previously justified the officers whose rooms were occupied for a rendezvous, on the ground that "it was their duty to be there; and that any body else had a right to come there." If a free and untrammelled investigation had been gone into, as I requested, I had determined to call upon you as the first witness. Notwithstanding you say in your letter to Messrs. Campbell, Smith, Lewis, and Randolph, that "Mr. Ingham's letter," (received by you at 9 o'clock on the morning of the 22nd June) "gave (you) the first information that (you) had on the subject of his difficulties," yet I risk nothing in saying, that your examination, with the other testimony in my power, would have afforded ample proof of the extraordinary fact that you were well apprised of what was going on anterior to that date. The feelings which governed you on this occasion, may be understood from the fact, that you have justified major Eaton's meditated assault upon me, and from the declaration of one of your devoted friends, that, in a conversation he had with you before the intended assault, you informed him of the controversy between major Eaton and myself, and said that, "if there was to be any more writing, it would be in red ink." Your course, on this subject, is the more extraordinary, and the more worthy to be specially remarked, inasmuch as the persons principally interested are known to be of your most confidential friends, and believed to be partakers of your most secret councils; who were in habits of daily intercourse and consultation with you, and whose devotion to your wishes authorised the belief that they would do nothing of importance against your approbation. Of the principal offender no notice is taken, as if there was no such person on the stage of action. All the rest engaged, or supposed to have been engaged in the intended assault, are completely exculpated, and a virtual amnesty given them, while the words of your letter appear guardedly arranged to convey a denunciation of "the penalties of the law," and dismission from office, against those who were armed in my defence. It should be observed that your denunciation of the penalties of the law, and your judgment of the acquittal in the District of Columbia, are not idle words. All the juries who might be called to try such offences, must be selected under your own eye, and by an officer who holds his office at your will; in addition to this, you hold the pardoning power in your own hands. Whoever has paid attention to state trials, cannot be insensible to the effect of these powers. I am, therefore, now met with an unsought offer of personal protection, while I carry on a public prosecution, in which the witnesses I might offer are threatened with the privation of the means of subsistence for their families, and some with the addition of the penalties of the law, as a punishment for their generous services in my defence. How can I understand such a communication as expressing a desire for a free, impartial, and untrammelled investigation of truth, before a tribunal of justice. It is any thing else rather than this. If it had been your sole intention, in writing this letter, to deter the scrutiny it purports to acquiesce in, it could not have been more effectually framed for its object; for you had judged rightly in supposing that I would much rather suffer all the detriment arising from the imputation cast upon me by your proceeding, than expose to injury, men who had offered to risk their lives for mine. But you have left me no choice in an appeal to a tribunal of criminal jurisdiction. At the same moment in which you seemingly invited public attention to see "what proofs (I) should be able to bring in support of the charges," you closed the door as well against the witnesses as against the effect of their testimony. Instead of accepting my aid for the purposes of justice, you have proclaimed the acquittal of the guilty, and left nothing for me to do but to aid you in the arraignment and punishment of the innocent. To give the more effect to your purpose, you allege that you have already made inquiries (secretly of course) and from the information thus received, declare my statements to be "unfounded in fact;" and not only denounce the evidence on which I relied as "vague and false," without having heard it, but to complete this course of proceeding in a manner most injurious to my character and feelings, you have even descended from your high station to offer me a personal taunt. Such is the close of the last scene of the political relation between you and me.

You will perceive that I have carefully abstained from introducing into this discussion any matter to which you have not invited public attention in your letter of the 7th inst. and your document of the 11th, and which is not necessary to my defence against the charges therein made. I have therefore left a vast field wholly unexplored, all of which was fairly at my disposal, if I could have reconciled my feelings, even under such circumstances of injury, to do any thing which might resemble an aggressive controversy with the chief magistrate. Self defence is, however, one of those sacred reserved rights which, it is conceded in all communities, man has never submitted to the entire control of society; it is this right alone I claim to have exerted in the foregoing remarks. If I have used it with what any one may consider an undue freedom, it will be cause of regret to me; but having, from the beginning of my official connexion until it was dissolved by you, devoted all the faculties of my mind to the public service, with no other view than to promote the public interest and the character of the government, and, consequently the fame of its chief officer, I have not considered myself as laboring under obligations which could not be paid, nor you as having any right to inflict injuries by way of adjusting such a balance. With the exception of station, therefore, I felt no restraint which would not be required in any other case, and if station can be construed to confer privileges of this nature, those who claim them ought to remember that the established courtesies of republican society, at least, protect the inferior members from the unjust effects of such a privilege, by imposing corresponding restraints on the superior. But it should always be kept in view, wherever this correspondence may lead to, that it has been forced upon me in a manner which has left me no choice but to suffer the effects of your cruel injustice, or to use some of the means which crowd into my service, to avert the intended wrongs. I have already adverted to the manner in which our official connexion has been maintained on my part. The documents before me show how that relation has been maintained on your part. It commenced in suspicion, and continued under a brooding, but restrained hostility; was marked, near its close, by a wanton and desperate design, fostered in the breast of your most devoted and most confidential friend, to assail my life; and, failing in this, it is now terminated with a still more unrelenting and injurious purpose of destroying my reputation, and robbing my children of their only hope of bequest. I have the honor to be, respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. D. INGHAM.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 24—VOL. IV. BALTIMORE, AUG. 13, 1831. [VOL. XL. WHOLE No. 1,038

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

☞ We have almost daily applications to "exchange" papers. Our list, as several times stated, is distressingly heavy, and must be reduced—the willingness to extend this courtesy being restrained by the necessity imposed of examining all the papers received, a task not easily performed and exhausting much time: for, however important hundreds of journals published in the United States are to the people of their respective neighborhoods, (and we most heartily wish general success to them), they are chiefly of no manner of use to us—but a serious inconvenience, as just above mentioned. As a common rule, we exchange with the editors of all papers who "pay the difference," if amounting to two dollars a year, and with some few without exacting a "difference:" but in respect to all, we must be allowed to exercise our own discretion.

At the end of the present month, (which closes the current volume), we shall overhaul our exchange list, and make some additions to it—but strike off a considerable number, on account of which the promised "difference" has not been paid, or for other reasons. This design is now stated to prevent disappointments or mistakes. Those editors who do not receive the REGISTER will know the reason of it—if the mails arrive faithfully.

☞ A communication from a farmer of Philadelphia county is laid off for our next paper. It presents some home-truths on a very interesting subject.

THE CABINET, &c. Mr. McLane, the new secretary of the treasury, arrived at Washington on Saturday last, and Mr. Cass, the new secretary of war, on Sunday—so that the "cabinet" is again full.

KENTUCKY. The elections in this state closed on Wednesday week. The following information of the results have reached us. In the Lexington district, Fayette county, for congress, the vote stood at the end of the third days polls, Allan, (C.) 1,125, Shannon Jackson 686; in Clark, Allan 451 ahead of Shannon, and in Woodford 2nd day he was 207 ahead of Shannon—making an aggregate (partial) majority of 1,097. In the Maysville district, Marshall's (C.) majority over Coleman (J.) on the first day was 465. In the Louisville district the vote in Jefferson county, first day, Wickliffe's (J.) majority over Thruston, (C.) was 109, the majority of Thruston in the city of Louisville on the 2nd day at dinner was 427. In the Mount Sterling district Davis' (C.) majority over Daniel (J.) as far as heard from was 430. In the Frankfort district, Ford's (C.) majority, as far as heard from, over Lecompt, (J.) was 626—the returns embrace the result of the 1st and part of the 2nd days voting in Franklin county, and that of the 1st day's in Shelby and Anderson counties. Adair's (J.) majority over Kincaid in the Stanford district is said to be 354. In the Lancaster district, judge Letcher's majority over Garrard (both C.) was about 350.

JOHN C. CALHOUN was nominated by a public meeting, held in the city of New York, on the evening of the 9th instant, as a candidate for the presidency.

"POLITICS FOR WORKING MEN." We present a few facts and remarks, by way of an appendix to the essay under this title published in a late REGISTER.

From late British papers.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Dombrain, inspector general of the Coast guard, Ireland.

Ballynass, May 25.

As it would be impossible for me to pourtray any thing like the distress—the awful and appalling visitation of the Almighty,* in these parts—so shall I not attempt it; it is heart-rending—the people are dying; having lived for some time on the common sea weed, they have been suddenly inflicted with swellings all over their bodies. It has the appearance of dropsy, but attacks all parts. They are sinking under it. I am still housing in the food, and have received nine cargoes of potatoes.

Extract of a letter from the rev. Mr. Ellis, received through the duchess of Beaufort.

"I write to lay before you the dreadful distress at present existing in Connemara, and to beg your advice and assistance in endeavoring to relieve it. Famine and fever are stalking hand in hand through this miserable region; and if some relief be not immediately found, thousands upon thousands must perish.

As a last resource, some are now bleeding the cattle, boiling their blood, and eating it. I see nothing before us all this summer but famine and pestilence—any thing that can be done for us, ought to be done quickly; another month's distress may cause the death of thousands."

Bristol, May 31. It is with the most painful feelings we call the attention of our fellow citizens to the hapless condition of the peasantry of the sister country. We will not stop to inquire into the causes which have operated to impend over our miserable brethren the horrors of a calamity more terrible than even the scourge of the sword or the pestilence; but we would exhort our readers to be prompt in staying the sufferings which a scarcity of provisions, already approaching to a famine, is rapidly spreading throughout the western districts. Already many lives have fallen victims to starvation, and the accounts represent some thousands to be reduced to a state so debilitated as to render the efficacy of nutriment questionable, even if it were afforded them.

According to letters received this morning from Castlebar and New Port Pratt, we regret to learn that famine is rapidly increasing in this part of Mayo, and working a dreadful mortality among the people.

Consolidated farms. Late English papers furnish a melancholy picture of the present state of the Irish peasantry—those of the county of Clare, more particularly. Strenuous, but, it is to be feared, fruitless efforts are now making by these people to prevent the consolidation of farms; and to keep down the rent of certain lands. "In providing," says the Liverpool Journal, "a place for their park," (speaking of the resident gentry of Clare) "their equipage, and hounds, they have expelled thousands of small tenants, who were yet prepared to pay for the land they require, more than it could possibly yield to the proprietor, whether cultivated by himself, or let out to large farmers." "A gentleman of some experience in parish business," says a Dr. Stokes quoted by the Journal, "found no instance, in which a man occupying one acre of ground, was ever reduced to apply for aid to the parish." The residence of large landed proprietors in Ireland has not conduced to the benefits which it was confidently predicted would result from such residence, to the renters of small farms. The outrages which have lately been perpetrated in several parts of Ireland, are unhesitatingly, and, we think reasonably, referred to the difficulty on the part of the poorer classes, of procuring land to cultivate. Numbers from this cause, have been forced upon the roads; and the return of the absentees, it is believed, will but aggravate the evil. The parliament is looked to for relief—but, in the meantime, what is to become of thousands of families?

Priestland, Ireland, May 3. After speaking of the poverty of the people—

"The effect of this state of society on the reflecting, laborious and industrious, is prodigious. Emigration is now the rage of the day. Persons of considerable properties are now disposing of all and emigrating. One man, a neighbor of mine, has disposed of valuable property, and has sailed for the Indiana territory, carrying with him in bills on London, $2,000. From the port of Belfast alone, there sailed, in the course of three weeks, 10,532 persons, among whom there were many persons of respectability and property. In the port of Sligo, there are twelve vessels, which will carry away 3,000 persons; not to speak of the ports of Derry, Newry, &c. &c. Putting all considerations together, you will have some faint conception of our situation, but not a thousandth part of the reality.

The picture of the distress in Ireland presented by the English papers, is truly appalling. The Times of the 8th June, has better than a column of extracts from letters written in that unhappy country, detailing the miseries of the population. One of these letters, dated at Mayo, says:

"The accounts I hear from the line of sea-coast and the island of Achill, about 15 miles from this, from good authority, leaves the dreadful impression on my mind, that no power of man—no relief that may be sent—no efforts of ours—nothing, in short, can save hundreds of the wretched people from death before one month elapses: the famine is extensive—the means of alleviating the multitudes of claimants so inadequate. That parish contains about a thousand families, all their crops were destroyed.

"There is some disease; where it is, it most probably will be fatal; for there is neither food, medicine, nor advice for the sufferers.

The Dublin Evening Post states that in the county of Mayo there are not fewer than 150,000 persons, men, women, and children, in a state of actual starvation. Armed parties of insurgents are traversing various parts of the country, committing great outrages. In Galway, Crossmolin, and other parts of the country, the distress was not less calamitous. People were seen upon the sea shore collecting weeds to boil for subsistence—some had taken out of the ground and devoured the potatoes planted for seed, which latter act would aggravate the evil ten fold by curtailing the harvest, and presenting no prospect but inevitable starvation in the summer, since an entire failore will be anticipated in the crops. Emigration from some towns to America was going on at a rapid rate.

Thousands of poor and miserable people are arriving in the United States from Ireland, England and Scotland. There is great suffering in Canada on this account—and the charity of the inhabitants is severely taxed to keep the strangers from perishing. The people of the western isles of Scotland are leaving rapidly, because of the want of food, even potatoes. Hundreds live, or rather half-starve on cockles and other shell fish, which are gathered with desperation, and carried many miles, in some instances, to eke out a subsistence. Why should men be reduced to this condition? But it is the policy of royalty to grind the laboring people, lest they get fat, and feel a right to freedom. So the body must be chained that the mind may be subdued.

In some parts of England, the people do not seem much better off than those of Ireland—the following is from the Brighton Gazette, at which place the late king squandered immense sums of money:

"We understand that the money paid to the poor of this parish last winter for digging flints, was one thousand nine hundred and seventy-eight pounds; and that the flints sold for two hundred and forty-six pounds!

Because of the severity of the distress in Ireland, terrible riots often take place—and the people are quieted by the soldiers! Nine persons, three of them old women, were lately killed at Castlepollard. The mob had resisted the police. It is worthy of serious reflection, that the parts of Ireland most distressed, are those in which manufactures are most feebly carried on. Britain, regarding Ireland as a conquered country—to be held in subjection only by oppression—has always discouraged the general establishment of manufactures, and exceedingly embarrassed, if not absolutely forbidden some of them—according to that system of policy, which would not have allowed the manufacture of a hob-nail in America.

A late Irish paper says—"In the starving counties, potatoes, are, it seems, but 2d. a stone of 14lb. yet the absentee landlords, tithe collectors, and tax gatherers, have so completely drained the district of money, that the people have not 2d. to feed their families."

☞Now what kind of people in the United States are these, the friends of "free trade," who would that American citizens should put the value of their labor on a par with that of persons who are starving for the want of food, though 14lbs. of potatoes, (seven day's supply, as these poor people consume them), may be purchased for 2d. or four cents? But the principle of this "free trade" would reduce us to that wretched condition.

The New York American publishes the following extract of a letter from a gentleman in England, to another in New York:

"I neglected to mention to you in my last, the state of Ireland from starvation. You will get it all, no doubt, from the papers; but be assured its far from being exaggerated. One writer mentions that at the moment he wrote, there were three thousand individuals on the sea shore, in sight, gathering sea-weed to boil for sustenance. The cattle are bled, and the blood boiled and used. The seed potatoes are dug up and devoured; and ere this reaches you, some thousands will have ceased to live from actual starvation. Now is the time for the friends of Ireland with you to stretch forth a helping hand. A few loads of flour would save thousands and exalt the American name. In this country, the poor are bad enough, God knows, but not to be compared to the Irish. The more I see of this country, the more I see the demoralizing effects of poverty—the oftener, and with more fervor, do I exclaim, happy, happy AMERICA!

☞This is a pretty story! What, send flour that it may be seized, as at Newry,* or, though tendered GRATIS, be so heavily duted that it cannot be consumed,†

*It appears by the following paragraphs that there have been some seizures of American flour made, not only in Newry, but in other places:—

Seizure of flour. A few weeks back, some flour imported from Liverpool, was seized by the custom house officers at Newry on the supposition that the same was of American manufacture. As a point was then raised on whom the onus probandi lay, the millers of Newry were induced to take Mr. Holmes' opinion on it, and that gentleman has accordingly given his opinion as follows:

"It appears to me, that the proof that the flour imported is of British growth and manufacture, lies on the importer. This case seems to come within the 6 Geo. IV. chap. 108, sec. 102, which enacts that, if any goods shall be seized for non-payment of duties, or any other cause of forfeiture, and any dispute shall arise whether the customs, excise, or inland duties have been paid for the same, or the same have been lawfully imported, or concerning the place from whence such goods were brought, then, and in such case, the proof thereof shall lie on the owner or claimer of such goods, and not on the officer who shall seize and stop the same."

†The thoughtlessness of this proposition, or the want of knowledge shewn in it, is a little remarkable. The present duty on flour is about, or nearly 12*s.* per barrel, of 196lbs.—the freight to Ireland will cost 4*s.* 6*d.* and the price in the United States is about 22*s.* sterling. Let us add them together, and see the result:

potatoes being at only 2d. per stone!—or a great deal cheaper, (as to their money-price), then we can purchase them in America! It would be sound economy to send the money—if relief were afforded at all.

ON THE OTHER HAND.

The late anniversary of the king's birth day was splendidly honored—the queen wore a "tiara of diamonds," and there was a great profusion of expense. The whole cost of this fete was estimated at 100,000 pounds—for delicacies and dresses, and pomp and shew. Now, if the celebration of the king's birth-day had been quietly passed over, the money which it cost would have purchased one hundred and sixty-eight millions of pounds of potatoes, (or their equivalent in other articles of food), and, at 2lbs. per day for each person, have subsisted a whole million of the starving people of Ireland, nearly three months.

The king's three sons and three daughters, or rather the famous Mistress Jourdan's children, are all enrolled in the peerage with fat allowances, or emoluments—surely not less than £10,000 each, or £60,000, for the ILLEGITIMATES, per annum!—equal to a capital of two millions of pounds sterling, at 3 per cent. or nine millions of dollars! Lady Nelson's jewels, chiefly supplied at the people's cost, are worth £80,000 or 400,000 dollars! The grants to the duke of Wellington and the provisions for his family, are equal to eight or nine millions of dollars—and so they go on ad infinitum;—the retired pay list, army, navy and civil—that is, the "splendid paupers" or pensioners, receiving, in all, about twenty-five millions of dollars a year;—and yet the people of the United States are urged to send a "few loads of flour" to Ireland, that the people may not perish! This is as ridiculous as the legacy of £10 which some Englishman bequeathed to pay off the public debt! —The people must attempt to "work out their own salvation." The whole of our surplus wheat and corn of the current year, have hardly a greater value than the king has conferred on his six misbegotten children.—When the "working-men" of England and Ireland shall resist as they ought, the power which grinds them to the earth—then will we call aloud to help them! Aye, HELP THEM TO THE UTMOST OF OUR MEANS. At present, any good rendered will only add its amount to the profligacy that abounds, and be a total loss to American givers.

We offer another example—from a late English paper: The two cock-fighting parsons, just as likely as not, are in the annual receipt of 500 or 1,000 pounds, each, exacted at the point of the sword:

On Monday last, a main of cocks was fought at Brooke, in Rutland, between the rev. Henry Floyder, of Ayston, and the rev. Samuel Shield, of Preston, against the parishes of Oakham, Langham, and Cottesmore, which was lost by the two reverend gentlemen. Five cocks were fought on each side, the parsons losing four out of the five battles. [English paper.

☞The late riots among the people employed at the great iron works in Wales, were caused by the want of food. A large part of these miserable people are hired by the parishes to the iron-masters, as though they were black slaves—and the small wages paid them serve to reduce the amount of the poor-rates! They are hard worked, and scantily fed and clothed—being really paupers, though able-bodied men! See what is stated above in regard to the English flint-diggers. The value produced was only one-fourth part of the cost of subsistence! So also was it with some of the working-people in the Welsh iron factories—and with them and such as these, it is insisted that the free laborers of the United States shall contend! Who among them, native or adopted, can be so thoughtless of himself and his family as to permit proceedings—(so far as his vote may control them), which have a tendency to reduce himself and them to the condition of these unfortunates—starving, because they cannot earn and obtain the equivalent of one-third of a cent per day that they may purchase food.

Since the preceding articles were prepared, we have received the following accounts of a massacre in Ireland from British papers:

Wholesale murder.—A horrible massacre—even more horrible than that of Castlepollard,—has just been committed in Ireland, at a place called Newtonbarry; arising out of a seizure for tithe, at the instance of a reverend dignitary of the church by law established in that unhappy country. This minister of a religion that inculcates compassion for suffering, and all the concurrent virtues of charity, mercy and peace, had seized and brought to sale two heifers belonging to some of his poor parishioners; and when, instead of purchasing, the compassionate by-standers evinced a disposition to rescue these, the police and yeomanry present were ordered to fire indiscriminately on the crowd. This, for a wonder, the police refused; but the yeomanry, who in Ireland are all orangemen, felt no such reluctance, and instantly obeying the order, killed nineteen people and wounded forty, some of them women and children! How long will such atrocities be tolerated in a country calling itself intelligent and civilized?

Dreadful destruction of human life—The following letter gives the particulars of a dreadful and fatal affray between the Irish peasantry and a body of yeomanry, at Newtonbarry:

"Newtonbarry, Sunday evening 19th June.

"It is with the greatest trouble of mind I communicate to you the details of a most sanguinary slaughter I witnessed yesterday, (Saturday), at Newtonbarry, about three o'clock, or thereabouts; but ten times the limits of this paper will not let you know the half of this bloody tragedy. About a fortnight back, some cattle of Paddy Doyle's, of Tambrick, having been taken (it is said illegally) for tithe by McClintock, were under bail till yesterday, when they were brought forward to the pound of Newtonbarry; but at the same time, Graham, agent to lord Farnham, and a magistrate, collected all the young yeomanry and police from the surrounding towns and country to his own stable yard, screened from the public by a high wall, to the number of about 150 men, well armed, and having 50 rounds of ball cartridge each. The cattle being put to sale, and all these yeomanry in battle order on the road at the pound, some incautious little boys began to shout, and one or two of them pitched stones amongst the yeomen, which, without any further provocation, was a signal for slaughter; upon this the yeomen opened on the people, who, unsuspicious of mischief, were at the muzzles of the guns, a most dreadful, destructive, and galling fire. Oh! I tremble, and my eyes drop tears this moment to relate it. In a few minutes the road and fields were bestrewed with dead bodies of men, women and children! I myself had been at the market, and went down to the pound; in a few minutes after my arrival at the pound the fire commenced; several fell at each side of me on the road, and thanks to heaven! I escaped, amidst tremendous showers of balls, to the town, where I remained till all was tranquil in the evening, when I came and viewed the dead and wounded; but, thank God! found no one from our neighborhood, save only one young man, Mick Doyle, only son of Matty Doyle, of Kildallo, who being shot through the upper part of the breast, died in about an hour and a half. Of the remainder of the killed and wounded, I knew about ten or fourteen, the rest are from the far part of Dufry, Kilrush, and the surrounding country. The whole of the killed and wounded that have been found is about thirty or forty; but, besides, many have been drowned in the Slaney, and some shot in it, as it was at the side of the river the slaughter took place!

First cost of the flour	22*s.*

Thirty-eight shillings are 456 pence—equal to the purchase of 228 stone of potatoes in Ireland, or three thousand and ninety-two pounds of potatoes, against 196lbs. of flour!

The farcical notion, then, of sending flour to Ireland, must be apparent to every body. The idea of it was kindly built upon the sufferings of the people—but the CAUSE of their distress was entirely mistaken. It was not the want of an abundance of food in Ireland—but of MONEY, in certain of the most oppressed parts of the country, to purchase it—OF EVEN TWO PENCE TO OBTAIN SEVEN DAYS SUBSISTENCE.

was bank high; and many women and children, to avoid the bullets, rushed in and became a prey to the watery element. I saw, in the confusion, two women who did so, one the mother of seven children. Enough, enough! But every praise is due to Mr. King, chief of police, and the men themselves, for not one of them fired on the people, unless it might be two or three: and great slaughter had like to have taken place between them and the yeomen, who are all this day locked up in Graham's yard, and last night also. How it may end I cannot tell: I saw them looking over the walls at us as we went this day to Newtonbarry mass. This is all I can at present say: what I have said is only a sketch, and a small one. The road, for about fifteen perches, was covered with the blood of the slain, as if a shower of blood had fallen.

☞Another paper gives the names of the killed and wounded—killed 14, among them one woman and one child; wounded 23, among them two women. It was thought that many of the wounded would die.

This infamous affair was brought before parliament—but had not been disposed of. Some one spoke loudly of the humanity of the priest for whom the seizure was made, and of the excellent character of those who commanded at the massacre!

It is admitted that the laws must be obeyed so long as they exist—but the apparent disposition of a famishing people to resist a proceeding so rascally, was most barbarously punished.

We shall close this collection of items with the following eloquent paragraph, from the pen of Channing, as a text for a well written essay, in the Bengal Chronicle:

"No matter what race of animals a country breeds.—The great question is: does it breed a noble RACE OF MEN? No matter what its soil may be. The great question is: how far is it prolific of moral and intellectual power. * * What is liberty? The removal of restraint from human powers. Its benefit is, that it opens new fields for action, and a wider range for the mind. The only freedom worth possessing, is that which gives enlargements to the people's energy, intellect and virtue—which calls forth the highest faculties and energies; which generates fruitfulness of invention, force of moral purpose, a thirst for the true, and a delight in the beautiful. * * The true sovereigns of a country are those who determine its mind, its modes of thinking, its taste, its principles. In Europe political and artificial distinctions, have, more or less, triumphed over and obscured our common nature. MAN DOES NOT THERE VALUE HIMSELF AS MAN. It is for his blood, his rank, or some artificial distinction, and not FOR THE ATTRIBUTES OF HUMANITY, that he holds himself in respect."

"THE FREE TRADE CONVENTION." We lately made some remarks on the getting-up of the proposed convention at Philadelphia, having understood that it was planned by the editor of the "Banner of the Constitution" and a member of congress from South Carolina—(a happy union of constitution and nullification!) and four other persons; and that about fifteen individuals afterwards met in Philadelphia, and appointed sixteen delegates to the "general convention" one of whom is an unnaturalized Englishman, and at least one of the rest a regular British agent, &c.

The Richmond "Whig" of July 29, contains the official account of the proceedings of what is called "a meeting of the citizens of Williamsburg" to take into consideration the propriety of sending delegates to the anti-tariff convention to be held at Philadelphia, at which Robert Saunders was chairman, and John M. Gregory, secretary. They passed several flaming resolutions, and appointed five delegates to the convention. But Robert Anderson having made a motion to postpone the resolutions indefinitely, the strength of the meeting was shewn by the votes—(2 for, 15 against the motion), to be exactly seventeen!* The same paper has a representation of this meeting by an "Eye Witness." At the first call of the mayor, by public advertisement, a few persons only attended, and an adjournment took place, all the runners sent out not being able to gather persons enough to keep one another in countenance. Next day, the court-house bell was rung, and much noise made, and behold, though seventeen persons collected, only 13 voted on most of the resolutions adopted or rejected—and five of the thirteen were connected with the college of William and Mary—professor Semple making a large speech! Mr. Anderson offered certain opposing resolutions, which were lost—4 for, 9 against them! He then offered the following—

Resolved, That the late refusal of the thirteen individuals, (four of whom are now present, and among whom are the president, the professor of morals, and the professor of law, with three of the visitors of William and Mary college), who have taken possession of the Old Bruton parish state church, and style themselves rector, wardens, and vestry thereof—to permit a fellow-parishioner, then mayor of Williamsburg, to introduce a respectable, intelligent, and pious Christian minister to its pulpit, for the purpose of preaching there—and their refusal, also, to permit that parishioner to enter the church and offer his individual devotions at the altar of his forefathers—are acts of glaring usurpation, deserving in a much greater degree, the condemnation of this meeting, than any acts of congress imposing a tariff.

But the meeting refused, by an overwhelming majority, nine against three, to consider this resolution—and then the orthodox resolutions were passed, and the meeting adjourned, sine die.

We should not have noticed these proceedings except to shew that this convention is to be carried-on in close keeping with its getting-up—"beggarly accounts" of individuals taking it upon themselves to express public opinion, and so mislead the public mind.

It is not the first time that such things have happened—the "chamber of commerce," of Baltimore once attempted to direct the government in an important matter—and so gross was the affair, that, though we made zealous enquiries at the time, the names of the persons present at the meeting could not be ascertained—for public use and record. This sort of management is always a fair subject for reproof.

We shall probably have a meeting in Baltimore, pretty soon, with the view of forming a state association to support the PROTECTING SYSTEM, according to the recommendation of the convention held at New York, in May last—and we hope that as many persons will be present, without regard to political parties, as might pick up and carry away the whole city of Williamsburg, and cast it into the "swamps of the Patapsco," (which Dr. Cooper spoke of as being the sites for manufacturing establishments!) should there exist a will to "nullificate" that venerable remnant of other days. But let "the remnant be saved!"

WOOL AND WOOLLENS. Since our last we have received a number of the "New York Evening Journal," which ought to have reached us several days before, from which we extract the interesting article below. It is well and plainly written and speaks the truth, and requires no commentary from us. We prefix two or three interesting little articles.

From the Canandiagua Repository of July 27: It is only within the last few years that any considerable quantity of this article [wool] has found a market in our village. Last year 53,300 lbs. were purchased, amounting to $18,655. This year, our merchants have bought 135,690 lbs., for which the sum of $91,739 30, in cash, has been paid to the enterprising farmers of this and the adjoining counties.

It ought to be remarked, that the unwise and impolitic speculation entered into last fall, in slaughtering many thousands of common sheep for their pelts, withdrew from this market not less than 100,000 pounds of wool, which would have readily brought 50 cents per pound, and given an additional sum of $50,000 to the wealth of this county.

We would respectfully urge upon the farmers and wool-growers of this section of our state, the importance of devoting more time and attention to the improvement and condition of their flocks, as well as to the manner of cleaning and putting up their wool for market; and it gives us great pleasure to know, that the labors of that most respectable portion of our community, have been so richly rewarded during the past year, by receiving the highest prices for every product of their industry, while every article which is necessary for the comfort and happiness of the farmer, has been sold by the merchants at the lowest prices. These are truly happy and prosperous times for our country.

Immortal number!—Seventeen members of the senate of New York denied the people of that state the power of suffrage for the "preservation of the republican party," and to force Mr. Crawford into the presidency of the United States, in obedience to the orders of the caucus, and its magical agent.

The Steubenville (Ohio) Herald says—We understand that about fifty thousand dollars have been paid for wool, of the growth of this neighborhood, and delivered in this town the present season. This section of country, we have reason to believe, was never in a more prosperous condition than at present.

Extract from a letter dated London June 14th.—"This country has not been so bare of wool for thirty years, as within six months past. Stocks in the hand of the staplers and farmers, 12 to 15 years old have all been taken. Some millions of pounds of low grades have been shipped to Prussia and Austria on government contracts. I have just been conversing with an extensive manufacturer from Yorkshire, who says that the manufacturers in that region have no stocks on hand, and buy from hand to mouth hoping for a decline to last year's prices, but I am confident they will be disappointed. Low wools will not be any lower this year."

The Petersburg Intelligencer, speaking of the proposed anti-tariff convention at Philadelphia, remarks—"We are not for attacking the tariff by a coup de main. We would have the duties taken off as they were imposed, by degrees."

"But the high duties on woollen goods constitute the great bone of the contention—and we hope the proposed anti-tariff convention at Philadelphia will speak in such a tone, and place the subject in so clear a light, as to induce the northern manufacturers to consent to a satisfactory modification, upon the guarantee of a monopoly of the home market for sale of their cotton fabrics."

☞ If the "high duties on woollen goods" are interfered with, the growth of wool must be literally destroyed, except for family purposes only. Not less than two-thirds of the value of cloths in the United States beyond the cost of like goods in England, is now passing into the pockets of the farmers on account of their wool. The breeding of sheep—because of the value of their wool and flesh, is a far more important concern than the planting of cotton, COTTON, COTTON; and the world, thank heaven!—is not made of COTTON: it is not the only thing that we have to eat or drink or wear—to build houses with or make shoes! We invite the attention of the farmers to the article that follows—and hope that they will send a strong representation to the general convention of agriculturalists, manufacturers and mechanics, which is to be held at New York on the second Wednesday of October next—that the doings of the "free trade" convention at Philadelphia, may be corrected.

TO FARMERS.

Mr. Jenks—In the Albany Argus of July 18, is an article under the head of "queries to farmers," which, though it carries with it evidence sufficient to refute it; yet as it may possibly mislead some who may not give it due consideration, I will thank you for a place in your paper for comment upon it.

It is put in the form of a number of questions, the purpose of which undoubtedly is, to insinuate that the manufacturers of cloths have an enormous protection; that they are exacting sacrifices from all other members of the community, while they are combining for the purpose of lowering the price of wool; and further, to aid the election of Mr. Clay.

The late convention of wool growers and manufacturers held in this city, is attacked in many of the papers friendly to the present administration. In the Poughkeepsie Journal of the 20th, the same strain is kept up as in the piece above referred to in the "Argus."

I sent you for publication, some little time since, a statement by which I clearly proved to you, that when cloths costing abroad a dollar the square yard were fairly and honestly imported, the wool grower was protected to nearly the whole amount of the duty on the cloth, because every yard contained two pounds of wool which was taxed fifty per cent. Since then I have consulted several extensive woollen manufacturers of an adjoining state; and they inform me that a yard of cloth will take two and quarter pounds of wool. Now as this is really a very important matter to our farmers, let us see whether or no it is their interest to sustain the duties on cloths.

One yard of cloth costing in England one dollar and fifty cents per running yard, that is, per yard as it is bought by farmers out of the shops, is made of ENGLISH WOOL costing there about thirty-five cents per pound, and as before stated, each yard contains two and a quarter pounds.

2¼ lbs. of ENGLISH WOOL at.....c35 is...	c79
Now the duty on this wool is first 4 cents per pound specific, which is.....	c 9
An ad valorem duty of fifty per cent. is fifty-five per cent. on the cost per lb. because in all cases of ad valorem duty, ten per cent. is added to the cost; this duty then is fifty per cent. on 87 cents, which is.....	c43½
	52½
The duty on a yard of cloth is.....	c68
Deduct the duty on the foreign wool, of which it is made, as above stated.....	c52½
	c16½

The manufacturer then, on cloth of this description, has a protection of 16½ cents, on $1 50, which is ELEVEN PER CENT —the remaining forty-four per cent. is a protection to the wool grower.

But the late convention held in this city was not called for the purpose of interfering with this law, but to put a stop to frauds by which the wool grower and manufacturer are entirely deprived of all protection. Very many cases have occurred, and it is believed yet occur, in which cloths pay but sixty-eight cents per yard which cost two dollars per yard. The case then stands thus:—

2¼ lbs. of foreign wool, costing 50 cts. per lb. is $1	12½
Specific duty as above.....	c 9
Ad valorem duty as above on—
2¼ pounds of wool, at c50, is.....	62
	71

Thus, the real duty which such a cloth ought to pay, if legally imported, is 71 cents on the two and a quarter pounds of wool for the benefit of the wool grower; but, being fraudulently imported, it only pays 52½ cents.—Nor does it indeed pay this for his benefit, for being fraudulently imported, it deprives the manufacturer entirely of his protection, and is sold in this market at a price ruinous to his business, which entirely takes away from him the power to buy wool at any price whatever, by which the wool grower can live—of course it is also ruinous to the interest of the wool grower.

The convention then instead of meeting for the purpose charged against them, met for the express purpose of raising the price of wool.

Our farmers will surely understand this matter, and not let the anti-tariff politicians cheat them out of their market for the sale of their wool.

It is easily to be seen what object these men have—they have been driven from every argument they have brought forward against protection to the home industry and now they are endeavoring to create a jealousy between the wool grower and the manufacturer of cloth; but they will fail in this as they have failed in every other scheme they hate got up, to sustain themselves, at the sacrifice of the great interests of agriculture and manufactures.

As to the charge of the late convention being political and sustaining the interests of Mr. Clay to the presidency, there is an unblushing impudence and falsehood in this assertion, greater than those they usually resort to. The president, the honorable Nathan Williams of Utica, is a well known Jackson-man and it is not to be presumed either that the members of the convention would have chosen him to that office, or that he would have served in it had there been any intention to make it a political engine to serve Mr. Clay.

But our wool growers are invited to join with their manufacturing friends and send a delegate from each congressional district to the convention, to meet in this city on the second Wednesday of October next, and then they will learn all about the motives of the manufacturers, who will never desert them.

The writer of this article is authorised to state that they will never consent to the reduction of any part of the present duty on wool—on the contrary that they go for the protection of the home industry as a system, and as such, will give it every support in their power.

FRANKLIN.

LOCOMOTIVES. The West Point, at Charleston, is performing five miles in nineteen minutes, with a train of cars attached containing about 120 persons, and one laden with cotton.

The usual time of the passage between Liverpool and Manchester--32 miles, is 90 minutes, with a train of cars and 300 passengers. The journey has been made in 58 minutes! On a late occasion, three locomotives, with 35 carriages and 900 passengers, were on the road together, and made a splendid show--in some parts of the road going a mile in a minute!

A letter from Liverpool says—Guerney's locomotive has been running on the common turnpike road, from Cheltenham to Gloucester for the last 4 months, full of passengers, without a single accident. The cause of the accident, the other day to his locomotive at Glasgow, was, that when he left that town to return to Cornwall, he took from it several important parts of the machinery, to prevent it from being used during his absence, but, contrary to his orders, the missing parts were supplied, by a person ignorant of the principles of the machine, and when put in motion the accident occurred, which you will see mentioned in the newspapers. Mr. Guerney has been most unfairly treated. The distance between Cheltenham and Gloucester is upwards of 9 miles, and the journey is accomplished within the hour.

DAVID WILLIAMS, the last of the captors of Andre, died on the 2nd inst. at Rensselaerville, N. Y. in the 79th year of his age. His remains were interred with military honors. The FIDELITY of Paulding, Van Wart and Williams will give their names to the latest posterity of the American people.

CHOLERA MORBUS. This dreadful disease is powerfully proceeding westward. Its desolation has been greater than any other scourge with which mankind has been latterly afflicted. It is spreading in Russia and Poland—and said to be of the very worst kind. On the 7th of June it reached Dantzic, and of 28 persons attacked fifteen died. At Riga, from 125 to 150 were attacked, daily—some die in six hours after the first symptoms appear, and not more than one-third recover. Strict quarantines had been estsblished at the Danish ports on the Baltic—and at Berlin, bills of health granted in Russia, Poland and Galicia are declared nullities. About forty vessels from the Baltic were quarantined in England.

It is said that the emperor of Russia has written, through his secretary, to the Prussian general Gneiscard, requesting him to offer to the inhabitants of Warsaw, the assistance of a celebrated physician, to prevent the ravages of the cholera morbus.

The Russian and Prussian physicians concur in the opinion that the disorder is not contagious.

INDIAN TREATY. The last received Mad River Courant states, that a treaty was holden on the 20th inst. between Mr. J. B. Gardner, acting on the part of the United States, and the Lewistown Indians, which resulted in the cession of the reserve belonging to the latter, The terms on which the purchase was made, are reported to be as follows: The Indians are to be paid for their lands at the rate of $ 1 25 per acre, so soon as the same shall be sold by government: and are besides to receive twice the quantity of land west of the Mississippi, where they are to be removed at the expense of the United States. They are likewise to be allowed some compensation for the improvements, and to be furnished with a certain quantity of farming utensils. The paper states, that a treaty for the same purpose was expected to be held in a few days with the Waughpalkonnetta Indians, who appeared willing to dispose of their lands in order to move further west.

THE CHEROKEE ANNUITY. The proceedings stated below are eminently calculated to destroy the national character of the Cherokees, and render the annuity unavailing—except to the profit of agents employed in the payment of it.

We observed not long since that the people throughout the nation had signed a protest against the mode contemplated for the distribution of the annuity, and that they had authorised Mr. John Martin to draw the money according to the manner heretofore practised. Mr. Martin, we understand, sometime since went to the agency and presented his papers, which the agent refused to accept, and gave as a reason that he must do his duty, and comply with the instructions from the president, requiring him to pay to individuals, and not to the nation. We supposed all along that no attention would be paid to those papers, but the Cherokees have done their duty in protesting against this little business of the government. It has now become notorious, that the wishes of a great majority of the individuals, for whose interest so much attention seems to be used by the great men at Washington, have been most shamefully disregarded. In these measures the object of the president is too obvious to be misunderstood.

We have heard the agent has succeeded in inducing some individuals, the majority of whom are women, to receive their proportion of the annuity, fifty cents a piece! It is further said that most of them have taken corn, (they preferred it we suppose), and the agent has received the money.—It is a money-making business for him and particular friends. We shall have occasion to recur to this subject hereafter.

The captive missionaries were still in close confinement, at the station of the Georgia guard, on the morning of the 14th inst. We have not understood whether they have since been delivered over into the hands of the civil authorities in Georgia. [Cherokee Phœnix.

"THE AMERICAN SYSTEM!" In the town of Georgia, Vermont, a few days since, a party of ladies met at the house of a friend, whose ages and descendants, as far as known, are as follows.

*The first year after the division of the states.

They all reside within one mile and a half of each other. Great numbers were present to witness this assemblage of extraordinary personages. It is seldom that a party of five have been found together, whose descendants amounted to such a number, viz. 532 persons.

☞ The preceding would throw Mr. Malthus and other like anti-population "philosophers" into hysterics! But we, in America, rejoice in the progress of lawful manufactures of all sorts! Our manufacturing villages are "generative" concerns. There are more young and virtuous married women at them, than can be found among the same number of like persons any where else.

FEMALE INGENUITY. The following anecdote is related in a late English paper.—"A short time since, a lady made her appearance in a box at the theatre Della Scala, in Milan, attired in the three insurrectionary colors—red, white and green. The police handed her out; but the next day, three ladies, each of whom had selected one of those colors for her dress, were seen sitting in the same box: they were received with loud applause by the audience, and then dismissed from the house by the argus-eyed minions of power."

DUTY OF POST MASTERS. From the Christian Advocate. The following extract of a letter from the post master general settles most clearly and definitely a very important point, in relation to which we have heretofore suffered grievously from the neglect of too many post masters to comply with the law and their instructions on the subject mentioned. The remedy to which the post master general has decided that we are entitled, is in exact accordance with what we have long believed to be both the law and the equity in the case, and is thoroughly efficient and satisfactory. If post masters do not give due notice to the publishers, in case any of our papers are not taken from their offices, "they are liable to pay the sum which would be due from the subscribers."

"Post office department, July 13, 1831.

"Gentlemen:—Your letter of the 8th inst. enclosing one from E. T. Bridge, is received at this department; and the post master of Savage's mills, Me. will be immediately written to upon the subject.

"The duty of post masters is very plainly laid down, upon the subject of which you speak, in the 12th section of the seventeenth instruction of the post office laws. They are bound to give immediate notice to the publishers of newspapers which arrive at their office, and which are not taken out by the persons to whom they are directed. In case they neglect this duty, they are liable to pay the sum which would be due from the subscriber. As to the right of post masters to sell the papers for the postage, as mentioned by Mr. Bridge, it does not accrue until after three months from the notice before spoken of, and it has reference only to the papers sent during and after that time. I am gentlemen, respectfully, your obedient servant, W. T. BARRY.

STEAM ENGINES. One of our late London papers says, it has been ascertained that there are in England not less than 15,000 steam engines at work, some of them of almost incredible power. There is one in Cornwall of a thousand horse power! Taking it for granted that, on an average, these engines are only of 25 horse power each, it would be equal to 375,000 horses.

BRITISH POPULATION. A new census is taking. The returns so far as published, shew a very large increase in the last 10 years—especially in the manufacturing districts.

THE NEW BRITISH PARLIAMENT. A late London paper presents the following view of the new house of commons—

Another paper gives a list of 28 peers who send 134 members—of 6 persons, not peers, who send 21 more—adding, that 48 other persons send 2 each, and 89 one member each—in recapitulation, 171 persons send 340 members to parliament. "Reform" was, indeed, necessary!

We have a long account of the election of the sixteen Scotch peers—two of those present were the husbands of two of Mrs. Jordan's children, the earl of Erroll and viscount Falkland. Both were candidates, but the latter only was elected. The earl of Erroll, however, has a seat in the house of lords by virtue of an English peerage which the king has given him. Falkland's wife was the centre of attraction at the ball or entertainment given after the election of the Scotch peers—and, in the homage paid her, perhaps—perhaps only, had heart enough to reflect that her mother, without any just cause, cast-off by the man she calls father, died at Paris in want of the usual necessaries of life—when the "royal duke," on the decease of the princess Charlotte, hastened to get married that the blood of the Guelphs might descend in a right line to bless the United Kingdom!

Mr. Thornby, a merchant at Liverpool and a candidate for a seat in parliament, was publicly objected to because "engaged in the American trade!"—that is, he traded with America and in American goods, as our shop-keepers do in British calicoes and pins—only on a larger scale.

THE KING AND ROYAL FAMILY OF FRANCE are very popular. They are easy of access, of plain manners, and very simple in their costume. The princesses often receive company in plain white muslin dresses, without any display of jewels, lace, &c. and their intercourse with individuals is unaffectedly frank and easy. The king conducts himself in the same way—but yet maintains the dignity of his place, as chief magistrate of a mighty nation. In his late tour, he was every where received with a generous enthusiasm—but sometimes embarrassing incidents occurred. We notice one of them, as characteristic of the king.

At Metz, after having harangued the mayor, and spoke favorably of the national guard, the king was about retiring, when a captain stepped forth, holding in his hand a written paper he was about to read to him. The king said, "Are you the commandant of the national guard?" 'No, sire, but I am delegated by the commandant."—'The king then permitted him to proceed, and he commenced his discourse as follows: "Sire, more than once since the revolution in July, the national guard of Metz has addressed to your majesty the expression of its devotion to the throne of the citizen king, and its vows in behalf of those institutions which ought to sustain it. Sire, you will find in our ranks a new manifestation of our affection. Yes, we bear on our standard the motto, 'liberty, public order.' In our view, these ideas are inseparable. If order be an indispensable condition of liberty, has not experience proved that the surest means of establishing order is to satisfy the progressive wants of civilization, by liberal and popular laws? Among these laws the most decisive for the future prosperity of France, is that which is to organize the second branch of the legislative power."—

At these words, the king, interrupting the officer, said, "The armed force does not deliberate: you are no longer the organ of the national guard: therefore I ought to hear no more."

The Moniteur says it was afterwards ascertained that this officer was not delegated by the commandant of the national guards.

PORTUGAL. England has obtained redress for the wrongs committed by order of the tyrant of Portugal, and France is sending a strong fleet to enforce her claims. We have heard of no movement on the part of the United States, to obtain "satisfaction for the past, or security for the future."

ALGIERS. France seems to be silently giving stability to her conquests on the coast of Barbary. When their contiguity to Europe and other great local advantages are considered, it is not improbable that this hitherto neglected and desolate tract of country may, under the benign influence of civilization, become the seat of a large population and an active commerce. It is a remarkable proof of the enlightened spirit of the age, that this acquisition of France has not excited the jealousy of rival nations. [N. Y. Courier.

[We rather think that the "rival nations" are too much afraid of their own people, and of one another, to interfere, just now.]

PROVISIONS. The following extract of a letter, has been received at the department of state:—

"The exportation of provisions from the provinces of Volhinia and Podolia being prohibited, in consideration of the demand for the supply of the Russian army; and two-thirds of the provisions at Odessa being likewise taken up, there is every reason to suppose that, in the spring, provisions will be scarce and dear. In order, as much as possible to obviate these inconveniences, the government proposes purchasing all the cargoes now on the spot which, including wheat and barley, amount to 200,000 Kilos."

[There is no use in speaking about weights or measures of capacities generally unknown. What is a "Kilos?" We have referred to several books without being able to ascertain its quantity. Even Oddy, in his table of Russian weights and measures, does not mention it.]

FOREIGN NEWS. We have given our usual brief history of foreign events, under their own proper head. An arrival from England, one day later, informs—

That Mr. Perrier had retired from the head of the French ministry, and was succeeded by marshal Soult. The affairs of Belgium were unchanged, except a report prevailed that a French army would soon march into that country. The French stocks had fallen.

The accounts from Warsaw are one day later. They shew the prevalence of the best spirit among the Poles. The general in chief had recruited his strength, and was about to leave Praga to attack the grand army of Russia. Their enemies appear very much harrassed and discouraged. It was reported that general Chrzanowski had just obtained a great victory over them, near Zamose.

The cholera is making dreadful ravages in Galicia, and is said to have broken out at Hamburg. The plague has made its appearance at Smyrna. France was quiet. The price of bread stuffs was declining in England. Cotton dull.

FOREIGN NEWS.

Arrivals at New York bring Liverpool dates to the 27th of June.

ENGLAND.

The British parliament was opened by the king, in person, on the 21st of June.

On Tuesday, June 21st, at an early hour, every roof, window, balcony and doorway, from St. James to St. Stephens, were beseiged with eager and expecting beholders. "At length, the roar of cannon announced the departure of the royal party from the palace. The intermediate time, until its arrival at the parliament, was marked by the reverberations of the multitudinous voices that hailed the king at every turn. 'Along the line the signal ran,' and the feu de joie of loyal voices in continued cheers, notwithstanding the parched lips of fiery faces, was kept up with little intermission. The king, we thought, looked pale and dispirited; and the cheering was not so loud and enthusiastic as the crowd would have led us to expect."

About 2 o'clock, he entered the antique chamber, in magnificent robes, and took his seat on the throne of that long line of kings, amongst whom there have been few more popular than himself. The commons were summoned, and his majesty, in a voice apparently affected by a slight cold, delivered the following

ADDRESS:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I have availed myself of the earliest opportunity of resorting to your advice and assistance after the dissolution of the late parliament.

"Having had recourse to that measure for the purpose of ascertaining the sense of my people on the expediency of a reform in the representation, I have now to recommend that important question to your earliest and most attentive consideration, confident that in any measures which you may prepare for its adjustment, you will carefully adhere to the acknowledged principles of the constitution, by which the prerogatives of the crown, the authority of both houses of parliament, and the rights and liberties of the people, are equally secured.

"The assurances of a friendly disposition which I continue to receive from all foreign powers, encourage the hope that, notwithstanding the civil commotions which have disturbed some parts of Europe, and the contest now existing in Poland, the general peace will be maintained.

"To the preservation of this blessing my most anxious care will be constantly directed.

"The discussions which have taken place on the affairs of Belgium have not yet been brought to a conclusion; but the most complete agreement continues to subsist between the powers whose plenipotentiaries have been engaged in the conferences of London. The principle on which these conferences have been conducted has been that of not interfering with the right of the people of Belgium to regulate their internal affairs, and to establish their government according to their own views of what may be most conducive to their future welfare and independence, under the sole condition, sanctioned by the practice of nations, and founded on the principles of public law, that in the exercise of that undoubted right, the security of the neighboring states should not be endangered.

"A series of injuries and insults, for which, notwithstanding repeated remonstrances, all reparation was withheld, compelled me at last to order a squadron of my fleet to appear before Lisbon, with a peremptory demand of satisfaction. A prompt compliance with that demand prevented the necessity of further measures; but I have to regret that I have not yet been able to re-establish my diplomatic relations with the Portuguese government.

"Gentlemen of the house of commons,

"I have ordered estimates of the expenses of the current year to be laid before you, and I rely with confidence on your loyalty and zeal to make adequate provision for the public service, as well as for the farther application of the sum granted by the last parliament; always keeping in view the necessity of a wise and wholesome economy in every branch of the public expenditure.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It gives me great satisfaction to state to you, that the large reduction of taxes which took place in the last and in the present year, with a view to the relief of the laboring classes of the community, has not been attended with a proportionate diminution of the public income. I trust that such additional means as may be required to supply a part of the deficiency occasioned by these reductions may be found, without any material abridgement of the comforts of my people.

"To assist the industry, to improve the resources, and to maintain the credit of the country on sound principles, and on a safe and lasting foundation, will be at all times the object of my solicitude, in the promotion of which I look with confidence to your zealous co-operation.

"It is with deep concern that I have to announce to you the continued progress of a formidable disease, to which my attention had been early directed, in the eastern parts of Europe. Information having been more recently received that it had extended its ravages to ports in the Baltic, whence there is a great commercial intercourse with my dominions, I have directed that all the precautions should be taken which experience has recommended as most effectual for guarding against the introduction of so dangerous a malady into this country

"Great distress has unhappily prevailed in some districts, and more particularly in a part of the western counties of Ireland, to relieve which, in the most pressing cases, I have not hesitated to authorise the application of such means as were immediately available for that purpose. But assistance of this nature is necessarily limited in its amount, and can only be temporary in its effect. The possibility, therefore, of introducing any measures which, by assisting the improvement of the natural resources of the country, may tend to prevent the recurrence of such evils, must be a subject of the most anxious interest to me, and to you of the most grave and cautious consideration.

"Local disturbances, unconnected with any political causes, have taken place both in this part of the United Kingdom and in Ireland. In the county of Clare, and in the adjoining parts of Roscommon and Galway, a system of violence and outrage had for some time been carried on to an alarming extent, for the repression of which the constitutional authority of the law has been vigorously and successfully exerted. By these means, the necessity of enacting new laws to strengthen the executive government with further powers, will, I trust, be prevented.

"To avert such a necessity has been, and ever will be, my most earnest desire; but if it should unfortunately arise, I do not doubt your firm resolution to maintain the peace and order of society, by the adoption of such measures as may be required for their more effectual protection."

Addresses to the king were moved in the two houses, as usual, and carried. In the house of lords on the 24th, the lord chancellor announced the presentation of the address from that body, and the king's answer as follows: "I thank you for your loyal and dutiful address. I receive with pleasure the assurance that you will proceed to the early consideration of the matters which I have recommended to your attention, and I rely with confidence on your zealous support of my endeavors to maintain peace and promote the prosperity of my dominions."

In the house of commons on the 24th June, lord John Russell moved the reform bill, and made a speech of considerable length, in which he gave an exposition of the views of the government in relation to the subject.

After he had concluded his speech, the second reading of the bill, at the instance of sir Robert Peel, was made the order of the day for Monday week. There was no opposition to the details of the bill on its first reading, the opposition having determined to reserve their resistance to the second. Its passage through the house of commons will be effected, it is thought, by an overwhelming majority, and should it be defeated in the house of lords, it is presumed that the king will raise a sufficient number of the more wealthy and influential commoners to the benches of that body, to counteract the majority which may exist there, and thus secure the passage of the bill.

In the house of lords, the debates opened in an angry mood. The earl of Winchelsea formally notified earl Grey, that he could no longer adhere to his administration. The reform question was incidentally introduced, and it is supposed that the indications are against the passage of the reform bill. The address to the king was moved in the house of lords by the duke of Norfolk,* a Catholic Peer, who has taken his seat since the emancipation bill. This is his first parliamentary effort. In the house of commons, Mr. Pelham moved the address.

In answer to a question put to him, earl Grey remarked that the measures pursued by France towards Portugal, were such as England, under similar circumstances, would have adopted. The duke of Wellington strongly recommended that all possible friendship should be maintained between England and France.

* The duke of Norfolk is the first peer of England, and hereditary earl marshal—but excluded from a seat in the house of peers until the passage of the late emancipation bill—the dukes of Norfolk being Roman Catholics, from 1483 to the present day.

Mr. Washington Irving, charge d'affaires of the United States, was introduced to the king, at a levee on the 22d June.

A notice from the navy office, has appeared at Lloyd's, of 2,000 tons of good coppered shipping being wanted, to be employed as regular transports. The object for which these vessels are wanted is not known, though supposed to be used to prevent the introduction of the cholera.

FRANCE.

Paris has been restored to quiet, and all parties disavow any connexion with the late mobs. The elections are not expected to create riots, as there are but about 12,000 electors. The Journal des Debats announces as certain, the triumph of the constitutional monarchy party. Louis Bonaparte, son of the ex-king of Holland, had addressed a letter to the editor of the Times, complaining that political motives should have been ascribed to his visit to his mother in London, and affirming that if he had not been afraid that his name would have alarmed a too timid diplomacy, while his sympathy would have been attributed to personal ambition, he should have joined the ranks of freedom in Belgium or Poland. The fleet of Toulon was proceeding to Portugal. Twelve thousand francs had been subscribed at Paris for the relief of the Irish—two-thirds by English and one-third by French residents.

POLAND.

Count Deibitsch, the commander in chief of the Russian army died at Kleezewo, near Pultusk, the Russian head-quarters, on the morning of Friday the 10th of June, at one o'clock. He was well and in fine spirits the day before. By one account his malady is said to have been the cholera morbus, and by another apoplexy—or, "hard drinking." His death has placed the command of the army temporarily in the hands of count Toll, who will maintain it until relieved by general Paskewitch, who is said to have been appointed the successor of Deibitsch previous to his death. One of the Paris journals ascribes the death of general Deibitsch, to the chagrin caused by his dismissal from command; but the Russian accounts are silent as to his being superceded.

The Russian forces in Poland are much divided. The news from Podolia is every day more cheering. The insurgents have taken possession of Satanow and made prisoners of the whole garrison, with the exception of one officer who escaped. They had taken several pieces of cannon, and were at leat 30,000 strong. A party of them in their impetuosity in pursuit of the Russians, had entered the frontier of Galicia, and were attacked and defeated by the Prussians. The conduct of the Prussian government is considered culpably partial to the Russians, affording them every facility and throwing every obstacle in the way of the Poles.

Letters from Lithuania state that general Chlapowski, aided by the insurgents, had taken the town of Stonim, and that the grand duke Constantine had gone to Minsk.

The emperor of Russia had ordered his own private physician to Warsaw, to give the benefit of his intimate knowledge of the nature and cure of the plague to the Poles.

The national guards of Warsaw have given a grand entertainment to the Polish soldiers.

An arrival at New York brings intelligence from Europe three days later than that previously received, being from Liverpool to the 1st July.

ENGLAND.

The English papers are silent as to the reform battle then about to be fought in parliament.

William Roscoe, the eminent historian and scholar, died at Liverpool on the 30th June.

There are five bills introduced into parliament to regulate church livings, compositions of tithes, restraining the holding of plurality of benefices, &c.—none, however, seem to promise solid reformation, in the relief of burthens

FRANCE.

It is supposed that the French elections will go against the ministers, and that they will have to give way to the liberal party, or retire. The king was well received every where, and was expected back to Paris on the 23rd

July. Paris was considered to be still in a feverish state.

BELGIUM.

Prince Leopold has accepted the throne of Belgium, on conditions which it is supposed will prove satisfactory. The Belgian congress were busily engaged in arranging the budgets of the respective departments of government. The works for the projected attack of Antwerp had been suspended.

POLAND AND RUSSIA.

General Toll was still in command of the Russian army in Poland, general Paskewitch, the successor of general Deibitsch, being ill at St. Petersburgh. The official account of the Russian commander in chief of the battle of Ostrolenka, set down his losses at about 3,000. These were computed by the Poles, it will be recollected, at 20,000. The reported victories of general Geilgud over general Sacken are confirmed.

The districts of Hungary are taking an active interest in the affairs of the Poles, which it is supposed will have a good effect. The Polish corps of gen. Dwernecki which surrendered to the Austrians have suffered greatly, having marched for several days and nights with little or no food. Their necessities have been relieved by the emperor of Austria, but he directed their officers to be separated from them. This separation was painfully affecting.

PORTUGAL.

The arrival of Don Pedro in London has produced a wonderful effect in Lisbon. He was well received by the king of England, and is said to be making arrangements to assert the rights of his daughter to the throne of Portugal. He is said to have half a million of money, besides various other available means which he is ready to appropriate to the above object.

The cholera morbus has again appeared at Ritinsk and in the government of Mahilew. It had not reached Hamburgh and Lubeck as had been stated; those places were healthy—it had broken out in Archangel—2,341 persons had been attacked with it at Riga, of whom 1,202 had died.

BRIEF NOTICES.

Intemperance. The clerk of Rensselaer county, New York, states—that of 705 paupers thrown on the county during the year and costing $7,871 38—the large amount of $7,084 25 was expended on persons reduced to pauperism by intemperate habits—leaving only $787 13 for the halt, the lame and the blind, the aged and the infirm!

British East India company. It appears from statements recently submitted to the British parliament, that the commercial profits of the East India company, or the nett return yielded by their commercial capital, from 1814-15 to 1828-9 inclusive, was £20,126,001. Greatest profits in any one year during this period, £2,157,203, viz: in 1824-5. Least profits £810,385, viz: in 1828-9. Tea duty collected by the company and paid over to the government in the fourteen years mentioned, £53,574,416.

Revenue from idolatry. There are many temples in India from which the East India company receive tribute, of which the principal are Gya, Allahabad, and Tripetty. The total amount of revenue received from all these sources is unknown; but that supplied from the following four temples amounts to a prodigious sum. Mr. Poynder estimates it as follows:

	£.	s.	d.
Clear profit for the seventeen years ending in 1829, exclusively for Juggernaut	99,205	15	0
Clear profit for the sixteen years ending in 1829, inclusively, for Gya	455,980	15	0
Clear profit for the sixteen years ending in 1829, inclusively, for Allahabad	159,429	7	6
Clear profit for the seventeen years ending in 1829, inclusively, for Tripetty	205,799	18	6
Total tribute received from idolatrous worshippers for seventeen years	£920,215	15	0

Lawson's history of North Carolina. In announcing the burning of our capitol and the loss of the state library, the fact was incidentally mentioned by us, that Lawson's history had shared the common ruin. The circumstance having come to the knowledge of Mr. Madison, that distinguished citizen has sent to gov. Stokes a copy of this rare work, which he had in his private library, with a request that it may supply the place of the one destroyed. [Raleigh Register.

Bunker Hill monument. A few members of this association convened on the 17th June, and elected 12 directors, all anti-masons. The board not being filled, a further election took place on Monday last, which resulted in the choice of 18 anti-anti-masons!

The Siamese youths, being on a gunning excursion at Lynnfield, Mass. were much pressed on by the neighboring inhabitants; and after some "sparring" one of them struck a certain colonel, who returned the compliment by severely wounding one of them with a stone, on which they wheeled and fired a platoon at him—their guns, however, were then charged only with powder. They much alarmed the colonel and the rest of the lookers-on; and they afterwards charged with ball. They were arrested and bound over, &c.

The United States frigate Hudson, capt. Cassin, arrived at N. York last week from Rio Janeiro—all well.

"POLITICS OF THE DAY."

TO THE EDITORS.

Messrs Gales and Seaton—I perceive in the publication made by me, of certain conversations with col. Johnson, there is an error in the date. The conversation referred to, took place in January, 1830, not in 1831. This error, I have no doubt, was made in copying the paper, as I found a similar one in another copy, which I retained. I would thank you to notice this matter in your paper, that it may be correctly understood. Your's, &c respectfully, S. D. INGHAM.

New Hope, 27th July, 1831.

From the Washington Telegraph of Aug. 5.

GOV. BRANCH.—The following letter from governor Branch to the editor, confirms what has before been said by Mr. Berrien and Mr. Ingham.

Anfield, Aug. 1st, 1831.

SIR: I have observed in the Globe, which came to hand by the last mail, the following paragraph in Mr. Blair's letter of the 21st of July to judge Berrien: "When the statement which I made, predicated upon col. Johnson's letter, was impeached in your second note, I made the application to the president which you seem to think I ought now to make. He immediately put into my hands the original memorandum which he wrote, and which he read to Messrs. Branch, Ingham, and yourself, &c."

I cannot believe that gen. Jackson has authorised any person to say that he ever read, or made known to me, the paper or memorandum mentioned. If he has, then we are at issue. No paper of the kind was ever read, or made known to me, by gen. Jackson, to the best of my knowledge and belief. I have as yet prepared no narrative of the circumstances connected with the dismissal of Mr. Ingham, judge Berrien, and myself; and, in truth, where is the necessity now for me to do so?

The president in his letter to Mr. Ingham, judge Berrien and myself, says, that "the want of harmony in the cabinet," &c. was the cause of our dismissal; or, in other words, for his re-organization; and judge Berrien and Mr. Ingham, I know, have truly interpreted the meaning of this mystical expression—want of harmony.

I have too much respect for the intelligence of the American people to believe that they will be at any loss to arrive at an accurate conclusion from the facts already placed in their possession.

If, however, it becomes necessary hereafter for me to appear before the public, I trust that I shall unhesitatingly do so. Respectfully, yours, &c.

JOHN BRANCH.

To the editor of the U. S. Telegraph.

☞ The National Intelligencer, of yesterday, contains a letter of colonel Richard M. Johnson, in reply to Mr. Ingham's statement relative to the proposition alleged to have been made by the former gentleman, in behalf of general Jackson, to Messrs. Ingham, Branch and Berrien. Col. Johnson denies having called at the request of general Jackson, but admits that it was with his permission and approbation. He states that "the complaint made by general Jackson against this part of his cabinet [Messrs. Ingham, Branch and Berrien] was specific, that he had been informed, and was induced to believe, that they were using their influence to have major Eaton and his family excluded from all respectable circles, for the purpose of degrading him, and thus drive him from office, and that the attempt had been made even upon the foreign ministers, and in one case had the desired effect. He proposed no mode of accommodation, but declared expressly, that if such was the fact, he would dismiss them from office." He also states that the president then read to him a paper containing the principles upon which he meant to act. "To prevent a rupture," colonel Johnson says, he "requested the president to postpone calling upon those members of his cabinet till Saturday, to allow him an opportunity of two days to converse with them."

We shall give the whole letter in our next.

THE WARS OF EDITORS, &c.

From the U. S. Telegraph of Aug. 5.

Late "official."

"PISTOLS FOR TWO."

The Globe of this morning says:

"Col. Johnson will, we have no doubt, do himself justice. He is an honest, brave, true hearted, and persevering man, and he will prove to the American people that he is as prompt and capable in defending his own character, as he has shown himself to have been in defending his country. By making him a witness in the attempt to disparage the president, and then seeking to impeach his credibility, he is called on to vindicate a character in which his countrymen take deep interest. His kind offices towards Mr. Berrien and his colleagues in this business, have been very ungratefully requited. Their attempt to sacrifice him, we trust, will meet a more appropriate retribution.

"Until col. Johnson is heard upon this subject, we shall confine our remarks to the collateral points presented in the publication of the ex-secretaries."

And is it possible that gen. Jackson, who struck the name of the midshipmen from the roll, thus calls upon col. Johnson to fight down all contradiction!! Is the Globe authorised to make this call on col. Johnson? Who does not read in this appeal to arms the condemnation, the self-condemnation, of the "malign influence?" Who does not see in it the clearest proof of the truth of those statements which the Globe was authorised to deny?

From the Globe.

Official.

In certain remarks on Mr. Ingham's last letter, the Globe said—

"We most solemnly and upon honor assure Mr. Ingham that the president of the United States was not consulted, nor had he the slightest agency in the production of the paragraph which has called forth from him seven solid columns of animadversion. We, moreover, assure him, that the president never read it, heard it read, nor heard of it, until it appeared in the newspaper, and as he was deeply engaged in public business when the paragraph was published, we doubt exceedingly whether it even caught his attention after it was published. We must, therefore, take upon ourselves the whole responsibility of this unlucky article, and do hereby assert our claim to Mr. Ingham's letter which he has misdirected to the president, with the exception of so much thereof as properly appertains to the negotiation with regard to the trial of the assassins; a subject which must be settled by Mr. Trist and himself."

From the Telegraph—in reply.

When it is recollected that the Globe was established by the special patronage of the administration; that it professes to be its chosen organ, that it boasts that it speaks by authority of the president; and that the article of the 11th of July, gives a private letter written by the president to Mr. Ingham, which could have been obtained only from the president himself, it requires all the reckless boldness of the organ to assert, that "the president never read it, nor heard of it, until it appeared in the newspaper." And it requires no less than such a witness to assert a belief that "it has not even caught his attention after it was published."

The blundering of the Globe has already involved the president in inextricable difficulties. If the statement of the Globe now made be true, if the president had no hand or lot in the publication referred to, what are we to think of a chief magistrate who permits such fellows as Blair and Kendall to make such use of his name and private letters? If it be false, who does not pity the condition of the chief magistrate, who, two years ago, was the most popular man in the union, and is now reduced to such an alternative?

Will the Globe please to inform us upon what authority it presumes to be the official organ of the executive. If it be true that it is authorised to speak in the name of the president, and that to give the force of his name to its articles, it uses his private papers, without so much as consulting him, it establishes the fact, that the president is in the leading strings of those who manage the Globe, and that they have so little respect for him and his opinions, that they do not even think it worth while to ask his consent to use his name in a controversy, in which he is personally concerned, and involving the motives of one for the most decided and marked acts of his life!!! To such deplorable and disreputable shifts, has the "malign influence" reduced the hero of New Orleans!!! What true friend of his does not weep over the wreck of such a popularity? Who that loves his country, does not exclaim: "O tempora, O mores!!!"

From the New York Courier and Enquirer.

One of the New York officials.

As the chevalier Huygens—the representative of the king of Holland, was the only married minister at Washington, Madame Huygens is the lady alluded to, and there can be no impropriety in mentioning her name. She is now in this city. Madame Huygens says, she is not conscious that any thing occurred at which she ought to have taken offence; and is very certain that she neither "thought herself aggrieved," or, by her conduct, authorised such an inference; and so far from gen. Jackson's having understood or believed, that on the occasion alluded to, the Dutch minister or his lady, insulted Mrs. Eaton—It so happened that the chevalier became indisposed in consequence of exposure on that evening, and, two days afterwards, was called upon by gen. Jackson in person, who made many kind enquiries after his health, and spent some time with madame Huygens in friendly conversation. Both the chevalier and madame Huygens, are held in high estimation by the president, and they have ever expressed a warm personal friendship for Mr. Van Buren.

From the Telegraph—in reply.

"This [preceding] article is copied into the Globe, accompanied by a statement of the editor, affirming its truth. It purports to be on the authority of Mrs. Huygens. It is impossible that that lady can have made any such statement. The fact that the Russian minister did give the party; the fact that it was understood to be for the special purpose of bringing Mrs. Eaton forward; the fact that baron Krudener did pay the first honors of his table to Mrs. Eaton; the fact that it was so arranged that major Eaton offered to attend Mrs. Huygens to the table, and that she for a long time refused to permit him to do so; the fact that when she entered the room she refused to take a seat at the table; the fact that she called for her husband, and immediately left the room accompanied by him; the fact that she considered the treatment which she received on that occasion as highly improper; are all well known, and can be established in the city. To suppose that the baron and his lady can have authorised the statement made in the Enquirer, is to suppose them capable of doing that of which we believe them to be incapable. The statement that the president waited upon Mrs. Huygens, is we believe untrue.

"The Globe labors to prove that Mr. Ingham's statement is false, because the lady and her husband have visited the president. The answer to this is, that they had no right to consider the president as a party to the insult offered to Mrs. H., nor does it now appear that he was. It does appear that he disapproved of the refusal of Mrs. H. to recognize the lady of the secretary of war; but this is no cause why the baron should refuse to recognize the president of the United States. The argument, therefore, that Mr. Ingham's statement is contradicted by the fact that the baron visits the president, fails of its object. But there is one fact which speaks for itself: when the baron and his amiable family resided in this city, their hospitable mansion was the centre of attraction for the beauty and fashion of the metropolis. Where are they now? They have left us."

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

There is little doubt, says the Detroit Courier, that major Eaton will succeed gen. Cass, as governor of Michigan.

Gen. Cass partook of a public dinner at Detroit on the 26th ult. given by the people in testimony of their high respect and esteem for him. On being toasted, he delivered a very neat and appropriate address.

Mr. McLane was invited to a public dinner at New York, but declined the compliment.

Mr. Wheeler, postmaster at Providence, has been removed, and col. Mallett appointed in his stead. The colonel is son-in-law of Mr. Fenner, whom the people of Rhode Island lately removed from the office of governor.

In that spirit of impartiality, and fearlessness in appealing to the reason of the people, by which we desire to mark our editorial course—but of which we cannot find one imitator among all our opponents—we have laid-off the speech of the governor of South Carolina, at the meeting of "Free trade and State Rights" folks, at Charleston, on the 4th of July. To such men as James Madison, William H. Crawford and Daniel Webster—with the present rival candidates for the presidency, Andrew Jackson and Henry Clay, we leave the "nullificatory" part of this speech—but some of the strange doctrines and round assertions that it contains, about the "tariff" or "free trade," we feel able to expose, and may do so at a season of leisure. There is a wildness in some of the sentences that surprizes us, much as we have been accustomed to the flights of the ardent author of them.

The United States Gazette of the 3rd inst. contains "Letter I." to the public, from Stephen Simpson, one of the signers of the famous protocol, and well known a few years ago for his virulent hostility to president Adams, and as ardent support of general Jackson. The most remarkable passage of this epistle is the following:

"His" [Mr. Van Buren's] "insincerity of friendship towards gen. Jackson, had been made manifest, by the long interval during which he kept open the avenue of approach between himself and Mr. Adams; had that great and [permit me to add as an act of justice and atonement], injured statesman, deemed him of sufficient importance, to court, conciliate, or win him over. But Mr. Adams disdained to surround himself by purchased enemies, to promote his re-election, by imposing the letters of great patronage upon the antagonist leaders—choosing to fall as he rose, by the weight of his integrity; and Mr. Van Buren was left to make such contract and bargain with general Jackson, as circumstances might warrant or major Eaton suggest."

Other letters of Mr. Simpson's series have appeared. They have extraordinary point and severity. He has lashed our friend Mr. Ritchie with a "whip of scorpions."

We see some objection, because that gov. Cass, the lately appointed secretary of war, is designated as from Ohio—seeing that he has not resided in that state for 17 or 18 years—but this valued gentleman being all that time in the service of the United States, would not lose his residence—the construction of the legislature of New Jersey, in the case of Mr. Southard, to the contrary notwithstanding!

The Camden (S. C.) Journal says, "if Mr. Calhoun disavows the nullification doctrine, he loses a party in South Carolina—Let him avow it, and he loses the people of twenty-three states, and three-fourths of those of South Carolina."

Mr. A. H. PoweH—a friend of Mr. Clay, elected a member of the house of delegates by the people of Frederick county, Virginia, after a severe contest—died suddenly, of apoplexy, while doing business in the court-house.

The idea is freely given out in some of the late very decided administration papers of Pennsylvania—that president Jackson, notwithstanding all that has been said and done, will not be a candidate for re-election. The following toasts, drank at a "Jackson" party on the 4th of July, at Doylestown, are direct to this point—and many of like tendency have been uttered at other places:

By C. Ely. The democratic party of Pennsylvania—They elevated gen. Jackson to the presidency. The day has arrived when the best return he can make, will be to retire from it.

By J. R. Thatcher. Gen. Andrew Jackson—As he can no longer unite the people who elected him, the principles he has always avowed will oblige him to retire from the next presidential canvass.

"National republican" meetings are being called in many of the counties of Pennsylvania, to appoint delegates to the general convention to be held in Baltimore in December next. The calls for some of the meetings are signed by very numerous persons. Some of them are headed "our country," but most of them "Not the glory of Cæsar, but the welfare of Rome."

The following sentences from Mr. Ingham's late letter are very direct:

"I have but touched the corrupting cause of all the diseases of your administration. Nourished by a deplorable infatuation, its operations have been most extensive and injurious. Had I consented to bring my family within the sphere of its influence, I should have been among the chiefest of your favorites; but I would not thus consent to expose them, and therefore have, as it appears, experienced the efforts of your secret and abiding hostility."

The Georgia Courier says—"The tariff will be made the pretext in the south for deserting the president. He is for the protective policy, and will not split hairs with the ultra patriots in fixing the precise point where that ends and the revenue system begins. He is not afraid to pursue a policy sanctioned by a long course of legislation under the constitution, and recommending itself to his good sense by the daily benefits of its operation."

The following is extracted from a late article in the Richmond Enquirer, in which the people were urged to put aside Mr. Boulden and elect Mr. Randolph, before it was known the latter had declined. It looks very like Mr. Ritchie's own make—though called a communication, and is worth preserving:

"Will you at this most critical period of our history, when doctrines are afloat destructive of your rights, and the sovereignty of the states—when parties are breaking up, and combinations forming—when Mr. Adams is elected to the house of representatives, and Mr. Clay, in all probability, will meet with him there—when Virginia wants her practised statesmen—her master workmen—her men who can speak to the nation and be heard. Will you, I say, at this time elect John Randolph of Roanoke or Thomas Tyler Bouldin, esq.? This is the question and the only question—work it as you will."

From the New York Standard of August 6. Mr. Ingham says he did not intend to be exposed to major Eaton's pistols and stiletto without defence; so, according to one of his statements, he went about armed, and yet we are informed, that when he sneaked away from Washington, he left his house by the back door. He left the treasury by a similar vomitory. He hates "red ink," and therefore is killing himself by too free a use of black.

PROCEEDINGS IN MICHIGAN.

A few days since it was officially announced in the "Globe" that Stephens Thompson Mason had been appointed by the president to be secretary of the territory of Michigan, in the place of John T. Mason, (his father), who had resigned. Mr. Mason, the father, is brother-in-law of Mr. postmaster-general Barry—and the lad, Mason, of course, the nephew of Mr. B. and being so appointed and having qualified, he is now really the governor of Michigan, being ex-officio such in the absence of the governor—Gen. Cass having resigned and now being at Washington, and the place which he held not yet filled, or at least occupied, in consequence of a new appointment. The "Detroit Courier" seems positively to understand that maj. Eaton will be the new governor.

In consequence of this appointment certain proceedings took place at Detroit, which, because of their extraordinary character, we shall record at full length. It is hard to believe, however, that the age of the boy was known to the president—but the youth and his uncle were at Washington when the matter was arranged. It is said that another office was provided for Mason, the father—but it has not been announced.

PUBLIC SENTIMENT,

In relation to the appointment of S. T. Mason.

At a general meeting of the citizens of the city of Detroit, held at the city council room, on Saturday evening, the 23d day of July, in consequence of the recently announced appointment by the president of the United States, of "Stevens Thompson Mason, of Kentucky, to be secretary of the territory of Michigan;" an individual represented to be a minor, and otherwise ineligible to that office—col. David C. McKinstry was appointed chairman and Alexander D. Frazer, secretary.

The object of the meeting having been stated, and several citizens having expressed their views on the subject, and the alleged appointment appearing to the meeting to be in every point of view, so injudicious and objectionable as to make it improbable, if not impossible, that such should have been made, it was deemed advisable to be possessed of more certain information in regard to it, and the circumstances under which it was made, before the expression of any opinion on the subject; wherefore it was Resolved unanimously, That a committee of five, to consist of the chairman, col. Andrew Mack, Shubael Conant, Oliver Newberry, esq. and col. John E. Schwarz, be appointed to enquire into and report to this meeting all the facts and circumstances connected with said alleged appointment.

Whereupon the meeting adjourned.

D. C. McKINSTRY, chairman.

A. D. Frazer, secretary.

At an adjourned meeting of the citizens of the city of Detroit, held on Monday evening, the 25th of July, at the city council room—col. McKinstry in the chair, and A. D. Frazer, secretary.

The committee heretofore appointed to make enquiry into and report to this meeting all the facts and circumstances connected with the alleged appointment of Stevens Thompson Mason as secretary of the territory, made their report, which was received by the meeting.

REPORT.

The committee appointed at the meeting of the citizens on Saturday evening, to make inquiry relative to the appointment of Stevens Thompson Mason, to the office of secretary of the territory, beg leave to report that they called on him this morning, and were informed by him, that he had received that appointment from the president and had just qualified, and that the president in making the appointment was well acquainted with the circumstance of his being under the age of twenty-one, all of which he frankly ackowledged.

D. C. McKINSTRY,
OLIVER NEWBERRY,
SHUBAEL CONANT,
J. E SCHWARZ.

And upon discussion of the matter it was Unanimously resolved, That a committee of five, to consist of E. P. Hastings, H. S. Cole, David C. McKinstry, Oliver Newberry and A. D. Frazer, esquires, be appointed to draw up a memorial to the president of the United States on the subject of said appointment, together with such resolutions as may be deemed expedient, to be reported at an adjourned meeting to morrow, at 2 o'clock, P. M.

After which, the meeting adjourned.

D. C. McKINSTRY, chairman.

A. D. Frazer, sec'ry.

At an adjourned meeting of the citizens of the city of Detroit, held at the council room on the 26th day of July inst.

Col. McKinstry in the chair, A. D. Frazer, secretary. The committee appointed last evening to draft a memorial and resolutions relative to the appointment of S. T. Mason, a minor, as secretary of the territory, made their report, and submitted to the meeting a memorial and resolutions, which having been read, the meeting passed unanimously the following resolution.

Resolved, That the recent exercise of the appointing power, by the president of the United States, by which the second office in this territory, an office of great responsibility and trust, has been conferred on Stevens Thompson Mason, a minor, is in the opinion of this meeting, a violation of the principles of our fundamental law and of the genius and spirit of the constitution; and is in the highest degree derogatory to the freemen over whom he is thus attempted to be placed; and that we hold it to be our duty to take prompt measures, with a view to his removal from that office.

MEMORIAL.

To the president of the United States.

Your memorialists, citizens of Detroit, in the territory of Michigan, respectfully represent:

That they have learned with astonishment and indignation, they find it difficult to repress, that Stevens Thompson Mason has been appointed by the president, to be secretary of Michigan territory, and has been sworn into that office.

The person thus appointed to an office of dignity and trust, your memorialists have known but a short time. To a large majority of them, although residents in the same city, he is personally an entire stranger. They know only that he is yet a minor, with character and rules of action unformed and with all the associations and habits common to his age. Of his capacity, they have no means of judging; of the estimate which his father, the late secretary, to whom he must be well known, has formed of his ability, they have very conclusive evidence in the fact, that another young man has been employed as the principal clerk in the office, while the son has only held the subordinate one of an associate.

Your memorialists would respectfully, but earnestly and firmly remonstrate against the committal to the discretion of one so young, uninformed, and inexperienced, of the vast powers, which the ordinance and the several acts of congress provide, shall be exercised by the secretary, in a contingency, which has hitherto often happened, and is likely frequently to occur hereafter.

They would request of you the perusal of the several provisions in those instruments.

The third clause of the ordinance of 1787, provides, "that there shall be appointed from time to time by congress, a secretary, whose commission shall continue in force for four years, unless sooner revoked; he shall reside in the district, and have a freehold estate therein, in 500 acres of land, while in the exercise of his office. It shall be his duty to keep and preserve the acts and laws passed by the legislature, and the public records of the district, and the proceedings of the governor in his executive department; and transmit authentic copies of such acts and proceedings every six months to congress." It further provides, "that the governor for the time being, shall be commander in chief of the militia, appoint and commission all officers in the offices in the same, below the rank of general officers."

The second section of the act of congress of 1789, provides "that in case of the death, removal, resignation, or necessary absence of the governor of the said territory, the secretary thereof shall be, and he is hereby authorised and required to execute all the powers and perform all the duties of the governor, during the vacancy occasioned by the removal, resignation, or necessary absence of the said governor."

The third section of the act of congress of 1792 provides, "that the official duties of the secretary of said territory shall be under the control of such laws as are or may be in force in said territory."

The third section of the act of congress of 1805, by which Michigan was set apart, provides, "that the emoluments of the superintendent of Indian affairs shall be united with those of governor."

The fifth section of the act of congress of 1823, provides, "that the governor of the said territory, shall have power to grant pardons for offences against the laws of the said territory, and reprieves for those against the United States, until the decision of the president thereon shall be known."

Your memorialists would emphatically ask, whether it was ever contemplated by the grave law-givers of this union, that powers so various—so momentous—so fraught, in their exercise, with consequences of "weal or woe" to the dearest rights of the people of Michigan, should be for a moment entrusted to one—whom the law does not invest with the right of suffrage, who has not yet attained the age, at which he would be eligible by the act of congress to any office whatever, under the territorial laws; to one, whose minority itself is an apparent, palpable disqualification from holding a freehold estate of a solitary acre of land, unless it be conveyed in trust and for specific purposes? whether one, whom his father has heretofore employed only as an assistant clerk, shall be presumed to possess such precocity of talent, weight of character, and strength of judgment, as to entitle him to this high distinction?

Shall it be expected of independent freemen, of mature age and understanding—having valuable interests—property, reputation, character—every thing at stake, that they should tamely submit to an act which places all they hold dear, at the hazard of a discretion to be exercised by a mere youth under twenty years of age—a lad not out of his teens? Can such an individual be supposed to be sufficiently acquainted with the diversities of human character, to exercise wisely the right of making important civil and military appointments;—of deciding correctly on the multifarious and difficult questions daily growing out of the complicated relations with the Indian tribes;—of exercising discreetly, the important power of pardoning offenders? Can such an one be deemed sufficiently capable of gravely conferring with the legislative department in regard to the propriety and expediency of such enactments as the varied rights and interests of forty thousand freemen from time to time require, or even of construing accurately, the laws proper for the regulation of his limited and more peculiar duties as secretary—Above all, of exercising justly the highly responsible and delicate duty of placing the executive veto upon the legislative acts of the councils of Michigan?

Your memorialists speak plainly, for the subject requires it, and their privileges as freemen justify it, decidedly, as becomes men who feel themselves aggrieved—humiliated—outraged by the appointment of a youth to an office of high honor and responsibility.

Your memorialists trust that the facts which they submit will be carefully considered, and then they cannot permit themselves to doubt that an appointment which in our judgment, is opposed to the theory of republicanism, and the principles of the constitution—will be revoked.

Detroit, July 26, 1831.

Resolved, That the memorial reported by the committee and just read, be adopted by this meeting and that it be signed by the citizens generally and be by the committee transmitted to the secretary of state of the United States, with a request to present the same to the president of the United States, together with a copy of these resolutions.

Resolved, That it be recommended to our fellow citizens generally, throughout the territory to co-operate with us in these measures.

Resolved, That said memorial and the proceedings of this, and the several meetings heretofore held on the subject be published in all the newspapers of this territory.

And then the meeting adjourned.

D. C. McKINSTRY, chairman.

A. D. Frazer, secretary.

Note—Since the adoption of the above memorial, we have been assured that there has been an accuracy in the statement that general Mason had employed in his office a chief clerk, to whom his son was subordinate. We are assured that the young gentleman alluded to was and is the clerk of gov. Cass, and paid by him—that young Mr. Mason is the only clerk ever employed by his father in the office. [Ed. Jour.

NORTH WESTERN INDIANS.

The "Vandalia Intelligencer" contains the articles given below, and passes a high compliment on gen. Gaines for his moderate and prudent conduct, by which the difficulties with the Indians were removed without bloodshed.

Head quarters, western department,
Rock Island, July 1st, 1821.

The prompt and efficient movement of the Illinois volunteers, under general Duncan combined with the artillery under captain Legate, and the companies of the 3rd and 6th infantry, under major Bliss, and captain Brown, having contributed to induce the British band of Sac Indians, with their old allies, the Winnebago, Pottawattamie, and Kickapoo nations to abandon their position, and sue for peace; peace is accordingly granted them, upon conditions which are deemed sufficient to afford permanent security to the frontier inhabitants; to render this hostile band of Sac Indians submissive, and obedient to the friendly Sac chiefs; to confine the offenders within the limits of their own nation, west of the Mississippi; and finally to cut off all intercourse between them and their old allies, of Upper Canada, from whom they have long received the annual reward of their former treachery, and continued hostility towards the United States.

These essential objects being accomplished, the troops will as soon as practicable, return to their respective positions, with the exception of one company of the 1st infantry, which will remain at fort Armstrong until further orders.

The Illinois volunteers will be inspected and mustered forthwith, by major Bliss, and they will be disbanded by their immediate commanding officers, at the time of their return to their first place of rendezvous.

The prompt and effective measures of his excellency governor Reynolds, and of general Duncan, to assemble the volunteers, and their energetic movement with their troops, to the exposed border of the state, cannot be too highly appreciated. The commanding general tenders his thanks to them, and to each individual volunteer, officers and men, and offers his best wishes for their health, and speedy return to their families.

By order of maj. gen. Gaines,
GEO. A. McCALL, aid de camp, and adj't. gen.

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT AND CAPITULATION,

Made and concluded this thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-one, between E. P. Gaines, major general of the U. S. army, on the part of the United States, John Reynolds, governor of Illinois, on the part of the state of Illinois, and the chiefs and braves of the band of Sac Indians, usually called the British band of Rock river, with their old allies of the Pottawattamie, Winnebago, and Kickapoo nations.

Witnesseth that, whereas, The said British band of Sac Indians have, in violation of the several treaties entered into between the United States and the Sac and Fox nations, in the years 1804, 1816, and 1825, continued to remain upon, and to cultivate the lands on Rock river, ceded to the United States by the said treaties, after the said lands had been sold by the United States to individual citizens of Illinois and other states: And whereas, the said British band of Sac Indians, in order to sustain their pretensions to continue upon the said Rock river lands, have assumed the attitude of actual hostility toward the United States, and have had the audacity to drive citizens of the state of Illinois from their homes, destroy their corn, and invite many of their old friends of the Pottawattamie, Winnebago, and Kickapoos to unite with them (the said British band of Sacs) in war, to prevent their removal from said lands: And whereas, many of the most disorderly of their several tribes of Indians, did actually join the said British band of Sac Indians prepared for war against the United States, and more particularly against the state of Illinois; from which purpose they confess that nothing could have restrained them but the appearance of force far exceeding the combined strength of the said British band of Sac Indians, with such of their aforesaid allies as had actually joined them; but being now convinced that such a war would tend speedily to annihilate them, they have voluntarily abandoned their hostile attitude and sued for peace.

Peace is therefore granted them upon the following condition to which the said British band of Sac Indians, with their aforesaid allies agree; and for the faithful execution of which the undersigned chiefs and braves of the said band and their allies mutually bind themselves, their heirs and assigns forever:

2. The British band of Sac Indians are required peaceably to submit to the authority of the friendly chiefs and braves of the united Sac and Fox nations, and at all times hereafter to reside and hunt with them upon their own lands west of the Mississippi river, and be obedient to their laws and treaties, and no one or more of the said band shall ever be permitted to recross said river to the place of their usual residence, nor to any part of their old hunting ground east of the Mississippi, without the express permission of the president of the United States, or the governor of the state of Illinois.

3. The United States will guarantee to the united Sack and Fox nations, including the said British band of Sac Indians, the integrity of all the lands claimed by them westward of the Mississippi river pursuant to the treaties of the years 1825 and 1830.

4. The United States require the united Sac and Fox nations, including the aforesaid British band to abandon all communication and cease to hold any intercourse with any British post, garrison, or town, and never again to admit among them any agent or trader who shall not have derived his authority to hold commercial or other intercourse with them from the president of the United States or his authorised agent.

5. The United States demand an acknowledgement of their right to establish military posts and roads within the limits of the said country guaranteed by the 3d article of this agreement and capitulation, for the protection of the frontier inhabitants.

6. It is further required by the United States, that the principal friendly chiefs and head men of the Sacs and Foxes bind themselves to enforce as far as may be in their power, the strict observance of each and every article of this agreement and capitulation, and at any time they may find themselves unable to restrain their allies the Pottawattamies, Kickapoos, or Winnebagoes, to give immediate information thereof to the nearest military post.

7. And it is finally agreed by the contracting parties, that henceforth permanent peace and friendship be established between the United States and the aforesaid band of Indians.

(Signed) EDMOND P. GAINES,
major general by brevet commanding.
(Signed) JOHN REYNOLDS,
governor of the state of Illinois.

The preceding is also signed by Pashepaho (stabbing chief) Weesheat (sturgeon-head), and other chiefs; and by Mucata Mubicatak, (Black Hawk) Kakekamah (All Fish) and others—in the usual form; and by many persons as witnesses.

MR. ADAMS' ORATION,

Pronounced at Quincy, Mass. July 4, 1831.

We have a copy of this oration. We cannot publish the whole, and it is difficult to make preferable extracts, the whole being so good—but we offer two, bearing upon the new doctrine of "nullification," as most apt to the present state of things. The oration closes with the latter.

"The separate states of the union, using a term which appears to have been judiciously avoided in the Declaration of Independence, declared themselves not only free and independent, but sovereign states;—and then their lawyers, adopting the doctrine of Blackstone, the oracle of English law, inferred that sovereign must necessarily be uncontrolable, unlimited, despotic power. Assuming, like the eminent commentator, that in all governments this power must exist somewhere, and that it is inherent in the very definition of sovereignty, with about as much plausibility as he deposits it in the British parliament, they made no hesitation to entrust it to the governments of the separate states."

"It were an abuse of your time and patience, fellow-citizens, to recall to your memory all the vagaries into which this political sophism of identity between sovereign and despotic power, has led, and continues to lead some of the statists of this our happy but disputatious union. It seizes upon the brain of a heated politician, sometimes in one state, sometimes in another, and its natural offspring is the doctrine of nullification;—that is, the sovereign power of any one state of the confederacy to nullify any act of the whole twenty-four states, which the sovereign state shall please to consider as unconstitutional; an error sustained by reasoners too respectable to be treated with derision, and, apart from that consideration, too absurd to be encountered with serious argument. Even under our present federal constitution, it has been directly asserted, or imprudently countenanced, at one time in Virginia and Kentucky, at another in Massachusetts and Connecticut, now in the temperate climate of Pennsylvania, and again in the warmer regions of the south. Fortunate has it been for our country, that the paroxysms of this fever have hitherto proved not extensively contagious! But we are admonished by one of the profoundest philosophers of modern ages, not to measure the danger of discontentments in the body politic by this—whether they be just or unjust; nor yet by this, whether the griefs whereupon they rise be great or small—neither to be secure, because they have often or long, without ensuing peril. Not every fume or vapor turns indeed to a storm, but from vapors and exhalations imperceptibly gathered, the tempest of desolation does come at last. * * * * * * *

"Fellow-citizens, I trespass upon the indulgence that I have invoked. Time fails me to pass in review the experiences of the other nations of the European continent, which, in the last half century, have been, and yet are, convulsed with the revolutionary spirit. In comparing their history during this period with our own, there is one point of difference between them, on which our attention cannot be too intensely riveted. Our Declaration of Independence, our confederation, the constitution of the United States, and all our state constitutions, without a single exception, have been voluntary compacts, deriving all their authority from the free consent of the parties to them. It may be doubted whether a single constitution has been formed in Europe or in Southern America, without some violence, some admixture of conflicting physical force in its confection. In the early and significant age of the ancient mythology, the god of boundaries was the only deity never to be propitiated by sacrifices of blood. He, too, was the only god who refused to yield his place even to Jupiter. Here is the landmark, bloodless and immovable, more unerring than the magnet from the pole, firm as the everlasting hills, between freedom and force. It is not in the proclamation of principles. Declarations of the rights of man, as full, as copious, as formal as our own, have decorated the constitutions of Europe. Those constitutions, after a short and fitful existence, have passed into the memory of things beyond the flood; leaving the principles behind—blood stained and defaced—monuments only of their own mutilation. We have proclaimed the principles, we have adhered to the practice; and our history has been a record of internal peace and general prosperity almost uninterrupted. Let the contemplation of the past, be the instructive lesson of the future. And in this connexion let us survey with calm, unblenching eye, the newly revived doctrine of nullification; a word which contains within itself an absurdity, importing a pretended right of one state in this union, by virtue of her sovereignty, to make that null and void, which it presupposes to be null and void before. The doctrine is not new, nor are those who now maintain it responsible for its introduction. It has been the vital disease of confederacies from the day when Philip of Macedon obtained a seat among the Amphyctions of Greece. It has never been, perhaps, involved in quite so much absurdity, as when appearing in its newest shape. It is now the claim for one state in this union, by virtue of her sovereignty, not only to make, but to unmake the laws of the twenty-four, each equally sovereign with herself. This claim in its extent is most emphatically illustrated by its application to a revenue law—The constitution of the United States declares that all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States. It forbids any preference to be given, by any regulation of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one state over those of another. The claim for the sovereign state is to nullify these provisions of the constitution, indissolubly connected with all the acts of congress for raising revenue. The constitution of the United States, in express terms, supersedes all state constitutions and laws conflicting with it. The sovereign state claims by her laws to supersede the constitution of the United States, and the laws of all the other states in the union. As a member of the union, this advances a claim of appeal from the whole to a twenty-fourth part. As a sovereign state, a claim to make laws, not only for herself but for others. Philosophically, politically, morally considered, it is an inversion of all human reasoning; it cannot be conceived without confusion of thought, it cannot be expressed without solecism of language, and terms of self contradiction.

Its most hideous aspect is, not that its practical operation must insue in a severance of the union, but that it substitutes physical force in the place of deliberate legislation. Stripped of the sophistical argumentation in which this doctrine has been habited, its naked nature is an effort to organize insurrection against the laws of the United States; to interpose the arm of state sovereignty between rebellion and the halter, and to rescue the traitor from the gibbet. The plan which it proposes, if pursued by merely individual association, would be levying war against the United States. It would not the less be levying war against the union, it conducted under the auspices of state sovereignty; but as a state cannot be punished for treason, nullification would case herself in the complete steel of sovereign power, as the heroes of ancient poetry were furnished with panoply from the armory of the gods

You have seen my fellow-citizens, from the Declaration of Independence, that the states of this confederation were the offspring of the union; that their sovereignty is not, and never was, a sovereignty as defined by Blackstone and the English lawyers, identical with unlimited power; that sovereignty, thus defined, is in direct contradiction to the Declaration of Independence, and incompatible with the nature of our institutions; that the states, united, and the states, separate, are both sovereign, but creatures of the people, and possess none but delegated power; that the power of nullifying an act of congress, never has been delegated to any one state, or to any partial combination of states, and that any and every attempt at such nullification, by one or more states, less than the number required, and otherwise than in the forms prescribed for amendment of the constitution, would, however colored, and, however varnished, be neither more nor less than treason, skulking under the shelter of despotism.

Nullification is the provocative to that brutal and foul contest of force, which has hitherto baffled all the efforts of the European and Southern American nations, to introduce among them constitutional governments of liberty and order. It strips us of that peculiar and unimitated characteristic of all our legislation—free debate. It makes the bayonet the arbiter of the law; it has no argument but the thunderbolt. It were senseless to imagine that twenty-three states of the union would suffer their laws to be trampled upon by the despotic mandate of one. The act of nullification would itself be null and void. Force must be called in to execute the law of the union. Force must be applied by the nullifying state to resist its execution—

"Ate, hot from hell,
"Cries havoc! and lets slip the dogs of war."

The blood of brethren is shed by each other. The citizen of the nullifying state is a traitor to his country, by obedience to the law of his state, a traitor to his state, by obedience to the law of his country. The scaffold and the battle-field stream alternately with the blood of their victims. Let this agent but once intrude upon your deliberations, and freedom will take her flight for heaven. The Declaration of Independence will become a philosophical dream, and uncontrolled, despotic sovereignties will trample with impunity, through a long career of after ages, in interminable or exterminating war with one another, upon the indefeasible and unalienable rights of man.

The event of a conflict in arms, between the union and one of its members, whether terminating in victory or defeat, would be but an alternative of calamity to all. In the holy records of antiquity, we have two examples of a confederation ruptured by the severance of its members, one of which resulted, after three desperate battles, in the extermination of the seceding tribe. And the victorious people, instead of exulting in shouts of triumph, 'came to the house of God, and abode there till even before God; and lifted up their voices, and wept sore, and said,—O Lord God of Israel, why is this come to pass in Israel, that there should be to-day one tribe lacking in Israel?' The other was a successful example of resistance against tyrannical taxation, and severed forever the confederacy, the fragments forming separate kingdoms; and from that day, their history presents an unbroken series of disastrous alliances, and exterminating wars—of assassinations, conspiracies, revolts, and rebellions, until both parts of the confederacy sunk into tributary servitude to the nations around them; till the countrymen of David and Solomon hung their harps upon the willows of Babylon, and were totally lost amidst the multitudes of the Chaldean and Assyrian monarchies, "the most despised portion of their slaves."

In these mournful memorials of their fate, we may behold the sure, too sure prognostication of our own, from the hour when force shall be substituted for deliberation in the settlement of our constitutional questions. This is the deplorable alternative—the extirpation of the seceding member, or the never-ceasing struggle of two rival confederacies, ultimately bending the neck of both under the yoke of foreign domination, or the despotic sovereignty of a conqueror at home. May heaven avert the omen! The destinies, not only of our posterity, but of the human race, are at stake.

Let no such melancholy forebodings intrude upon the festivities of this anniversary. Serene skies and balmy breezes are not congenial to the climate of freedom. Progressive improvement in the condition of man, is apparently the purpose of a superintending Providence. That purpose will not be disappointed. In no delusion of national vanity, but with a feeling of profound gratitude to the God of our fathers, let us indulge the cheering hope and belief, that our country and her people have been selected as instruments for preparing and maturing much of the good yet in reserve for the welfare and happiness of the human race. Much good has already been effected by the solemn proclamation of our principles—much more by the illustration of our example. The tempest which threatens desolation, may be destined only to purify the atmosphere. It is not in tranquil ease and enjoyment, that the active energies of mankind are displayed. Toils and dangers are the trials of the soul. Doomed to the first by his sentence at the fall, man by submission, converts them into pleasures. The last are since the fall, the condition of his existence. To see them in advance, to guard against them by all the suggestions of prudence, to meet them with the composure of unyielding resistance, and to abide with firm resignation the final dispensation of him who rules the ball—these are the dictates of philosophy—these are the precepts of religion—these are the principles and consolations of patriotism—these remain when all is lost—and of these is composed the spirit of independence—the spirit embodied in that beautiful personification of the poet, which may each of you, my countrymen, to the last hour of his life, apply to himself—

"Thy spirit Independence, let me share,
Lord of the lion heart, and eagle eye!
Thy steps I follow, with my bosom bare.
Nor heed the storm that howls along the sky."

In the course of nature, the voice which now addresses you, must soon cease to be heard upon earth. Life and all which it inherits, lose their value as it draws towards its close. But for most of you, my friends and neighbors, long and many years of futurity are yet in store. May they be years of freedom—years of prosperity—years of happiness, ripening for immortality! But, were the breath which now gives utterance to my feelings, the last vital air I should draw, my expiring words to you and your children should be, independence and union forever!

MR. McLANE—AT LONDON.

From the London Albion, June 13.

The following correspondence announces the approaching departure of Mr. McLane, the American minister to our court, on his return to the United States. It would be difficult to decide whether that gentleman has given more satisfaction to his own government, or to that to which he had been accredited. During his mission, points of difficulty and delicacy, requiring no ordinary intelligence and address have been happily adjusted in a spirit of conciliation and kindness, and at the same time with the candor and firmness of a man alive to the important interests committed to his care. The delay of communication arising from the distance of America, renders it peculiarly incumbent on its government to select men of superior talent, integrity and discretion, for European diplomacy, and in this instance of Mr. McLane, they could not have made a more prudent choice.

St. James' street, London, June 8, 1831.

Dear sir—We have the honor to enclose to you the accompanying communication, and are, with the greatest regard,

Your most obedient servants,
JOSHUA BATES,
RICHARD M. BLATCHFORD,
JOSH. HILL CLARK.

His excellency Louis McLane, &c. &c. &c.

London, June 8, 1831.

Sir—Your fellow-citizens in this place having learned that it is your intention shortly to return to the United States, would not do justice to their own feelings if they were to permit you to depart without making known to you their high sense of your distinguished public services, and of your private urbanity and politeness. In addition to the sentiments which they in common with their countrymen at home entertain of your faithful and successful discharge of the important interests committed to your care, and for which no one who has the welfare of his country at heart will fail to acknowledge his gratitude and obligation, your fellow citizens here feel themselves under an additional obligation for that kindness and hospitality which they have uniformly experienced at your hands.

The zeal and ability which you have exhibited in the discharge of your public trusts, have not only enabled you to bring to a successful and highly beneficial issue a most responsible and arduous negotiation, but have also, combined, with a high and honorable frankness of character, which has peculiarly marked your intercourse, been the means of producing a most favorable and conciating spirit on the part of the British government towards the United States.

Such being the sentiments of your fellow citizens here, they feel desirous to manifest them to you, and beg you will honor them with your company, to a dinner which they propose to give you on such a day as may be most agreeable, and which they hope you will find it consistent with your avocations to appoint. They have requested the undersigned to convey to you this invitation and expression of their sentiments.

We have the honor to be, with the highest sentiments of respect and consideration, your most obedient and humble servants,

William E. West,

To his excellency Louis McLane, &c. &c. &c.

12, Devonshire street, June 10th, 1831.

Gentlemen—I have to thank you for your letter of the 8th inst. written in behalf of my "fellow citizens in London," expressing their sense of my conduct, and inviting me to partake of a public dinner before my departure for the United States.

I am quite incapable of disguising, or of adequately expressing how much I am gratified by this manifestation of kindness on the part of my fellow citizens, and by the estimate they place upon the humble services which the feelings of my heart, no less than a sense of duty, have prompted me to render to the country, and to them individually, during my residence at this court.

Though well assured that you do not exaggerate the importance of cultivating friendly relations between the two countries, I cannot but be sensible that your kindness has over-rated my agency in producing the favorable state of things to which you refer. I have but acted as an auxiliary to the efforts of my own government, and it is but just to say my task has been facilitated by the frank and amicable spirit with which those efforts have been met by this government in my negotiations, and the national good will manifested by this people in my general intercourse.

I wish it were in my power, while making you my acknowledgements for your kindness, to avail myself of the occasion you offer of meeting my countrymen together. I have, however, already made arrangements for leaving London early in the next week, with which a compliance with your wishes would be altogether incompatible. I am therefore, constrained to decline your very flattering invitation.

I must rely upon the spirit by which your letter was evidently dictated, to excuse any disappointment I may occasion, and tendering you my wishes for the prosperity of yourselves, and of those in whose behalf you write,—I am gentlemen, with sentiments of sincere regard, faithfully, your fellow citizen.

LOUIS McLANE.

PENNSYLVANIA COUNTY TAXATION.

The following table of the adjusted valuation of real and personal property in the several counties of this commonwealth, made taxable for the purpose of raising county rates and levies, was taken at Harrisburg, from documents in possession of the committee of ways and means. We presume it is sufficiently accurate for the purpose of showing the relative amount of tax to be paid by the people of each county, in pursuance of the act of last session "increasing the county rates and levies for the use of the commonwealth."

THE LANDERS AND THE RIVER NIGER.

The two Landers arrived here on Tuesday last in the William Harris transport, from Rio Janeiro, having reached that country from Fernando Po. They both appear in good health, and state that in their progress through Africa they found the climate perfectly healthy, experiencing no inconvenience in this regard, until they reached the pestilential influence of the coast, and Fernando Po. These travellers have, doubtless, thrown a very considerable light on African geography: how far their discoveries will be beneficial to our commerce, or enable us to communicate with the interior as to aid in the suppression of the slave trade in its origin, remains yet to be proved. It appears the Landers landed at Badagry on the 22d March, 1830, and immediately proceeded on horseback to the northward, to a city called Boussa, which is known to be on the Niger, and which city is described to be of great extent, being upwards of twenty miles in circumference, though it may not contain more than four thousand houses. These, however, in general, are little better than huts, and like Timbuctoo, contains no large buildings. It is situated about latitude 10° north. They remained nearly three months at this place, and ascertained that it was not an island, as had been supposed. The king of this place treated them very kindly; indeed they speak in high terms of the kindness and gentleness of the negroes in the interior, who, so far from offering to molest them, afforded them all the information and assistance in their power. It was only when they approached the vicinity of the coast that they experienced insult and impediment. During their sojourn at Boussa, they made excursions round it, and ascended the Niger against the stream for three days, visiting another city, which will be found in Clapperton's map, called Youri, directly north of Boussa. At the end of the three months, during which time the water in the river had been rising, from the influence of the rainy season, and which they were told would be requisite to ensure their safe passage over the rocks and other impediments, which form rapids, &c. they began to descend, and soon found the river easterly till they reached the vicinity of Funda; which city should be placed on the maps at least two degrees further east than it now is. Near Funda the Niger was joined by a large river, which, from description, was doubtless the Shary, and which the natives said came in a direct line from Tchad lake, distant fifteen days journey in the north east, thus clearly proving that the Niger receives from, instead of extending its waters in, that lake. With regard to the Tchad lake, it was understood it sent out its waters to other rivers, further east than Funda, and running to the southward, most probably supplying the great rivers Zaire and Congo. Below Funda, at a place called Thirree, these adventurous travellers were pursued and captured by a fleet of 30 or 40 war canoes. In the pursuit (it does not appear why the Landers should have fled) their canoes were swamped, and all their writings, collections, and instruments were lost. This took place about ten days journey from the coast. The natives of Thirree, after their capture, treated them kindly, and forwarded them towards the coast. Below Funda they fell in with a river which branched to the westward, and which they ascertained to be the river Benin. They reached the sea by the Nun river, a few miles to the eastward of cape Formosa, and about two degrees from Badagry, from whence they started. They conjectured they had come down the Niger at least 900 miles, but having lost their instruments and papers, they had no means of ascertaining the exact position and distance of the many towns they passed on either side of its banks. When they arrived at the mouth of the Nun river, they discharged a servant, Antonio, who set off up the river to return to his own country; but on the arrival of the Landers at Fernando Po, they ascertained that this servant, after proceeding up the river Nun, branched off to the eastward, and reached the coast again by the New Calabar river, thus proving that the Benin, the Nun, and the New Calabar rivers were all mouths of the great Niger, with a direct communication to the Tchad lake. After their capture they were purchased by a slave-dealer, who doubtless knew he should obtain a good price for giving them up. They reached the sea about the 30th of November, 1830. During the time they were in the interior, a volume of Watt's hymns fell into their hands, which had formerly belonged to Dr. Anderson, who was in company with Mungo Park at the time of his death. NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES.] No. 25—VOL. IV. BALTIMORE, AUG. 20, 1831. [VOL. XL. WHOLE No. 1,039

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

☞Believing that our readers generally would expect a prompt insertion of Mr. Calhoun's exposition of the thing which is called "NULLIFICATION," we have nullified, or withdrawn, a number of articles intended for the present sheet, that his lengthy article might appear without a division.

The sentiments just expressed by this distinguished gentleman naturally leads us to contrast them with those which he so firmly entertained in the "red jacket" days of the radicals, or as promulgated by his friend, Mr. McDuffie! A little while ago, he seemed to think that the national government possessed nearly all power—but now would instruct us that a single state, by merely starting a doubt as to the rightful exercise of that power, may arrest or suspend its operation, in all cases whatsoever, and bring twenty three states into special judgment upon the question presented! We contess our astonishment at many parts of his argument, but have not either time, room, nor present inclination to make any remarks upon them, except to say, that Mr. Calhoun has much distressed and completely dispersed the numerous friends that he had in Baltimore—for, let us differ about other things as we may, we are united against nullification, and in favor of a protecting tariff.

☞The U. S. Telegraph is goading the Washington Globe to publish the "last words of Mr. Crawford," which Mr. Green gives the public to understand have for some time been in the keeping of Mr. Blair. The former intimates that the publication of Mr. Crawford's remarks on the "Calhoun correspondence" will bring out "secrets worth knowing," and bear heavily upon certain important persons.

RAIL ROADS. Mr. Davis' locomotive conveyed three cars and 66 persons, the whole weighing eight tons, to Ellicott's mills, 13 miles, on Tuesday last, in 50 minutes—and returned, with four cars and 120 persons, in 55 minutes. Over those parts of the road where the curves are not numerous, a mile was passed in three minutes. The turn-outs, also, caused a prudent reduction of speed.

The rail road from Albany to Schenectady is in operation. The cars, at present, are drawn by horses, but two locomotives will soon be upon the road. This is a valuable improvement.

The Ithaca and Owego rail road is about to be commenced, under very flattering prospects.

ELECTIONS. The returns from Kentucky are yet incomplete. It seems admitted, however, that a considerable majority of the members of the legislature elected; are friendly to Mr. Clay. Messrs. Johnson,* Lecompte, Wickliffe and Lyon, and probably Daniel, have been re-elected, and gen. Adair has beaten Mr. Kincaid. Messrs. Letcher and Chilton have been re-elected; Mr. Allan succeeds Mr. Clark, who declined a poll; Mr. Marshall has beaten Coleman, and Mr. Tompkins supercedes Yancey. The result in Mr. Gaither's district is not certainly known. We have not yet a return of the votes given to the different gentlemen, which will be important to shew the real political character of the state.

A fourth trial has been had both in the Essex North and Bristol districts of Massachusetts, to elect members of congress, and no choice has been made in either—because of the diversion caused by the anti-masonic candidates.

In Indiana, there were three candidates for governor—by the returns before us, Mr. Noble obtained 13,335 votes, Mr. Stapp 4,743—and Mr. Read, the only Jackson candidate, 10,203. The returns for members of congress are not yet sufficient to lead to any certain conclusion—but there is reason to believe that Mr. Test is left out, being opposed by another friend of Mr. Clay, as well as by the regular Jackson candidate Mr. McCarty.

Mr. Blair has been re-elected in Tennessee, though warmly opposed, for he was not considered the Jackson candidate. Mr. Arnold has beaten Mr. Lea, the late member.

Nearly all the old members of congress from North Carolina have been re-elected, without much opposition. Messrs. Branch and McKay are new members. Mr. W. B. Shepard was opposed by Mr. Wheeler—the latter was beaten, by a very large majority.

The Virginia elections are going on, and we shall soon have the returns. Nothing worthy of special remark has yet been decided.

There is again no choice in the 4th congressional district in Vermont.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT. George B. Porter, of Pennsylvania, to be governor of the Michigan territory, in place of Lewis Cass, resigned.

Lucius Lyon, of Michigan, to be commissioner on the part of the United States for ascertaining the northern boundary line of the state of Illinois.

POLITICAL NOTICES. Mr. Van Buren, and his secretary and sons, sailed from New York for London on Tuesday last, in the packet ship President—and not in the Potomac frigate, as was expected.

Mr. Livingston, secretary of state, Mr. Woodbury, secretary of the navy, commodores Rogers and Stewart, navy commissioners, and Mr. Goldsborough, secretary to the navy commissioners, arrived in New York a few days since, and paid a visit to the Potomac, lying ready for sea in the North river, on which occasion the yards were manned, and a salute of seventeen guns was fired.

BALTIMORE MANUFACTURES. There are very few, if any, of our citizens who have a just idea of the extent and importance of the manufacturing establishments of Baltimore. We have several times contemplated a complete list of them, but for want of time, or some other cause, have not yet been able to shew the amount and power, and effect of our works in metals and minerals, mineral and other earths, wood, stone, cotton, wool, hides and skins, furs, and a long list of other materials—but we know enough of the business of this city to hazard the expression of a belief, that its various manufactures create an annual value of at least five millions of dollars: and herein is the true cause of that general prosperity, or happy state of ease, which is so manifest in Baltimore—shewn in the fulness of our population, and the numerous buildings that are going on, for the better accommodation of the people or to invite new inhabitants. It may be metaphorically said, that no house, fit for persons to live in, is without its tenant.

Our present purpose, however, is to notice one establishment that we lately expended an hour in passing through and examining—in company with several gentlemen, also invited to witness the various operations carried on—the coach factory of Messrs. Stockton and Stokes, on Belvidere street, under the superintendence of Mr. Richard Imlay—of the extent of which few among us had a correct opinion. Fifty men and thirty lads are employed in this factory—and they are aided by scientific power in a remarkable manner, in every department of this extensive concern. It is ingeniously applied in all possible cases—to the fashioning of iron, the sawing of timber, the smoothing of boards, the turning of iron and wood, the boring or drilling of holes in wood or metal, &c. propelled by the surplus water of the canal leading to the "city mill." We also observed many improvements—among them a new plan, by Mr. Mervin, of Pennsylvania, for heating the tires of wheels, by which that process, for a whole set, may be performed in four minutes, at the expense of much less than a bushel of charcoal, and in that time the work seemed much better done than in the old mode. Manual labor is saved in all manner of ways, and yet eighty males here have an abundant, and, from the appearance of the people, a happy employment; and the accuracy and despatch that attends their operations, often astonishes those unacquainted with the means of Messrs. Stockton and Stokes to complete the orders given them. This results from the harmony of the various branches of their business—the strict discipline that prevails, and the cheerfulness of the working people—zealous to please. These are divided into several principal bodies—such as smiths, carriage-makers, body-makers, trimmers, painters and harness makers—every one having his own business to do—and doing it.

A magnificent four horse coach, made by the boys, attracted particular attention—also a splendid rail-road car, called the Virginia, soon hoped to reach the state after which it is named, on the Baltimore and Ohio road, unless embarrassed by the "meshes of the law" or a stand-still policy.

Messrs. Stockton & Stokes' mail and other coaches have long since obtained the public approbation, for a happy combination of strength and beauty with safety—but we may expect many yet further improvements because of their own manufacture of such articles, under charge of their ingenious, and, we may well add, patriotic superintendent,—who seems to regard all the boys as his own children, and is anxious to raise them up into valuable men.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT. All savings made in the cost of transportations—and also the time occupied in them—are as much a part of the general wealth of a community in new creations of articles of value—as gold digged from the earth. Thus—a farmer has 100 bushels of wheat over the wants of his family—and his neighbors, being also cultivators of wheat, are as well supplied as himself; his surplus wheat is, therefore, of no more value at home than so many bushels of sand. At the nearest market, some manufacturing or commercial town, wheat is worth 100 cents per bushel—but, because of the distance, bad roads or want of water conveyance, the transportation of wheat to this market, (whereat only it can obtain value), will cost him 25 cents per bushel, and this does not seem much for the carriage of 60 lbs. But, because of the making of a rail road or canal, the cost of transportation is reduced to 6¼ cents for 60 lbs. to the same place. Then the farmer's 100 bushels of wheat, at home, is of as much value to him as 119 bushels, (nearly) were before such road or canal was constructed, and herein is a clear gain of nineteen per cent. to the public—producers or consumers, because of the improvement being made. This gain must disperse itself to the profit of the people at large.

Mines of coal and iron, &c. with forests of oak and other timber, are often so located as to give no value to the owners of the soil—yet 5,000 dollars per acre would be paid for some such lands, if close to the market. But science has enabled us, if not absolutely to "conquer space," to subject it sufficiently to our dominion, for all useful purposes. Coal, from Cumberland—will soon arrive in Baltimore, charged with only about one cent. per bushel for transportation, though these places, by the nearest roads, are not less than one hundred and thirty-five miles apart. And at present, coal, at Cumberland, is hardly worth more than the cost of digging and carting it. We believe that the expense of these constitutes the present actual value of this powerful and indispensable agent in the hands of man, at the place just named!

Again—the time and subsistence of a man travelling may be fairly rated at two dollars a day, and the stage-fare will generally cost at least one dollar for every twenty miles travelled. Now, it used to require 10 days of pretty hard travelling to proceed from Baltimore to some point on the Ohio, say 300 miles distant. We intend to make this journey, travelling very moderately, in 30 hours, and carry passengers the 300 miles for nine dollars or less. Let us see how the account will stand:

By the old mode.
10 days time and subsistence	20
300 miles stage fare is	15
	35
By the rail road.
1½ days time and subsistence	3
300 miles travel	9
	12
Actual saving	23

We have no means of ascertaining the amount of persons who travel the various roads between the east and the west, in stages or other carriages for passengers. Suppose they are only 50,000, both ways—and then there will appear an actual gain by internal improvement, in this respect only, of 1,150,000 dollars a year! This is a very moderate calculation.

Seeing that such mighty national benefits flow from cheapening the cost of transportations, is it not melancholy to reflect upon the opposition which exists to appropriations of a small part of the national revenue to the making of roads and canals and clearing out obstructions to the navigation of rivers? We have not time now, nor does it seem necessary, to go into a statement and examination of the causes of such opposition: but we have thought that all opposition might be quieted by a very simple arrangement—as follows:

Whenever a state shall undertake with its own funds, or incorporate a company with theirs, to make any road or canal [on which tolls are to be charged]—the probable cost of such road or canal being carefully estimated and laid before the president of the United States, shall be by him submitted to congress, with such remarks as he may think proper in relation to it: whereupon congress, unless some special reason shall exist for the contrary, shall appropriate a sum equal to one-fifth of the estimated cost of such road or canal, payable at such time and manner as the state or company shall ACTUALLY pay for the furtherance of such work—provided that the sum paid, or to become payable at the treasury of the United States, shall not exceed —— millions of dollars in any one year. And, to avoid all jealousy on the part of the states or corporations, and prevent undue influences on the part of the United States, let the whole management be in and remain with the states or corporations, respectively.

We cannot see any reasonable objection to this broad project. The actual investment of four-fifths of the funds required, is the best of all possible guaranties of the propriety of undertakings—the revenue in the way of tolls, derived from them, would pass into the public treasury to assist in new enterprizes, and no fear could be entertained as to infringements upon the "rights of the states." Many new improvements would be started with such certain support on the part of the nation, and the people of those states who might be unwilling to embark in such works, or have no need of them, could not be such "dogs in the manger" as to refuse the assistance to others, for the common good of the whole.

Suppose that two millions were thus annually appropriated, for only twenty years? It might, and possibly would, insure the disbursement of 200,000,000 of dollars in roads, canals, bridges, &c. during that short period! What man is bold enough to calculate the rise in the value of lands and other property that would follow such a sublime proceeding? The money, expended among ourselves, would not be lost to the amount of a single cent. It would only change hands—be given up to the "circulation of values."

Two millions a year, which may be spared without being at all felt—would be amply sufficient on the plan proposed, and the plan of proceeding so arranged as to quiet all jealousies because of preferences. There might yet be some great works that ought to be performed as undoubtedly national objects—which should be subject to particular legislation, as presenting themselves for adoption.

THE FEDERAL AND STATE GOVERNMENTS. The National Intelligencer of the 29th ult. contained some extracts from a speech of Mr. William H. Crawford, in the senate, in favor of renewing the charter of the old bank of the United States—which, because of certain constitutional points urged, we have laid off for publication. Mr. Ritchie, in his head-long support of Mr. Crawford for the presidency in 1824, no doubt, (as his fashion is), conveniently forgot this and other like speeches of that gentleman. We present the following brief paragraphs, by way of a desert for his supper.

"Permit me, sir, to make one or two observations upon the competency of the state governments to resist the authority or the execution of a law of congress. What kind of resistance can they make which is constitutional? I know of but one kind, and that is BY ELECTIONS.

"The people and the states have a right to change the members of the national legislature, and in that way, AND THAT ALONE, can they effect a change of the measures of this government. It is true, there is another kind of resistance, which may be made, but it is unknown to the constitution. This resistance depends upon physical force—it is an appeal to the sword, and by the sword must that appeal be decided, and not by the provisions of the constitution."

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS. The appointment of Mr. Livingston to the office of secretary of state, has rendered his opinions on the constitutional right of the national government to appropriate money to the making of roads and canals, highly important. We therefore copy from our journal of the proceedings of the senate, the following paragraphs—that Mr. Ritchie may have the better appetite for his supper, when they are presented to his recollections—for he has surely forgotten them!

In senate.

Dec. 17, 1829. A resolution submitted by Mr. Livingston enquiring into the expediency of constructing a direct road from Washington to New Orleans, was considered and agreed to.

Dec. 21. Certain resolutions submitted by Mr. Livingston on Thursday last, on the subject of opening a water communication between the Mississippi and lake Ponchartrain, of erecting a light house at the mouth of Tchifuncti; and of constructing embankments and bridges, and making roads on the public lands in Louisiana, at the expense of the United States, were considered and agreed to.

THE CHOLERA. The following proclamation has been issued by the mayor of New York:

By virtue of authority vested in me by law, I WALTER BOWNE, mayor of the city of New York, do order and direct, that from and after the publication of this proclamation, and until it shall be revoked, all vessels arriving in the port of New York from any place in the Levant, the Gult of Venice, or any place in the Mediterranean sea, in the passage from which it is necessary to pass the fifteenth degree of east longitude, as calculated from London, and seventy-fifth as calculated from New York, and all vessels from any port in the Baltic, including the ports in Denmark, shall anchor at the quarantine ground, and be submitted to the examination of the health officer, and in all respects be subjected to the provisions of the health law.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto subscribed my name, and affixed the seal of the mayoralty of the city of New York, this sixth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-one.

[L. S.]

WALTER BOWNE, mayor.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR.

Philadelphia county, 1st August, 1831.

I am an advocate for free trade—but the weather is now too warm to permit me to attempt to carry off your prize of terrapins and oysters; and, although a temperate man, I should like to taste your wine, at a convenient season. I declare myself an advocate of free trade upon the broadest and most extended principles, and hope we may both live to enjoy its advantages with all others, of which we are capable. But by free trade, sir, I do not mean the privilege of importing my hat, boots and dress-coat from a foreign country, which will not allow me to send flour or beef in exchange. Nor do I call it an advance towards free trade when an English blacksmith in Philadelphia, whose stomach is so fastidious as to require Cheshire cheese, asks congress to reduce the duties upon certain kinds of imported iron, while those upon provisions of every description are continued at so high a rate as in the ports of Great Britain and Ireland, and their dependencies.

But, Mr. Editor, with your shrewdness, ingenuity and practice, have you not been a little hasty in promising a premium for the discovery of free trade, when the only example of it lies so near to you, in the regulations of commerce between the different United States of North America? If any other can be discovered or created, unless the condition of the people is changed—politically, morally and physically—I don't care if I promise to add a few fat wethers, some hams and Mercer potatoes, to assist the exertion. A plain man, who is not very obstinate, is almost borne down by the multitude of terms, which, at first, he thinks he understands, but finds they have a sacred meaning, when used by such as call themselves political economists. I do not attempt them. An anti-tariff convention is to be held at Philadelphia—an anti-masonic one passed off very quietly there—much to the distress of some of the excited members. I hope the members of the next meeting will be able to enjoy themselves, if they cannot make proselytes—for it has strangely happened that all the averments of the ill effects of "the abominable tariff" have been disproven by experience. Our country generally, and at large, was never in a more prosperous condition, and although changes, unusual, have occurred in the administration of the general government, the arrangements previously made with regard to the tariff, have worked uncommonly well.

No doubt the interests of some particular individuals may have been partially affected—but there exists fewer causes for complaint than we have known, particularly among the mercantile class of society. When we look at the large investments of capital made in different sections of our own country, the variety of beneficial improvements—the new branches of industry brought forward—and the active occupation and advancement of all classes of society, except mere politicians, we have cause to be particularly thankful. We daily discover fresh sources of wealth, of convenience, and of advantage, in the beautiful and varied territories in which we reside: and a contrast with the condition of any European power, will certainly not encourage us to expect better customers there for our productions than at home—for the governments must, in order to keep up their expensive establishments, tax them severely. As an American, I do not think I am called upon to encourage their industry, for although I pity the condition of the poor in those countries, I do not think it right, by purchasing the products of their manufacturers, to support systems of government so much at variance in principle and practice with my own. And this, in my opinion, every one does who consumes such productions. We do not support their industrious poor by our purchases—but we give means of increased profligacy—expense—war—oppression—or extravagance to their rulers. This is a subject that goes a little further than the consumption of bread stuffs and the supplies of clothing. The tariff regulations influence all, morally and physically, as well as politically. While the noble minded Fulton was busily engaged in his experiments and trials with steam, and being assured of their influence—with that decisive feeling which marks the man of genius, he did not confine his views to the transportation of passengers or the defence of sea ports, but he looked to the ultimate effects upon the interests of nations.

The restrictions of the tariff, arranged by the congress of the United States, give to our country a control and power which are not calculated by some politicians who would contract their influence by objections which are already answered by our present experience.

"I was convinced," says Mr. Fulton, "that society must pass through ages of progressive improvement, before the freedom of the seas could be established by an agreement of nations—that it was for the true interest of the whole." And what does he to induce this desirable object?

He contrives the most terrible engines of destruction—the most awful means, except those ordained by nature's laws, for the extermination of an invading enemy—the steam frigate and torpedoes. And why? Because in his own words—"I saw that the growing wealth and commerce, and the increasing population of the United States, would compel them to look for a protection by sea, and perhaps drive them to the necessity of resorting to European measures, by establishing a navy. Seeing this, I turned my whole attention to find out means of destroying such engines of oppression, by some method which would put it out of the power of any nation to maintain such a system, and would compel every government to adopt the simple principles of education, industry, and a free circulation of its produce."* And I believe, sir, if the influences of the American restrictive system are fairly and fully proven, that they will be found to have the effect to oblige other governments to yield to the true principles of free trade, and expose the false pretensions of those who only wish so much freedom of trade as suits their own convenience and interest—and use most futile arguments to interrupt the progress in knowledge, independence and successful industry of those who alone live under free institutions.

These, at any rate, are the views of a very plain farmer, who wishes success to every branch of industry, and to the people of every nation—and firmly believes he assists them most prudently by supporting the American System.

CARPETS. We see that the "Banner of the Constitution" is making a grand display about the tax on Ingrain carpets, which is put down at 40 cents a yard. Now, we can buy any quantity of such carpets at 75 cents a yard, retail price†—and the duty being 40 cents, only 35 cents are left as the real value of the article!—So with cotton goods—the tax, or duty, on which being deducted from the selling price of the article, would hardly leave enough to pay the South Carolina planter for his cotton consumed in making them—and so it would appear that the "overgrown capitalists" of the north must obtain people to work for nothing and find themselves! We guess they would'nt do that—very long!

LIVERPOOL AND MANCHESTER RAILWAY. In the course of two weeks, the receipts arising from the traffic on the railway amounted to £8,500, being considerably above £200,000 a year. On one day 470 tons of goods were taken, besides passengers; being one-third of the whole quantity carried between the two towns. The £100 shares are now worth £195.

FOREIGN NEWS.

An arrival at New York brings Liverpool dates to the 7th July, inclusive.

ENGLAND.

In the house of commons, on the 4th of July, lord John Russel moved the second reading of the reform bill. Sir J. Walsh considered the bill as fatal to the liberties of the country, and moved its postponement for six months. He was seconded by Mr. Tynes Clinton. Sir James McIntosh advocated the bill at great length and ability. The debate on the bill continued until the evening of the 6th. Mr. R. A. Dundas, sir J. Malcolm, col. French, Mr. K. Douglass, sir R. Peel and sir Geo. Murry, opposed the bill. It was supported by Mr. Macauley, lord Althorp, sir Francis Lopez, Mr. Campbell, Mr. Bulyer, sir Francis Burdett and lord John Russell. Sir Francis denied that the claims of the people, still so justly urged, resulted from any events on the continent; they were only the continuation of what had been consistently maintained for 50 years. On a division of the house, there were for the second reading 367, against it 231, majority in its favor 136. The bill was to be considered again on the 12th, but the grand debate may be considered as over, so far as the house of commons is concerned.

The debates, in the opinion of the London Courier, have not been very spirited. The speeches of sir James McIntosh, Mr. Macauly and Mr. Bulyer, (the author of Pelham), on the side of reform, and that of sir Robert Peel against it, are said to have been the ablest.

The weather throughout England had been highly favourable for the crops—the gardens were sending forth their profusion of fruits and flowers; wheat was getting into ear, and every prospect augured well for the harvest.

Lt. gen. sir Richard Vivian, bart. and K. C. B. had been appointed to serve as lieutenant general upon the staff of the army in Ireland, for the purpose of succeeding gen. sir John Byng in command of the troops.

Government had determined on the persons to be promoted to the peerage.

The British official revenue returns of the last quarter, ending on the 5th ult. have just been published. They exhibit a decrease on the year of £1,656,282, and on the quarter of £697,659, a defalcation which would be alarming enough were it not easily accounted for. Since the 5th July last year a large amount of taxes has been repealed, and the deficiency would have been twice or thrice as great but for the increase of consumption, which almost invariably attends a reduction of taxation on articles in general use. The following are the principal taxes which have been repealed:—Beer, £2,804,000; hides, £371,000; cider, £44,000; candles, £471,000; printed goods, £499,000; making a total of £4,189,000, besides the coal duties, which were estimated at £800,000 a year, and which ceased on the 1st of March.

Twelve hundred of the Oldham cotton spinners had been thrown out of work, in consequence of refusing to accede to a further reduction of their wages. The partial turn-out of the colliers still exists, without any appearance of the old hands being again employed.

The London Courier mentions a coinage of five franc pieces, to the value of £50,000 sterling, with "Henry V. Roi de France," on one side, and the fleur de lys on the other, and states that proclamations to the French people, in the name of Henry V. have been printed in London.

The rigorous enforcement of the quarantine had materially diminished the custom house duties on goods from the north of Europe.

Orders had been received at Portsmouth for the squadron under the command of sir Edward Codrington to proceed to sea, as soon as the ships' companies receive their advance wages.

The Catholic bishops have held a synod in Dublin, and agreed to petition parliament about the education of the poor, and in favor of poor laws.

Letters received in London state that Russia and Austria have 400,000 men, armed and equipped, and ready to take the field. Some of the British journals conclude from this, that there will speedily be a convulsion on the continent.

FRANCE.

The affairs on the continent wore a lowering aspect, and France is much agitated. The monarch and his ministers are alarmed, and it is affirmed will recommend an abolition of the hereditary peerage. It is said that there are many persons in France ready to receive the ex-royal family, and that an attempt at a counter revolution in their favor is not improbable.

The celebration of the anniversary of the revolution is looked upon by some with fear. A report that the Dutchess de Berri was travelling on the continent, had given rise to many speculations with respect to her object.

The French government have agreed to pay to the American claimants as an indemnity for property taken, 25,000,000 francs, (say 5,000,000 dollars)—the original sum claimed, says the account before us, was 60,000,000; but the truth is that it was nearer 100,000,000.

POLAND.

Advices from this country are contradictory. A Berlin paper represents the situation of the Poles as extremely critical, the Russians having crossed the Vistula below Plock, and the corps of generals Kreutz and Rudigo, having effected a junction with the main army. Letters from Warsaw on the other hand, of the 23d June, make no mention of any of these circumstances. The Polish accounts represent the insurrection in the Russian Polish provinces as spreading rapidly; that general Geilgud was at the head of 40,000 men, and that in Samogotia 20,000 insurgents are under arms. General Dembinski, with another force, had entered Lithuania, at Olitta, 50 or 60 miles west of Wilna, where he had been joined by a large body of insurgents, who had previously beaten a Russian detachment and captured two pieces of cannon and supplies near Troki. General Chlapowski had arrived at Lida.

The Polish government has announced a loan of 60,000,000 florins.

The Prussians are said to be constructing a bridge for the Russians at Drewenca, to facilitate their passage over the Vistula.

The papers are loud in their denunciations against the Prussians on account of their partiality towards the Russians. General Toll derives all his supplies from them. General Schryznecki had made a demonstration upon the enemy by marching towards Siecnica, but had returned to Praga.

The Poles have taken the important fortress of Bobrouysek in Lithuania, which served as a Russian depot for arms and ammunition.

A levy en masse has been decided upon in Poland, to to give the Russians a mortal blow.

A spirit unfriendly to gen. Schryznecki is said to exist at Warsaw—he is charged with keeping about him unskilful officers, because they belong to great families. In the midst of these private dissentions, a Russian corps is said to be advancing on Warsaw, having thrown bridges across the Narew. Lubienski, it is thought will succeed to the command-in-chief, should Schryznecki be removed or resign.

RUSSIA.

The emperor, considering the distinguished success of general Deibitsch, has ordered that his regiment shall retain its name of Deibitsch Salbansky.

The death of general Deibitsch was produced by the cholera. He left his property amounting to 1,600,000 francs, in equal portions to his brother Arnold Deibitsch, a hatter at Stettin, in Prussian Pomerania, and to his sister Albertin, a nun of the convent of St. Ulrica, at Wolfhart, in the neighborhood of Konigsburg.

The appointment of field marshal count Paskewitsch, as the successor of general Deibitsch, is announced in a general order dated June 16th.

BELGIUM.

In the sitting of the national congress of Belgium, on the 28th June, the treaty agreed upon by the ministers of the five great powers at London, as the basis of the arrangement of the differences between Holland and Belgium, was read. The treaty consists of eighteen articles, but is not binding on either party until acceded to by both, the rejection by each of any part or the whole of them, the articles become null and void. A letter from prince Leopold was received, agreeing to accept the crown on condition that the Belgian congress confirm the treaty above alluded to, and promising, on being so notified, to proceed forthwith to Belgium to assume the duties of the sovereignty.

The discussions relative to the articles of the treaty were still going on at the latest advices. Their promulgation had caused a popular commotion in the Louvain. An ex-editor of a paper by the name of Adolphe Roussel, had put himself at the head of the disaffected. A proclamation had been issued urging the people to reject the treaty, and a deputation from Louvain had waited on the regent protesting against it. The reply of the regent is said to have contained a disapproval of the proceedings of the people, and of the irregular method of presenting their petition, but at the same time avowing his dissent from the preliminaries of the treaty. There appears to be several parties at Brussels, and various rumors of plots and counter plots are daily afloat; a little time, however must settle the question of peace or war between Belgium and Holland, as, from the present excited state of feeling throughout the former country, it is not likely that the people will submit to have the affairs of the government remain much longer in their present unsettled state.

FLORIDA ELECTION.

The following proclamation has been issued by the governor of Florida:

To the judges and clerks of the several counties in th territory aforesaid:

Whereas, an election for delegate to congress was held in this territory on the first Monday in May last, in conformity to law, when James Gadsden and Joseph M. White, were voted for as candidates: And whereas, it appears from the returns accompanied by a transcript of the poll books, transmitted to the executive, from the several counties of said territory, that James Gadsden and Joseph M. White (the said candidates) have the same number of votes; now therefore, be it known to the judges and clerks of the several counties of this territory, that in conformity with the provisions of an act of the legislative council, passed on the 18th November, 1828, entitled, an "act to provide for holding an election for delegate to congress from this territory," that another election is hereby ordered to be holden, for delegate to congress, throughout the territory, on the first Monday in October, 1831. The said judges and clerks of the several counties, are hereby charged with the due execution of this proclamation in strict accordance with the provisions of the act aforesaid.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name at the city of Tallahassee, this 2d day of July, 1831, and of the independence of the United States, the fifty-fifth year. WILLIAM P. DUVAL.

Colonel White has published a long reply and severe examination of the proceedings of governor Duval, in this matter. He takes a bold view of the subject in general, utterly rejects the authority of the governor to act in the case—that the highest number of votes being given for him, the governor had no other duty to perform than to certify the fact—each house of congress being judges of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own members. He requests his friends to treat the proclamation with "contempt," and advises the people not to attend the polls—being resolved to proceed to Washington and claim his seat, by virtue of the election already held.

Col. White had a returned majority of 171 votes—but gov. Duval, rejecting so many, has made a tie between him and col. Gadsden. These proceedings will lead to a long and interesting, and probably serious investigation of facts, and establish some important particulars.

MR. CALHOUN'S SENTIMENTS.

From the Pendleton (S. C.) Messenger.

Mr. Symmes, I must request you to permit me to use your columns, as the medium to make known my sentiments on the deeply important question, of the relation, which the states and general government bear to each other, and which is at this time a subject of so much agitation.

It is one of the peculiarities of the station I occupy, that while it necessarily connects its incumbent with the politics of the day, it affords him no opportunity officially to express his sentiments, except accidentally on an equal division of the body, over which he presides. He is thus exposed, as I have often experienced, to have his opinions erroneously and variously represented. In ordinary cases I conceive the correct course to be to remain silent, leaving to time and circumstances the correction of misrepresentations; but there are occasions so vitally important, that a regard both to duty and character would seem to forbid such a course; and such I conceive, to be the present. The frequent allusion to my sentiments, will not permit me to doubt, that such also is the public conception, and that it claims the right to know, in relation to the question referred to, the opinions of those, who hold important official stations; while on my part desiring to receive neither unmerited praise, nor blame, I feel, I trust the solicitude, which every honest and independent man ought, that my sentiments should be truly known whether they be such, as may be calculated to recommend them to public favor, or not. Entertaining these impressions, I have concluded that it is my duty to make known my sentiments: and I have adopted the mode, which on reflection seemed to be the most simple, and best calculated to effect the object in view.

The question of the relation which the states and general government bear to each other, is not one of recent origin. From the commencement of our system, it has divided public sentiment. Even in the convention, while the constitution was struggling into existence, there were two parties, as to what this relation should be, whose different sentiments, constituted no small impediment in forming that instrument. After the general government went into operation, experience soon proved, that the question had not terminated with the labors of the convention. The great struggle, that preceded the political revolution of 1801, which brought Mr. Jefferson into power, turned essentially on it; and the doctrines and arguments on both sides were embodied and ably sustained; on the one, in the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions, and the report to the Virginia legislature; and on the other, in the replies of the legislature of Massachusetts and some of the other states. These resolutions and this report, with the decision of the supreme court of Pennsylvania about the same time, (particularly in the case of Cobbett, delivered by chief justice McKean and concurred in by the whole bench) contain what I believe to be the true doctrine on this important subject. I refer to them, in order to avoid the necessity of presenting my views, with the reasons in support of them in detail.

As my object is simply to state my opinions, I might pause with this reference to documents, that so fully and ably state all the points immediately connected with this deeply important subject, but as there are many, who may not have the opportunity, or leisure to refer to them, and, as it is possible, however clear they may be, that different persons may place different interpretations on their meaning, I will, in order that my sentiments may be fully known, and to avoid all ambiguity, proceed to state summarily the doctrines which I conceive they embrace.

Their great and leading principle is, that the general government emanated from the people of the several states, forming distinct political communities, and acting in their separate and sovereign capacity, and not from all of the people forming one aggregate political community; that the constitution of the United States is in fact a compact, to which each state is a party, in the character already described; and that the several states or parties, have a right to judge of its infractions, and in cases of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of a power not delegated, they have the right, in the last resort, to use the language of the Virginia resolution, "to interpose for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining within their respective limits, the authorities, rights and liberties appertaining to them." This right of interposition, thus solemnly asserted by the state of Virginia, be it called what it may, state right, veto, nullification, or by any other name, I conceive to be the fundamental principle of our system, resting on facts historically as certain as our revolution itself, and deductions, as simple and demonstrative, as that of any political, or moral truth whatever; and I firmly believe that on its recognition depends, the stability and safety of our political institutions.

I am not ignorant, that those opposed to the doctrine have always, now and formerly, regarded it in a very different light, as anarchical and revolutionary. Could I believe such in fact to be its tendency, to me it would be no recommendation. I yield to none, I trust, in a deep and sincere attachment to our political institutions and the union of these states. I never breathed an opposite sentiment; but on the contrary, I have ever considered them the great instruments of preserving our liberty, and promoting the happiness of ourselves and our posterity; and next to these, I have ever held them most dear.—Nearly half my life has passed in the service of the union, and whatever public reputation I have acquired, is indissolubly identified with it. To be too national has, indeed, been considered by many, even of my friends, to be my greatest political fault. With these strong feelings of attachment, I have examined with the utmost care, the bearing of the doctrine in question: and so far from anarchical, or revolutionary, I solemnly believe it to be, the only solid foundation of our system, and of the union itself, and that the opposite doctrine, which denies to the states the right of protecting their reserved powers, and which would vest in the general government, (it matters not through what department), the right of determining exclusively and finally the powers delegated to it, is incompatible with the sovereignty of the states, and of the constitution itself, considered as the basis of a federal union. As strong as this language is, it is not stronger than that used by the illustrious Jefferson, who said, to give to the general government the final and exclusive right to judge of its powers, is to make "its discretion and not the constitution the measure of its powers;" and that "in all cases of compact between parties having no common judge, each party has an equal right to judge for itself, as well of the operation, as of the mode and measure of redress." Language cannot be more explicit; nor can higher authority be adduced.

That different opinions are entertained on this subject, I consider, but as an additional evidence of the great diversity of the human intellect. Had not able, experienced and patriotic individuals, for whom I have the highest respect, taken different views, I would have thought the right too clear to admit of doubt; but I am taught by this, as well as by many similar instances, to treat with deference opinions differing from my own. The error may possibly be with me; but, if so, I can only say, that after the most mature and conscientious examination, I have not been able to detect it. But with all proper deference, I must think, that theirs is the error, who deny, what seems to be an essential attribute of the conceded sovereignty of the states; and who attribute to the general government, a right utterly incompatible with what all acknowledge to be its limited and restricted character; an error originating principally, as I must think, in not duly reflecting on the nature of our institutions, and on what constitutes the only rational object of all political constitutions.

It has been well said by one of the most sagacious men of antiquity, that the object of a constitution is to restrain the government, as that of laws is to restrain individuals. The remark is correct, nor is it less true, where the government is vested in a majority, than where it is in a single or a few individuals; in a republic, than a monarchy or aristocracy. No one can have a higher respect for the maxim, that a majority ought to govern, than I have, taken in its proper sense, subject to the restrictions imposed by the constitution, and confined to subjects in which every portion of the community have similar interests; but it is a great error to suppose, as many do, that the right of a majority to govern is a natural and not a conventional right; and, therefore absolute and unlimited. By nature every individual has the right to govern himself; and governments, whether founded on majorities, or minorities, must derive their right from the assent, expressed or implied, of the governed, and be subject to such limitations, as they may impose. Where the interests are the same, that is where the laws that may benefit one, will benefit all, or the reverse, it is just and proper to place them under the control of the majority; but where they are dissimilar, so that the law, that may benefit one portion may be ruinous to another, it would be on the contrary unjust and absurd to subject them to its will; and such, I conceive to be the theory on which our constitution rests.

That such dissimilarity of interest may exist, it is impossible to doubt. They are to be found in every community, in a greater, or less degree, however small or homogeneous; and they constitute, every where, the great difficulty of forming and preserving free institutions. To guard against the unequal action of the laws, when applied to dissimilar and opposing interests, is, in fact, what mainly renders a constitution indispensable; to overlook which, in reasoning on our constitution, would be to omit the principal element, by which to determine its character. Were there no contrariety of interest, nothing would be more simple and easy than to form and preserve free institutions. The right of suffrage alone would be a sufficient guaranty. It is the conflict of opposing interests which render it the most difficult work of man.

Where the diversity of interests exists in separate and distinct classes of the community, as in the case in England, and was formerly the case in Sparta, Rome, and most of the free states of antiquity, the rational constitutional provision is, that each should be represented in the government, as a separate estate, with a distinct voice, and a negative on the acts of its co-estates, in order to check their encroachments. In England, the constitution has assumed expressly this form; while in the governments of Sparta and Rome the same thing was effected under different but not much less efficacious forms. The perfection of their organization, in this particular, was that which gave to the constitution of these renowned states all of their celebrity, which secured their liberties for so many centuries and raised them to so great a height of power and prosperity. Indeed, a constitutional provision given to the great and separate interests of the community the right of self-protection, must appear to those who will duly reflect on the subject, not less essential to the preservation of liberty, than the right of suffrage itself—they in fact have a common object, to effect which, the one is as necessary as the other; to secure responsibili'y that is, that those who make and execute the laws should be accountable to those, on whom the laws in reality operate; the only solid and durable foundation of liberty. If without the right of suffrage, our rulers would oppress us, so, without the right of self-protection, the major would equally oppress the minor interests of the community. The absence of the former would make the governed the slaves of the rulers, and of the latter, the feebler interests the victim of the stronger.

Happily for us, we have no artificial and separate classes of society. We have wisely exploded all such distinctions; but we are not, on that account, exempt from all contrariety of interests, as the present distracted and dangerous condition of our country, unfortunately, but too clearly proves. With us they are almost exclusively geographical, resulting mainly from difference of climate, soil, situation, industry, and production, but are not, therefore, less necessary to be protected by an adequate constitutional provision, than where the distinct interests exist in seperate classes. The necessity is, in truth greater, as such separate and dissimilar geographical interests are more liable to come into conflict, and more dangerous when in that state, than those of any other description; so much so that ours is the first instance on record, where they have not formed in an extensive territory separate and independent communities, or subjected the whole to despotic sway—That such may not be our unhappy fate also, must be the sincere prayer of every lover of his country.

So numerous and diversified are the interests of our country, that they could not be fairly represented in a single government, organized so as to give to each great and leading interest, a separate and distinct voice, as in the governments to which I have referred. A plan was adopted better suited to our situation, but perfectly novel in its character. The powers of the government were divided not as heretofore, in reference to classes, but geographically. One general government was formed for the whole, to which was delegated all the powers supposed to be necessary to regulate the interests common to all of the states, leaving others subject to the separate control of the states, being from their local and peculiar character, such, that they could not be subject to the will of the majority of the whole union, without the certain hazard of injustice and oppression. It was thus that the interests of the whole were subjected as they ought to be to the will of the whole while the peculiar and local interests were left under the control of the states separately, to whose custody only, they could be safely confided. This distribution of power settled solemnly by a constitutional compact, to which all the states are parties, constitutes the peculiar character and excellence of our political system. It is truly and emphatically American, without example or parallel.

To realize its perfection, we must view the general government and the states as a whole; each in its proper sphere, sovereign and independent, each perfectly adapted to their respective objects; the states acting separately, representing and protecting the local and peculiar interests; acting jointly through one general government, with the weight respectively assigned to each by the constitution, representing and protecting the interests of the whole; and thus perfecting, by an admirable but simple arrangement, the great principle of representation and responsibility, without which no government can be free or just. To preserve this sacred distribution, as originally settled, by coercing each to move in its prescribed orb, is the great and difficult problem, on the solution of which, the duration of our constitution, of our union, and in all probability, our liberty depends. How is this to be effected?

The question is new when applied to our peculiar political organization, where the separate and conflicting interests of society are represented by distinct, but connected governments; but is in reality an old question under a new form, long since perfectly solved. Whenever separate and dissimilar interests have been separately represented in any government; whenever the sovereign power has been divided in its exercise, the experience and wisdom of ages have devised but one mode, by which such political organization can be preserved; the mode adopted in England and by all governments ancient and modern, blessed with constitutions deserving to be called free; to give to each co-estate the right to judge of its powers, with a negative, or veto on the acts of the others, in order to protect against encroachments, the interest it particularly represents; a principle which all of our constitutions recognize in the distribution of power among their respective departments, as essential to maintain the independence of each, but which to all, who will duly reflect on the subject, must appear, far more essential, for the same object in that great and fundamental distribution of powers between the states and the general government. So essential is the principle that to withold the right from either, where the sovereign power is divided, is in fact to annul the division itself, and to consolidate in the one, left in the exclusive possession of the right, all of the powers of the government; for it is not possible to distinguish, practically, between a government, having all power and the one having the right to take what power it pleases. Nor does it in the least vary the principle, whether the distribution of power be between co-estates, as in England, or between distinctly organized, but connected governments, as with us. The reason is the same in both cases, while the necessity is greater in our case, as the danger of conflict is greater, where the interests of a society are divided geographically, than in any other, as has already been shown.

These truths do seem to me to be incontrovertible, and I am at a loss to understand how any one who has maturely reflected on the nature of our institutions, or who has read history, or studied the principles of free governments to any purpose, can call them in question. The explanation must, it appears to me, be sought in the fact, that in every free state, there are those who look more to the necessity of maintaining power than guarding against its abuses. I do not intend reproach, but simply to state a fact, apparently necessary, to explain the contrariety of opinions among the intelligent, where the abstract consideration of the subject would seem scarcely to admit of doubt. If such be the true cause, I must think the fear of weakening the government too much in this case to be to a great measure unfounded, or, at least, that the danger is much less from that, than the opposite side. I do not deny that a power of so high a nature may be abused by a state; but, when I reflect that the states unanimously called the general government into existence with all of its powers, which they freely surrendered on their part, under the conviction that their common peace, safety and prosperity required it; that they are bound together by a common origin, and the recollection of common suffering, and a common triumph in the great and splendid achievement of their independence; and that the strongest feelings of our nature, and among them the love of national power and distinction, are on the side of the union; it does seem to me, that the fear, which would strip the states of their sovereignty, and degrade them, in fact, to mere dependent corporations, lest they should abuse a right indispensable to the peaceable protection of those interests, which they reserved under their own peculiar guardianship, when they created the general government, is unnatural and unreasonable. If those who voluntarily created the system, cannot be trusted to preserve it, what power can?

So far from extreme danger, I hold that there never was a free state, in which this great conservative principle, indispensable in all, was ever so safely lodged. In others, when the co-estates, representing the dissimilar and conflicting interests of the community, came into contact, the only alternative was compromise, submission, or force. Not so in ours. Should the general government and a state come into conflict, we have a higher remedy: the power which called the general government into existence, which gave it all of its authority, and can enlarge, contract, or abolish its powers at its pleasure, may be invoked. The states themselves may be appealed to, three-fourths of which, in fact, form a power, whose decrees are the constitution itself, and whose voice can silence all discontent. The utmost extent, then, of the power is, that a state, acting in its sovereign capacity, as one of the parties to the constitutional compact, may compel the government, created by that compact, to submit a question touching its infraction, to the parties who created it; to avoid the supposed dangers of which, it is proposed to resort to the novel, the hazardous, and I must add, fatal project of giving to the general government the sole and final right of interpreting the constitution, thereby reversing the whole system, making that instrument the creature of its will, instead of a rule of action impressed on it at its creation, and annihilating, in fact, the authority, which imposed it, and from which the government itself derives its existence.

That such would be the result, were the right in question vested in the legislative or executive branch of the government, is conceded by all. No one has been so hardy as to assert, that congress or the president ought to have the right, or to deny, that, if vested finally and exclusively in either, the consequences which I have stated would not necessarily follow; but its advocates have been reconciled to the doctrine, on the supposition, that there is one department of the general government which, from its peculiar organization, affords an independent tribunal through which the government may exercise the high authority, which is the subject of consideration, with perfect safety to all.

I yield, I trust, to few, in my attachment to the judiciary department. I am fully sensible of its importance, and would maintain it to the fullest extent in its constitutional powers and independence; but it is impossible for me to believe, that it was ever intended by the constitution, that it should exercise the power in question, or that it is competent to do so, and, if it were, that it would be a safe depository of the power.

Its powers are judical and not political, and are expressly confined by the constitution "to all cases in law and equity under this constitution, the laws of the U. States, and the treaties made or which shall be made, under its authority;" and which I have high authority in asserting, excludes political questions, and comprehends those only where these are parties amenable to the process of the court.* Nor is its incompetency less clear than its want of constitutional authority. There may be many and the most dangerous infractions on the part of congress, of which, it is conceded by all, the court, as a judicial tribunal, cannot, from its nature, take cognizance. The tariff itself is a strong case in point; and the reason applies equally to all others, where congress perverts a power from an object intended to one not intended—the most insidious and dangerous of all the infractions; and which may be extended to all of its powers, more especially to the taxing and appropriating. But, supposing it competent to take cognizance of all infractions of every description, the insuperable objection still remains, that it would not be a safe tribunal to exercise the power in question.

It is an universal and fundamental political principle, that the power to protect, can safely be confided only to those interested in protecting, or their responsible agents, a maxim not less true in private than in public affairs. The danger in our system, is, that the general government, which represents the interests of the whole, may encroach on the states, which represent the peculiar and local interests, or that the latter may encroach on the former. In examining this point, we ought not to forget, that the government through all its departments, judicial, as well as others, is administered by delegated and responsible agents; and that the power which really controls ultimately all the movements is not in the agents but those who elect or appoint them. To understand then its real character, and what would be the action of the system in any supposable case, we must raise our view from the mere agents, to this high controlling power which finally impels every movement of the machine. By doing so, we shall find all under the control of the will of a majority, compounded of a majority of the states, taken as corporate bodies, and the majority of the people of the states estimated in federal numbers. These united constitute the real and final power, which impels and directs the movements of the general government. The majority of the states elect the majority of the senate; of the people of the states, that of the house of representatives; the two united, the president; and the president and a majority of the senate appoint the judges; a majority of whom, and a majority of the senate and the house with the president, really exercise all of the powers of the government, with the exception of the cases where the constitution requires a greater number than a majority. The judges are, in fact, as truly the judicial representatives of this united majority, as the majority of congress itself, or the president, is its legislative or executive representative; and to confide the power to the judiciary to determine finally and conclusively, what powers are delegated, and what reserved, would be in reality to confide it to the majority, whose agents they are, and by whom they can be controlled in various ways; and, of course to subject, (against the fundamental principle of our system, and all sound political reasoning), the reserved powers of the states, with all of the local and peculiar interests, they were intended to protect; to the will of the very majority, against which the protection was intended. Nor will the tenure by which the judges hold their office, however valuable the provision in many other respects, materially vary the case. Its highest possible effect would be to retard and not finally to resist, the will of a dominant majority.

But it is useless to multiply arguments. Were it possible that reason could settle a question where the passions and interests of men are concerned, this point would have been long since settled forever, by the state of Virginia. The report of her legislature, to which I have already referred, has really, in my opinion, placed it beyond controversy. Speaking in reference to this subject, it says, "it has been objected" (to the right of a state to interpose for the protection of her reserved rights) "that the judicial authority is to be regarded as the sole expositor of the constitution; on this objection it might be observed, first, that there may be instances of usurped powers, which the forms of the constitution could never draw within the control of the judicial department; secondly, that if the decision of the judiciary be raised above the sovereign parties to the constitution, the decisions of the other departments, not carried by the forms of the constitution before the judiciary, must be equally authoritative and final with the decision of that department. But the proper answer to the objection is, that the resolution of the general assembly relates to those great and extraordinary cases, in which all of the forms of the constitution may prove ineffectual against infractions dangerous to the essential rights of the parties to it. The resolution supposes that dangerous powers, not delegated, may not only be usurped and executed by the other departments, but that the judicial department may also exercise or sanction dangerous powers beyond the grant of the constitution, and consequently that the ultimate right of the parties to the constitution to judge whether the compact has been dangerously violated, must extend to violations by one delegated authority, as well as by another—by the judiciary, as well as by the executive or legislative."

Against these conclusive arguments, as they seem to me, it is objected, that if one party has the right to judge of infractions of the constitution, so has the other, and that, consequently, in cases of contested powers between a state and the general government, each would have a right to maintain its opinion, as is the case when sovereign powers differ in the construction of treaties or compacts, and that, of course, it would come to be a mere question of force. The error is in the assumption that the general government is a party to the constitutional compact. The states, as has been shown, formed the compact, acting as sovereign and independent communities. The general government is but its creature; and, though in reality a government with all the rights and authority which belong to any other government, within the orb of its powers, it is, nevertheless, a government emanating from a compact between sovereigns, and partaking, in its nature and object, of the character of a joint commission; appointed to superintend and administer the interests in which all are jointly concerned, but having, beyond its proper sphere, no more power than if it did not exist. To deny this would be to deny the most incontestible facts, and the clearest conclusions; while to acknowledge its truth is to destroy utterly the objection, that the appeal would be to force, in the case supposed. For if each party has a right to judge, then, under our system of government, the final cognizance of a question of contested power would be in the states, and not in the general government. It would be the duty of the latter, as in all similar cases of a contest between one or more of the principals and a joint commission or agency, to refer the contest to the principals themselves, such are the plain dictates of reason and analogy both. On no sound principle can the agents have a right to final cognizance, as against the principals, much less to use force against them, to maintain their construction of their powers. Such a right would be monstrous; and has never, heretofore, been claimed in similar cases.

*I refer to the authority of chief justice Marshall, in the case of Jonathan Robbins. I have not been able to refer to the speech, and speak from memory.

That the doctrine is applicable to the case of a contested power between the states and the general government, we have the authority not only of reason and analogy, but of the distinguished statesmen already referred to. Mr. Jefferson, at a late period of his life, after long experience and mature reflection, says, "with respect to our state and federal governments, I do not think their relations are correctly understood by foreigners. They suppose the former subordinate to the latter. This is not the case. They are co-ordinate departments of one simple and integral whole. But you may ask if the two departments should claim each the same subject of power, where is the umpire to decide between them? In cases of little urgency or importance, the prudence of both parties will keep them aloof from the questionable ground; but if it can neither be avoided nor compromised, a convention of the states must be called, to ascribe the doubtful power to that department which they may think best." It is thus that our constitution, by authorising amendments, and by prescribing the authority and mode of making them, has, by a simple contrivance, with its characteristic wisdom, provided a power which in the last resort supersedes effectually the necessity, and even the pretext for force; a power to which none can fairly object; with which the interests of all are safe; which can definitely close all controversies in the only effectual mode, by freeing the compact of every defect and uncertainty, by an amendment of the instrument itself. It is impossible for human wisdom, in a system like ours, to devise another mode which shall be safe and effectual, and at the same time consistent with what are the relations and acknowledged powers of the two great departments of our government. It gives a beauty and security peculiar to our system, which, if duly appreciated, will transmit its blessings to the remotest generations; but if not, our splendid anticipation of the future will prove but an empty dream. Stripped of all its covering and the naked question is, whether ours is a federal or a consolidated government; a constitutional or absolute one; a government resting ultimately on the solid basis of the sovereignty of the states, or on the unrestrained will of a majority; a form of government, as in all other unlimited ones, in which injustice and violence and force must finally prevail. Let it never be forgotten that where the majority rules, the minority is the subject; and that if we should absurdly attribute to the former, the exclusive right of construing the constitution, there would be in fact between the sovereign and the subject, under such a government, no constitution; or at least nothing deserving the name, or serving the legitimate object of so sacred an instrument.

How the states are to exercise this high power of interposition, which constitutes so essential a portion of their reserved rights, that it cannot be delegated without an entire surrender of their sovereignty, and converting our system from a federal into a consolidated government, is a question that the states only are competent to determine. The arguments which prove that they possess the power, equally prove, that they are, in the language of Jefferson, "the rightful judges of the mode and measure of redress." But the spirit of forbearance, as well as the nature of the right itself, forbids a recourse to it, except in cases of dangerous infractions of the constitution; and then only in the last resort, when all reasonable hope of relief from the ordinary action of the government has failed; when, if the right to interpose did not exist, the alternative would be submission and oppression on one side, or resistance by force on the other. That our system should afford, in such extreme cases, an intermediate point between these dire alternatives, by which the government may be brought to a pause, and thereby an interval obtained to compromise differences, or, if impracticable, be compelled to submit the question to a constitutional adjustment, through an appeal to the states themselves, is an evidence of its high wisdom; an element not, as is supposed by some, of weakness, but of strength; not of anarchy or revolution, but of peace and safety. Its general recognition would of itself in a great measure, if not altogether, supersede the necessity of its exercise, by impressing on the movements of the government, that moderation and justice so essential to harmony and peace, in a country of such vast extent, and diversity of interests as ours; and would, if controversy should come, turn the resentment of the aggrieved, from the system to those who had abused its powers, (a point all important), and cause them to seek redress, not in revolution or overthrow, but in reformation. It is, in fact, properly understood, a substitute where the alternative would be force, tending to prevent, and if that fails, to correct peaceably the aberrations to which all political systems are liable, and which, if permitted to accumulate without correction, must finally end in a general catastrophe.

I have now said what I intended in reference to the abstract question of the relation of the states to the general government, and would here conclude, did I not believe that a more general statement on an abstract question, without including that which may have caused its agitation, would be considered by many imperfect and unsatisfactory. Feeling that such would be justly the case, I am compelled, reluctantly, to touch on the tariff, so far at least as may be necessary to illustrate the opinions which I have already advanced. Anxious, however, to intrude as little as possible on the public attention, I will be as brief as possible; and with that view, will, as far as may be consistent with my object, avoid all debateable topics.

Whatever diversity of opinion may exist in relation to the principle or the effect on the productive industry of the country, of the present, or any other tariff of protection, there are certain political consequences flowing from the present, which none can doubt, and all must deplore. It would be in vain to attempt to conceal that it has divided the country into two great geographical divisions, and arrayed them against each other, in opinion at least, if not interests also, on some of the most vital of political subjects; on its finance, its commerce, and its industry, subjects calculated, above all others, in time of peace, to produce excitement, and in relation to which the tariff has placed the sections in question in deep and dangerous conflict. If there be any point on which the (I was going to say southern section, but to avoid, as far as possible, the painful feelings such discussions are calculated to excite, I shall say) weaker of the two sections is unanimous, it is that its prosperity depends, in a great measure, on free trade, light taxes, economical, and, as far as possible, equal disbursements of the public revenue, and an unshackled industry, leaving them to pursue whatever may appear most advantageous to their interests. From the Potomac to the Mississippi there are few, indeed, however divided on other points, who would not, if dependent on their volition, and if they regarded the interest of their particular section only, remove from commerce and industry every shackle, reduce the revenue to the lowest point that the wants of the government fairly required, and restrict the appropriations to the most moderate scale, consistent with the peace, the security, and the engagements of the public; and who do not believe that the opposite system is calculated to throw on them an unequal burthen, to repress their prosperity, and to encroach on their enjoyment.

On all these deeply important measures, the opposite opinion prevails, if not with equal unanimity, with at least a greatly preponderating majority in the other and stronger section; so much so, that no two distinct nations ever entertained more opposite views of policy than these two sections do, on all the important points to which I have referred. Nor is it less certain that this unhappy conflict, flowing directly from the tariff, has extended itself to the halls of legislation, and has converted the deliberations of congress into an annual struggle between the two sections; the stronger to maintain and increase the superiority it has already acquired, and the other to throw off or diminish its burdens: a struggle in which all the noble and generous feelings of patriotism are gradually subsiding into sectional and selfish attachments.* Nor has the effect of this dangerous conflict ended here. It has not only divided the two sections on the important point already stated, but on the deeper and more dangerous questions, the constitutionality of a protective tariff, and the general principles and theory of the constitution itself; the stronger, in order to maintain their superiority, giving a construction to the instrument which the other believes would convert the general government into a consolidated, irresponsible government, with the total destruction of liberty; and the weaker seeing no hope of relief with such assumption of powers, turning its eye to the reserved sovereignty of the states, as the only refuge from oppression. I shall not extend these remarks, as I might, by showing that while the effect of the system of protection was rapidly alienating one section, it was not less rapidly, by its necessary operation, distracting and corrupting the other; and between the two, subjecting the administration to violent and sudden changes, totally inconsistent with all stability and wisdom in the management of the affairs of the nation, of which we already see fearful symptoms. Nor do I deem it necessary to enquire whether this unhappy conflict grows out of true or mistaken views of interest, on either, or both sides. Regarded in either light, it ought to admonish us of the extreme danger to which our system is exposed, and the great moderation and wisdom necessary to preserve it. If it comes from mistaken views—if the interests of the two sections, as affected by the tariff, be really the same, and the system, instead of acting unequally, in reality diffuses equal blessings, and imposes equal burdens on every part, it ought to teach us how liable those who are differently situated, and who view their interests under different aspects, are to come to different conclusions, even when their interests are strictly the same; and consequently, with what extreme caution any system of policy ought to be adopted, and with what a spirit of moderation pursued, in a country of such great extent and diversity as ours. But if, on the contrary, the conflict springs really from contrariety of interests—if the burden be on the one side, and the benefit on the other, then are we taught a lesson not less important, how little regard we have for the interests of others, while in pursuit of our own, or, at least, how apt we are to consider our own interest the interest of all others; and of course, how great the danger in a country of such acknowledged diversity of interests, of the oppression of the feeble by the stronger interest, and in consequence of it, of the most fatal sectional conflicts. But which ever may be the cause, the real or supposed diversity of interest, it cannot be doubted that the political consequences of the prohibitory system, be its effects in other respects beneficial or otherwise, are really such as I have stated; nor can it be doubted that a conflict between the great sections on questions so vitally important, indicates a condition of the country so distempered and dangerous, as to demand the most serious and prompt attention. It is only when we come to consider of the remedy, that, under the aspect I am viewing the subject, there can be, among the informed and considerate, any diversity of opinion.

Those who have not duly reflected on its dangerous and inveterate character, suppose that the disease will cure itself; that events ought to be left to take their own course; and that experience, in a short time, will prove that the interest of the whole community is the same, in reference to the tariff; or, at least, whatever diversity there may now be, time will assimilate. Such has been their language from the beginning, but unfortunately the progress of events has been the reverse. The country is now more divided than in 1824, and then more than in 1816. The majority may have increased, but the opposite sides are beyond dispute more determined and exerted, than in any preceding period. Formerly the system was resisted mainly, as inexpedient: but now, as unconstitutional, unequal, unjust, and oppressive. Then relief was sought exclusively from the general government; but, now, many driven to despair, are raising their eyes to the reserved sovereignty of the states, as the only refuge. If we turn from the past and present, to the future, we shall find nothing to lessen, but much to aggravate the danger. The increasing embarrassment and distress of the staple states, the growing conviction, from experience, that they are caused by the prohibitory system principally, and that, under its continued operation, their present pursuits must become profitless, and with a conviction that their great and peculiar agricultural capital, cannot be diverted from its ancient and hereditary channels, without ruinous losses, all concur to increase, instead of dispelling the gloom, that hangs over the future. In fact, to those who will duly reflect on the subject, the hope that the disease will cure itself, must appear perfectly illusory. The question is in reality one between the exporting and non-exporting interests of the country. Were there no exports there would be no tariff; it would be perfectly useless. On the contrary, so long as there are states which raise the great agricultural staples, with the view of obtaining their supplies, and which must depend on the general market of the world for their sales, the conflict must remain, if the system should continue, and the disease become more and more inveterate. Their interest, and that of those who, by high duties, would confine the purchase of their supplies to the general market, must from the nature of things, in reference to the tariff, be in conflict. Till then, we cease to raise the great staples, cotton, rice, and tobacco, for the same markets; and till we can find some other profitable investment for the immense amount of capital and labor now employed in their production, the present unhappy and dangerous conflict cannot terminate, unless with the prohibitory system itself.

In the meantime, while idly waiting for its termination through its own action, the progress of events in another quarter is rapidly bringing the contest to an immediate and decisive issue. We are fast approaching a period very novel in the history of nations, and bearing directly and powerfully on the point under consideration —the final payment of a long standing funded debt; a period that cannot be sensibly retarded, or the natural consequences of it eluded, without proving disastrous to those who may attempt either, if not to the country itself. When it arrives, the government would find itself in possession of a surplus revenue of 10,000,000 or 12,000,000 of dollars, if not previously disposed of, which presents the important question, what previous disposition ought to be made—a question that must press ungently for decision at the very next session of congress. It cannot be delayed longer, without the most distracting and dangerous consequences.

The honest and obvious course is, to prevent the accumulation of the surplus in the treasury, by a timely and judicious reduction of the imposts; and thereby to leave the money in the pockets of those who made it, and from whom it cannot be honestly nor constitution-

*The system, if continued, must end, not only in subjecting the industry and property of the weaker section to the control of the stronger, but in proscription and political disfranchisement. It must finally control elections and appointments to offices, as well as acts of legislation, to the great increase of the feelings of animosity, and of the fatal tendency to a complete alienation between the sections.

ally taken, unless required by the fair and legitimate wants of the government. If, neglecting a disposition so obvious and just, the government should attempt to keep up the present high duties, when the money was no longer wanted, or to dispose of this immense surplus by enlarging the old, or devising new schemes of appropriations, or finding that to be impossible, it should adopt the most dangerous, unconstitutional, and absurd project ever devised by any government, of dividing the surplus among the states, (a project which, if carried into execution, could not fail to create an antagonist interest between the states and general government, on all questions of appropriations, which would certainly end in reducing the latter to a mere office of collection and distribution), either of these modes would be considered by the section suffering under the present high duties, as a fixed determination to perpetuate forever what it considers the present unequal, unconstitutional, and oppressive burthen; and from that moment, it would cease to look to the general government for relief. This deeply interesting period, which must prove so disastrous should a wrong direction be given, but so fortunate and glorious should a right one, is just at hand. The work must commence at the next session, as I have stated, or be left undone, or at least be badly done. The succeeding session would be too short, and too much agitated by the presidential contest, to afford the requisite leisure and calmness; and the one succeeding would find the country in the midst of the crisis, when it would be too late to prevent an accumulation of the surplus, which I hazard nothing in saying, judging from the nature of men and government, if once permitted to accumulate, would create an interest strong enough to perpetuate itself, supported as it would be by others, so numerous and powerful; and thus would pass away a moment never to be quietly recalled; so precious, if properly used, to lighten the public burden—to equalize the action of the government—to restore harmony and peace—and to present to the world the illustrious example, which could not fail to prove most favorable to the great cause of liberty every where—of a nation the freest, and at the same time the best and most cheaply governed—of the highest earthly blessing, at the least possible sacrifice.

To answer in the negative, would be to assert that our union has utterly failed; and that the opinion, so common before the adoption of our constitution, that a free government could not be practically extended over a large country, was correct. And that ours had been destroyed by giving it limits so great, as to comprehend not only dissimilar, but irreconcilable interests. I am not prepared to admit a conclusion, that would cast so deep a shade on the future, and that would falsify all the glorious anticipations of our ancestors while it would so greatly lessen their high reputation for wisdom. Nothing but the clearest demonstration, founded on actual experience, will ever force me to a conclusion so abhorrent to all of my feelings. As strongly as I am impressed with the great dissimilarity, and, I must add, as truth compels me to do, contrariety of interests in our country, resulting from the causes already indicated, and which are so great, that they cannot be subjected to the unchecked will of a majority of the whole, without defeating the great end of government—and without which it is a curse—justice: yet I see in the union, as ordained by the constitution, the means, if wisely used, not only of reconciling all diversities, but also the means and the only effectual one, of securing to us justice, peace, and security, at home and abroad, and with them that national power and renown, the love of which, Providence has implanted for wise purposes so deeply in the human heart; in all of which great objects every portion of our country, widely extended and diversified as it is, has a common and identical interest. If we have the wisdom to place a proper relative estimate on these more elevated and durable blessings, the present and every other conflict of like character, may be readily terminated; but if, reversing the scale, each section should put a higher estimate on its immediate and peculiar gains; and, acting in that spirit, should push favorite measures of mere policy, without regard to peace, harmony, or justice, our sectional conflicts would then, indeed, without some constitutional check, become interminable, except by the dissolution of the union itself. That we have, in fact, so reversed the estimate, is too certain to be doubted; and the result is our present distempered and dangerous condition. The cure must commence in the correction of the error, and not to admit we have erred, would be the worst possible symptom. It would prove the disease to be incurable through the regular and ordinary process of legislation; and would compel, finally, a resort to extraordinary, but I still trust, not only constitutional, but safe remedies.

No one would more sincerely rejoice than myself, to see the remedy applied from the quarter where it could be most easily and regularly done. It is the only way by which those who think that it is the only quarter from which it can constitutionally come, can possibly sustain their opinion. To omit the application by the general government, would compel even them to admit the truth of the opposite opinion; or force them to abandon our political system in despair: while, on the other hand, all their enlightened and patriotic opponents would rejoice at such evidence of moderation and wisdom on the part of the general government, as would supersede a resort to what they believe to be the higher powers of our political system, as indicating a sounder state of public sentiment than has ever heretofore existed in any country, and thus affording the highest possible assurance of the perpetuation of our glorious institutions to the latest generation. For, as a people advanced in knowledge, in the same degree they may dispense with mere artificial restrictions in their government: and we may imagine, (but dare not expect to see it), a state of intelligence so universal and high, that all the guards of liberty may be dispensed with, except an enlightened public opinion, acting through the right of suffrage. But it pre-supposes a state, where every class and every section of the community are capable of estimating the effects of every measure, not only as it may affect itself, but every other class and section; and of fully realizing the sublime truth, that the highest and wisest policy consists in maintaining justice, and promoting peace and harmony; and that, compared to these, schemes of mere gain are but trash and dross. I fear experience has already proved that we are far removed from such a state, and that we must consequently rely on the old and clumsy, but approved mode of checking power, in order to prevent, or correct abuses; but I do trust, that, though far from perfect, we are at least so much so, as to be capable of remedying the present disorder in the ordinary way; and thus to prove, that with us public opinion is so enlightened, and our political machine so perfect, as rarely to require for its preservation the intervention of the power that created it. How is this to be effected?

The application may be painful, but the remedy, I conceive, is certain and simple. There is but one effectual cure: an honest reduction of the duties to a fair system of revenue, adapted to the just and constitutional wants of the government. Nothing short of this will restore the country to peace, harmony, and mutual affection. There is already a deep and growing conviction in a large section of the country, that the impost, even as a revenue system, is extremely unequal, and that it is mainly paid by those who furnish the means of paying the foreign exchanges of the country, on which it is laid; and that the case is not varied, taking into the estimate the entire action of the system, whether the producer or consumer pays in the first instance.

I do not propose to enter formally into the discussion of a point so complex and contested; but as it has necessarily a strong practical bearing on the subject under consideration, in all its relations, I cannot pass it without a few general and brief remarks.

If the producer in reality pays, none will doubt but the burden would mainly fall on the section it is supposed to do. The theory that the consumer pays in the first instance, renders the proposition more complex, and will require, in order to understand where the burden in reality ultimately falls, on that supposition, to consider the protective, or, as its friends call it, the American System, under its three-fold aspect, of taxation, of protection, and of distribution; or, as performing at the same time the several functions of giving a revenue to the government, of affording protection to certain branches of domestic industry, and furnishing the means to congress of distributing large sums through its appropriations; all of which are so blended in their effects, that it is impossible to understand its true operation, without taking the whole into the estimate.

Admitting then, as supposed, that he who consumes the article pays the tax in the increased price, and that the burden falls wholly on the consumers, without affecting the producers as a class, (which, by the by, is far from being true, except in the single case, if there be such a one, where the producers have a monopoly of an article, so indispensable to life, that the quantity consumed cannot be affected by any increase of price), and that considered in the light of a tax, merely, the impost duties fall equally on every section, in proportion to its population—still, when combined with its other effects, the burden it imposes, as a tax, may be so transferred from one, to the other, as to take it from one and place it wholly on the other. Let us apply the remark first to its operation as a system of protection.

The tendency of the tax, or duty, on the imported article is, not only to raise its price, but also, in the same proportion, that of the domestic article of the same kind, for which purpose, when intended for protection, it is in fact laid; and of course, in determining where the system ultimately places the burden in reality, this effect also, must be taken into the estimate. If one of the sections exclusively produces such domestic articles, and the other purchases them from it, then it is clear, that to the amount of such increased prices, the tax or duty, on the consumption of the foreign articles, would be transferred from the section producing the domestic articles to the one that purchased and consumed them, unless the latter in turn be indemnified by the increased price of the objects of its industry, which none will venture to assert to be the case with the great staples of the country, which form the basis of our exports, the price of which is regulated by the foreign and not the domestic market. To those who grow them, the increased price of the foreign and domestic articles both, in consequence of the duty on the former, is in reality, and in the strictest sense, a tax, while it is clear that the increased price of the latter acts as a bounty to the section producing them, and that as the amount of such increased prices, on what it sells to the other section, is greater or less, than the duty it pays on the imported articles, the system will in fact operate as a bounty or tax; if greater, the difference would be a bounty; if less a tax.

Again, the operation may be equal in every other respect, and yet the pressure of the system, relatively, on the two sections, be rendered very unequal by the appropriations, or distribution. If each section receives back what it paid into the treasury, the equality, if it previously existed, will continue; but if one receives back less, and the other proportionally more than it paid, then the difference in relation to the sections will be to the former a loss, and to the latter a gain; and the system in this aspect would operate to the amount of the difference, as a contribution from the one receiving less than it paid, to the other that receives more. Such would be incontestibly its general effects, taken in all its different aspects, even on the theory supposed to be most favorable to prove the equal action of the system, that the consumer pays in the first instance the whole amount of the tax.

To show how, on this supposition, the burden and advantages of the system would actually distribute themselves between the sections, would carry me too far into details; but I feel assured, after full and careful examination, that they are such as to explain, what otherwise would seem inexplicable, that one section should consider its repeal a calamity, and the other, a blessing; and that such opposite views should be taken by them, as to place them in a state of determined conflict, in relation to the great fiscal and commercial interests of the country. Indeed, were there no satisfactory explanation, the opposite views that prevail in the two sections as to the effects of the system, ought to satisfy all of its unequal action. There can be no safer or more certain rule than to suppose each portion of the country equally capable of understanding their respective interests; and that each is a much better judge of the effects of any system of measures on its peculiar interest, than the other can possibly be.

But whether the opinion of its unequal action be correct or erroneous, nothing can be more certain than that the impression is widely extending itself, that the system, under all its modifications, is essentially unequal; and if to that be added, a conviction still deeper and more universal, that every duty imposed for the purpose of protection, is not only unequal, but also unconstitutional, it would be a fatal error to suppose that any remedy short of that which I have stated, can heal our political disorders.

In order to understand more fully the difficulty of adjusting this unhappy contest on any other ground, it may not be improper to present a general view of the constitutional objection, that it may be clearly seen how hopeless it is to expect that it can be yielded by those who have embraced it. They believe that all the powers vested by the constitution in congress, are not only restricted by the limitations expressly imposed, but also by the nature and object of the powers themselves. Thus, though the power to impose duties on imports be granted in general terms, without any other express limitations, but that they shall be equal, and no preference shall be given to the ports of one state over those of another, yet, as being a portion of the taxing power, given with the view of raising revenue, it is, from its nature, restricted to that object as much so as if the convention had expressly so limited it; and that to use it to effect any other purpose, not specified in the constitution, is an infraction of the instrument in its most dangerous form; an infraction by perversion, more easily made, and more difficult to resist, than any other. The same view is believed to be applicable to the power of of regulating commerce, as well as all the other powers. To surrender this important principle, it is conceived, would be to surrender all power, and to render the government unlimited and despotic; and to yield it up, in relation to the particular power in question, would be in fact to surrender the control of the whole industry and capital of the country to the general government, and would end in placing the weaker section in a colonial relation with the stronger. For nothing are more dissimilar in their nature, or may be more unequally affected by the same laws, than different descriptions of labor and property; and if taxes, by increasing the amount and changing the intent only, may be perverted, in fact, into a system of penalties and rewards, it would give all the power that could be desired, to subject the labor and property of the minority to the will of the majority, to be regulated without regarding the interest of the former, in subserviency to the will of the latter. Thus thinking, it would seem unreasonable to expect that any adjustment, based on the recognition of the correctness of a construction of the constitution, which would admit the exercise of such a power, would satisfy the weaker of the two sections, particularly with its peculiar industry and property, which experience has shewn may be so injuriously affected by its exercise. Thus much for one side.

The just claims of the other ought to be equally respected. Whatever excitement the system has justly caused in certain portions of our country, I hope and believe all will concede that the change should be made with the least possible detriment to the interests of those who may be liable to be affected by it, consistently with what is justly due to others and the principles of the constitution. To effect this, will require the kindest spirit of conciliation, and the utmost skill; but, even with these, it will be impossible to make the transition, without a shock greater or less; though I trust, if judiciously effected, it will not be without many compensating advantages. That there will be some such, cannot be doubted. It will, at least, be followed by greater stability, and will tend to harmonize the manufacturing with all of the other great interests of the country, and bind the whole in mutual affection. But these are not all. Another advantage, of essential importance to the ultimate prosperity of our manufacturing industry will follow. It will cheapen production; and, in that view, the loss of any one branch, will be nothing like in proportion to the reduction of duty on that particular branch. Every reduction will, in fact, operate as a bounty to every other branch, except the one reduced; and thus the effect of a general reduction will be to cheapen, universally, the price of production, by cheapening living, wages, and materials; so as to give, if not equal profits after the reduction, profits by no means reduced proportionally to the duties; an effect, which, as it regards the foreign market, is of the utmost importance. It must be apparent, on reflection, that the means adopted to secure the home market, for our manufacturers are precisely the opposite of those necessary to obtain the foreign. In the former, the increased expense of production in consequence of a system of protection may be more than compensated by the increased price at home of the article protected; but in the latter this advantage is lost, and as there is no other corresponding compensation, the increased cost of production must be a dead loss in the foreign market. But whether these advantages, and many others, that might be mentioned, will ultimately compensate to the full extent, or not, the loss to the manufacturers on the reduction of the duties, certain it is, that we have approached a point at which a great change cannot be much longer delayed; and that the more promptly it may be met, the less excitement there will be and the greater leisure and calmness for a cautious and skilful operation in making the translation; and which it becomes those more immediately interested duly to consider. Nor ought they to overlook, in considering the question, the different character of the claims of the two sides. The one asks from the government no advantage, but simply to be let alone in the undisturbed possession of their natural advantages, and to secure which, as far as was consistent with the other objects of the constitution, was one of their leading motives in entering into the union; while the other side claims, for the advancement of their prosperity, the positive interference of the government. In such cases, on every principle of fairness and justice, such interference ought to be restrained within limits strictly compatible with the natural advantages of the other. He who, looking to all of the causes in operation; the near approach of the final payment of the public debt, the growing disaffection and resistance to the system, in so large a section of the country, the deeper principles on which opposition to it is gradually turning, must be, indeed, infatuated, not to see a great change is unavoidable; and that the attempt to elude or much longer delay it, must finally but increase the shock and disastrous consequences which may follow.

In forming the opinions I have expressed, I have not been actuated by an unkind feeling towards our manufacturing interest. I now am, and ever have been, decidedly friendly to them, though I cannot concur in all of the measures which have been adopted to advance them. I believe considerations higher than any question of mere pecuniary interest forbids their use. But, subordinate to these higher views of policy, I regard the advancement of mechanical and chemical improvements in the arts with feelings little short of enthusiasm; not only as the prolific source of national and individual wealth, but as the great means of enlarging the domain of man over the material world; and, thereby, of laying the solid foundation of a highly improved condition of society, morally and politically. I fear not that we shall extend our power too far over the great agents of nature; but, on the contrary, I consider such enlargement of our power as tending more certainly and powerfully to better the condition of our race, than any one of the many powerful causes now operating to that result. With these impressions, I not only rejoice at the general progress of the arts in the world, but in their advancement in our own country; and, as far as protection can be incidentally afforded, in the fair and honest exercise of our constitutional powers, I think now, as I have always done, that sound policy connected with the security, independence, and peace of the country, requires them to be protected; but that we cannot go a single step beyond, without jeopardizing our peace, our harmony, and our liberty; considerations of infinitely more importance to us than any measure of mere policy can possibly be.

In thus placing my opinions before the public, I have not been actuated by the expectation of changing the public sentiment. Such a motive, on a question so long agitated, and so beset with feelings of prejudice and interest, would argue, on my part, an insufferable vanity, and a profound ignorance of the human heart. To avoid, as far as possible, the imputation of either, I have confined my statement, on the many and important points on which I have been compelled to touch, to a simple declaration of my opinion, without advancing any other reasons to sustain them, than what appeared to me to be indispensable to the full understanding of my views; and if they should, on any point, be thought to be not clearly and explicitly developed, it will, I trust, be attributed to solicitude to avoid the imputations to which I have alluded, and not from any desire to disguise my sentiments, nor the want of arguments and illustrations to maintain positions which so abound in both that it would require a volume to do them any thing like justice. I can only hope that truths, which I feel assured are essentially connected with all that we ought to hold most dear, may not be weakened in the public estimation by the imperfect manner in which I have been, by the object in view, compelled to present them.

With every caution on my part, I dare not hope in taking the step I have, to escape the imputation of improper motives; though I have, without reserve, freely expressed my opinions, not regarding whether they might or might not be popular, I have no reason to believe that they are such as will conciliate public favor, but the opposite; which I greatly regret, as I have ever placed a high estimate on the good opinion of my fellow citizens. But, be that as it may, I shall, at least, be sustained by feelings of conscious rectitude. I have formed my opinions after the most careful and deliberate examination, with all of the aids which my reason and experience could furnish; I have expressed them honestly and fearlessly, regardless of their effects personally; which, however interesting to me individually, are of too little importance to be taken into the estimate, where the liberty and happiness of our country are so vitally involved.

POLITICS OF THE DAY.

[☞The rule long since established must be adhered to. Strictures on col. Johnson's letter to Mr. Ingham will not be admitted, unless sanctioned by the name of a party involved in the matters at issue. It is meant that this rule shall apply in all cases, and to all subjects.]

From the National Intelligencer.

Blue Springs, 2d August, 1831.

Messrs. Gales and Seaton: After having finished the within letter, I discovered in your paper of the 23d ult. that Mr. Ingham had published his letter to me, as well as his statement. You will please, therefore, to publish this letter as my reply, and oblige your ob't. servant,

R. M. JOHNSON.

Dear sir—Yours of the 16th instant was this day received, accompanied by a statement, which, it seems, you have prepared for the public, purporting to contain separate conversations, with the president and myself, relative to an allegation made in the public journals, that general Jackson had authorised a member of congress to require of Messrs. Berrien, Branch, and yourself, and your families, to associate with major Eaton, and his family, under the penalty of being dismissed from office. You refer to two articles in the Globe to justify your appeal to the public, previously to receiving my answer, in which it appeared that I had denied the above allegation, if it had any allusion to me. After the publication of this accusation against general Jackson, I received a letter from a friend, intimating that I was the member of congress to whom allusion was made, and requested to know if I had ever made such a communication. In my answer, I confined myself to the specific accusation thus publicly made against the president, and which is attributable to yourself, and most unequivocally denied that general Jackson ever made such a requisition through me, and as positively denied having ever made such a statement to you. On the contrary, I asserted, and now repeat, I did inform you, in each and every interview, that the president disclaimed any right or intention to interfere in any manner whatever with the regulation of your private or social intercourse.

Thus, in a matter in which I was engaged to serve you and other friends, in a matter of a delicate and highly confidential nature, and in which I succeeded, unexpectedly I found myself presented in the public journals as a witness impeaching one of those friends, and ascribing to him declarations which he never made; and placed in that attitude by you, self-respect and self-defence called upon me to correct that erroneous statement. I cannot, therefore, agree with you, that I did in any degree change my view of the subject in considering it improper in any of the parties to come before the public without the opportunity of comparing our different recollections. But if you feel under any obligations of a personal or political character to come before the public previously, you will find me as ready as yourself to meet any responsibility or difficulty which such a course may produce. Up to this date I have considered my correspondence with you and Mr. Berrien of a character not to be divulged to any one, and have therefore confined it to my own bosom. The object of my first letter to you was to declare frankly and candidly, in the spirit of perfect respect and friendship, that I was misunderstood, provided I was the member of congress to whom reference was made, that you might have it in your power to correct your misapprehension of my communications.

I did not see how it could impeach your character or lessen your reputation to consider and acknowledge it a mistake, without your assumption of the ground that you understood me better than I understood myself and that you could make the public believe so. My standard of confidence and friendship, arising from a personal and political intimacy of twenty years, would have dictated that course to me. Such a course could have been injurious to none, and less troublesome to all. But, so far as I am concerned, I felt perfectly willing to take the course adopted by yourself, of placing our views before the public. I do not, however, think that it will be much benefitted by our labors; and I am further induced to believe that the public will place a less value upon the controversy than you do. In denying the confidential character of our conversation, you urge, as one consideration, that the intimation to invite major Eaton and his family to your large parties was offensive, although you are kind enough to believe that I did not so intend it? If the nature of the suggestion changed in your mind the character of the conversation, and the relation of that perfect friendship which had so long existed, would it not have been magnanimous and generous in you to have advised me of it? I now come to the material point in controversy—whether general Jackson, through me, required of you to invite major Eaton and his family to your large parties. This suggestion was made upon my own responsibility, with an anxious desire more effectually to reconcile the then existing difficulties. But gen. Jackson never did make such a requisition, in any manner whatever, directly or indirectly, nor did I ever intimate to you that he had made such a demand. The complaint made by gen. Jackson against this part of his cabinet was specific, that he had been informed, and was induced to believe, that they were using their influence to have major Eaton and his family excluded from all respectable circles, for the purpose of degrading him, and thus drive him from office; and that the attempt had been made even upon the foreign ministers, and in one case had produced the desired effect. He proposed no mode of accommodation or satisfaction, but declared expressly, that if such was the fact, he would dismiss them from office. He then read to me a paper containing the principles upon which he intended to act; which disclaimed the right to interfere with the social relations of his cabinet. Acting in the capacity of a mutual friend, and obeying the impulse of my own mind, can it be supposed that I would have misrepresented any of the parties, and thus defeat the object I had in view; I should have considered it a gross violation of the ties of that friendship which then existed between us, to have carried to you such a message, as that you should invite major Eaton and his family, or any other persons, to your large or small parties, under a menace of dismissal from office. When the president mentioned this charge of conspiracy, I vindicated you against it. I gave it as my opinion that he was misinformed. To prevent a rupture, I requested the president to postpone calling upon those members of his cabinet till Saturday, that I might have the opportunity of two days to converse with them.

When I made my report to the president, I informed him that I was confirmed in my opinion previously expressed, that he had been misinformed as to the combination and conspiracy. I informed him of your unequivocal and positive denial of the fact, and communicated every thing which transpired between us calculated to satisfy his mind on the subject. It was this report of mine that gave him satisfaction, and changed his feelings and determination—not his ground, as you have supposed; with me he had no ground to change. He had assumed none except that which I have stated; nor did I ever make use of such an expression to you that he had changed his ground. It is true that I informed you that the president was very much excited, but I do not now recollect the precise language used to convey my idea of the excitement. I presume you had the advantage of your private memoranda, when you say I compared him to a roaring lion.

You attribute to me another declaration which I never made—that on our way to Mr. Berrien's I stated that the president had informed me that he would invite Mr. Branch, Mr. Berrien, and yourself, to meet him on the next Friday, when he would inform you of his determination in the presence of Dr. Ely. I never received or communicated such an idea.

The paragraph is substantially correct when that part in reference to Dr. Ely is expunged.

It is true, in some of our various conversations, the name of Dr. Ely was mentioned, but in connection with another part of the subject. The president informed me that when the rumors against maj. Eaton and his family had been opened to him by Dr. Ely, he had invited the accusers to make good their charges, and that they had failed—this is the substance of that part of our conversation in which Dr. Ely's name was mentioned. Again, you say I called at your house about 6 o'clock, when we walked to Mr. Berrien's. The fact is that you called for me at my lodgings about that time, by a previous appointment. This is a mistake in a matter of fact of no great importance, except to show how easily we forget. If we thus differ in matters of fact, how much more liable to differ as to words; and still more as to the time, manner, and circumstances in which these words have been introduced, and still more the precise meaning the speaker wishes to convey to the hearer!

Having thought it important to memorandum our conversation, would it not have given additional proof of your friendship and confidence, and would it not have been an act of justice to me, to have furnished me with it, (so far as I was concerned), that I might have corrected, if necessary, any erroneous impressions which my conversations may have made upon you? The witness in court is often misunderstood by lawyers and jury, and as often called upon to correct the mistake and to explain his meaning; and you have gained little in your desire to be accurate, so far as I am concerned, by failing to present me with your private memoranda; and if now furnished, I dare think that I might put a different construction upon your own notes.

Again: you are incorrect in supposing that I informed you that the president requested me to converse with you and your colleagues. It was my own proposition; and in this you will find I am supported by Mr. Berrien. Nor did I ever say that your families had not returned the call of Mrs. Eaton; and that if they would leave the first card, and open a formal intercourse in that way the president would be satisfied. Such an idea never entered my mind, for I never did know the precise manner in which the social non-intercourse existed between your families, whether cards had ever passed from either or not; and sure I am that the president and myself, never had any conversation on the subject. From first to last my efforts were put forth to reconcile the parties concerned; they were for the time being successful. I have never claimed any merit for what I did: I felt happy, however, that I was in any way instrumental in prolonging the political relations which have since been severed, in which I have had no agency, and which I deeply regretted. Having thus acted, to my great mortification I find myself dragged before the public to vindicate myself against sentiments and conversations imputed to me by a part of those friends, without the opportunity of explaining to them their misapprehension of what I did say.

Without adverting to any further inaccuracies of your letter and statement, I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. M. JOHNSON.

COL. JOHNSON TO MR. BERRIEN.

The following copy of a letter from col. Johnson to Mr. Berrien has been forwarded to us for publication by col. Johnson:

Oakland, [Ky.] July 20th, 1831.

Dear sir: Your favor of the 7th instant has been received. I find that you understood me to say, that the president would at least expect the invitation of Mrs. Eaton when you gave large and general parties. The president never did directly or indirectly express or intimate such an expectation. He informed me that he had been induced to believe that a part of his cabinet had entered into a combination to drive maj. Eaton from it, by excluding him and his family from society, that he had been also informed that the successive parties to which you allude was a link in the chain: that attempts had been made even upon foreign ministers to exclude maj. Eaton and his family from their parties; and such a state of things gave him great distress: that he was determined at all hazards to have harmony in his cabinet. He then read a paper containing the principles upon which he intended to act. In my conversation with you, I referred to this paper. No doubt it is now in existence. It disclaimed all intentions, on the part of the president, to regulate, in any manner whatever, the private or social intercourse of the members of his cabinet. As a mutual friend I called upon you, and, as a peace maker, my object was to make the above communication in the most delicate manner possible. During our conversation, in the anxiety of my heart to serve my friend and my country, it was I alone, upon my own responsibility, who made the suggestion or proposition, or rather inquiry, whether you could not, at those large and promiscuous parties, invite maj. Eaton and his family. From the total social non-intercourse of the members of the cabinet, the want of harmony was inferred, more than from any other circumstance; and my desire was to remedy that evil by the suggestion or inquiry which I made. It would have been an absolute, unqualified, and total misrepresentation of his views, if I had represented the president as making any such demand. You will therefore perceive that you have fallen into the mistake of supposing that I attributed to him what was the spontaneous, sole, and independent suggestion of my own mind. I had no agency in bringing any part of our conversation before the public. I am happy in the recollection that my voluntary exertions to restore harmony to ancient friendship, for the time being, was not unavailing, by conversations and mutual explanations, between some of the parties, and that I have had no agency in producing the recent separation. Having now corrected your misapprehension of what I did say in my endeavors to prevent the disunion of my bosom friends, I feel as if I had performed another sacred duty. I have done it promptly, and in the same spirit of peace and friendship. I have confined my remarks to an explanation of what I said myself. This is done to avoid any unpleasant collision which too frequently arises among the best of friends and most honorable men when efforts are made to detail private conversations. I am, dear sir, yours respectfully.

R. M. JOHNSON.

Hon. J. Macpherson Berrien.

[The reply of Mr. Berrien to the preceding letter, dated on the 31st July, may be expected in course.]

From the United States Telegraph.

[Letter to the editor—from Mr. Desha, a member of congress from Tennessee, and published with his consent.]

Gallatin, Ten. July 20, 1831.

SIR: I was one of general Jackson's original, warm, personal, and political friends, who have been denounced for no other reason, as I believe, but that I could not say, major Eaton was one of the greatest men in the nation, and that Mrs. Eaton was a slandered woman.

I took occasion to wait on Mr. Eaton before he married Mrs. Eaton and informed him, as I thought I was bound to do, being his personal friend, of the rumors against the woman he intended to make his wife, and attempted to dissuade him from it. He informed me, in Tennessee, that as soon as he had heard of the death of Timberlake, he determined to go to Washington and marry his widow, and communicated this intention to gen. Jackson who approved of, and advised him to do so. I was in the city when it was rumored that major Eaton would be appointed in the cabinet, (a few days before the general was inaugurated.) I waited on the president, and gave him my opinion, honestly, that it would be an unfortunate appointment; that I could see disappointment and mortification in the countenances of his friends; that the country expected of him to select men for his cabinet of the first talents in the nation: that major Eaton was not one of that description. The president's answer was that Mr. Eaton was a talented man, and that he was well informed that it would be a very popular appointment in New York and Pennsylvania, and that * * * * had informed him that the appointment of Eaton would be well received in Pennsylvania.

I believe general Jackson to be honest, but he has been badly advised by Van Buren, Eaton, and Billy Lewis, I have no doubt; and notwithstanding I believe that the plan for Mr. Calhoun's destruction had been settled upon by those gentlemen, before general Jackson's inauguration, I do not believe he could have been induced to act the part he did, but for Mrs. Calhoun's refusal (who was in the city at the time of major Eaton's marriage, and for some time after), to give countenance to, and associate with, Mrs. Eaton. I am now in favor of gen. Jackson's re-election, in preference to H. Clay; but this is a time for the truth, to be spread before the nation: for that is what the people are in search of.

I have said that I have been a warm personal and political friend of the president, which will not be denied by his supporters, or his opposers. I have contributed my mite for his elevation; and am satisfied, nay, will say, I am pleased with most of the measures of his administration, and give to them my hearty support: but I am not, with his attack upon Mr. Calhoun, who had been, and I am satisfied, honestly so, his warm and decided supporter during Mr. Adams's administration. I do not say this from rumor, for I happened to be an eye witness for the two last years of Mr. Adams's administration, and had frequent conversation with him during that period. I am pleased with your course: and notwithstanding you will be denounced by the eleventh hour men, and will have to contend against the patronage of the administration, you will, in my opinion, be sustained by a majority of the democratic party in the union, for your boldness in exposing the intrigues of an unprincipled set of men: and will conclude by saying, go on, for there is honesty enough yet in the great mass of the people, and they will sustain you. Very respectfully,

ROBERT DESHA.

General Duff Green.

TO THE PUBLIC.

An address to the president of the United States, remonstrating against my appointment as secretary of the territory, has been published in the Journal of this morning; and it being the first opportunity I have had of knowing, distinctly, the grounds upon which I have been assailed, I take the earliest moment to reply to them. In doing this, I exercise a right and perform a duty, which no one can find fault with; and I shall endeavor to incur no censure by an exhibition of passion or excitement which I have been taught to consider unbecoming in youth, however it may be tolerated in maturer age.

On my arrival here from Washington, I found the annunciation of my appointment had preceded me by a day, and that an excitement had been gotten up on the instant, and proceedings had upon it before I could be seen or heard, or had been permitted to return home; although it was known, that I was expected in the next boat. I mention this to show, that an immediate impulse was given to public feeling on momentary reflection, and that it has been kept in motion by a precipitancy in the whole proceeding, which seemed rather designed to overwhelm, than to treat me with fairness and candor. I mention it also to show that a decent respect for one, who formed a part of your society, and as far as he knew, altogether unoffending, should have called forth the exercise of liberal feeling rather than premature censure. His youth even claimed it of you, and as a member of a family resident among you, they had a right to expect from a community like this, at least kind and respectful sentiments.

I had supposed, at least, that there were some among you who knew me and my family, and the relations of their position here, who could have found something of extenuation for the offence, which it now seems I have committed, in accepting an appointment tendered to me by the president without consulting you. No one desires more the good feelings of others than myself, because I entertain kind feelings towards all. The asperities of party and the personalities of passion, form no part of my composition. To this those who know me will bear testimony.

That my appointment is so extraordinary (to use your own language) as to fill you with astonishment and indignation, is to me equally astonishing, without feeling a corresponding indignation. What were the facts upon which the minds of those informed on the subject, would naturally rest on this occasion? My father had moved to the territory, holding the office of secretary; had brought with him a numerous family, consisting of eight females, myself, his only son and oldest child. To their comfort, it was well known, that even the petty emoluments of this office were essential. High and important duties required him to go abroad, and be absent some length of time from the United States; forbidding him to hold the office, and his resignation, under such circumstances, was publicly called for by some of you. There was an incompatibility in his retaining the office, and he resigned.

About to undertake a long and hazardous journey, in a precarious climate, was there no consideration due to his family, thus left dependent on the single and youthful exertions of myself? Could you find no just motive in these considerations to say that my appointment was at least excusable, if not justifiable? Was he not rendering an adequate service to his country; and was there nothing in this obvious view of the case, which should have called forth the just and generous feelings of an enlightened and liberal public? If there is not, I have greatly mistaken the character of this community.

But it was not expected that this fostering care should be extended to the injury of any one, or to the detriment of the public. Nor did I imagine that my appointment would have called forth an expression of alarm, for the "dearest rights and liberties of freemen." I could see nothing in it calculated to excite apprehension. Even my youth was a guarantee against usurpation, and a security that I should possess, in you, judicious and faithful counsellors. Without presuming on my capacity, I felt a confidence in my ability for the discharge of the duties of secretary, because I had performed them, and knew their character. And the insinuation, contained in your address, that my father had passed condemnation upon my capacity, by keeping an estimable and intelligent young man in the office, I am compelled to say, is both illiberal and unjust. To make a reproachful application of generous motives, is inexcusable. The impulses of youth teach me otherwise; and although I have much to learn, I can never be taught a different lesson in mature age. It is treating me unfairly, and there is not a man who knows me but would so pronounce it. This imputation manifests a spirit which I am sorry to see; because, whatever may be my demerits, I had a right to expect a manly and candid course from those who have become censors upon the occasion.

To all that has been said and done, I have hitherto opposed nothing. Subject to an inquisitorial examination, I have borne it calmly and without reproach, although the anathema had been fulminated before trial.

In the address is a formidable array of the duties, imposed by law on the governor of the territory, and an impassioned appeal is made, whether I am competent to the discharge of these duties. In other words, your statement of the case amounts to the inquiry, whether I would be a proper appointment for governor?—Is this a fair statement of the case?—I ask at least justice. And can it be considered just, thus to blend two offices which are peculiar and distinct in themselves, and having each the appropriate duties pointed out under the law, with the view of disparaging my pretensions of the office of secretary? The incidental and momentary duties which may, on certain contingencies, devolve on the secretary, you assume as primary duties, requiring the qualification of maturity of talent and age of a governor! The peculiar duties of secretary, under the law, are simple and easy of performance, he being little more than a registering clerk for the governor. The incidental duties of governor, which he may by possibility be called on to perform for a short period, are equally simple. Its simplicity consists in doing no harm; not to go beyond the mere routine of business in the office; such as the secretary does daily; changing only his style on the commission from "secretary" to "acting governor." Those momentous duties which are suggested as required to be performed by the secretary, he can hardly ever be called to exercise. The seat of the general government is too contiguous, to suffer a vacancy in the office of governor prejudicial to the public interest, and at an important time; and no governor would absent himself except at a convenient season, and after putting his office in an advanced condition. Suppose these high duties to occur for a momentary space? Is there any difficulty in getting the advice of wiser and abler men? The oldest ask advice; and no man, in that respect, is independent of the society in which he lives. The difference is, a youth yields to advice; but age seldom or never.

Does any one seriously contend, that my minority is a disqualification under the law? If so, it can only be done for effect. It forms no disqualification: and as to the requisite under the ordinance, of holding 500 acres of land, it is well known that subsequent enactments have dispensed with it. But should it be required, there is no difficulty in my compliance, for I am yet to learn what law forbids a minor being possessor of real and personal estate. That there are many in the territory of higher qualifications, on whom the appointment might have been conferred, is broadly and fully conceded; and it is only to the peculiar circumstances of my position here, and that of my family, to which an appeal can be made, for a selection, that would seem to pass wiser and abler men.

That my minority forms the only ground of serious objection, is gratifying to me. The fact, however, of my being under 21 years of age has been concealed from no one, and cannot be altered. That I did not come into the world some months sooner, is a subject of regret with me, so far as an earlier birth might have conciliated the good opinion of some of you.

Some gentlemen have had the candor to acknowledge, that their objections to me were not as great as towards gen. Jackson; and that they could even find it in their hearts to forgive me, but it was too good an opportunity to let slip for finding fault with the president. The modern tactics of party warfare, have produced a resort to every weapon of assailment. Neither age nor sex has been exempt from the ruthless attack of party violence. My youth cannot claim an exemption. But I would ask, if it be possible that honorable minds would delight in blighting the prospects of a young man on the threshhold of life, with peculiar and extraordinary cares on his hands, at a time when he requires to be sustained by the generous and manly sympathies of all good men? Would the prostration of him, and the attendant consequences to a numerous family, of which he becomes the guardian, gratify even the deepest and most uncompromising malignity? I answer for all of you in the negative. Then why not allow me to show what is my ability, before I am condemned? Why not let your censure or praise follow the conduct I shall observe, rather than by unfavorable anticipations, throw obstacles in my way? Is this doing as you would be done by? Can there be found in this the benevolent spirit of a christian community? It shall be no part of my plan to go round with a subscription paper. I am assured, that many valuable and influential men are prepared to give me support; and I rely on the calm and dispassionate sentiments of the public, without a begging of names, to which, I understand, my opponents have resorted, to my prejudice.

To me it has been unfortunate, that I have had to enter upon my office at a time when the present governor retires, and before his successor has arrived to take his place. This is unfortunate, because the temporary exercise of the office of governor gives an aspect of inappropriateness from my youth, which would not so appear in my position as secretary. This evil, however, will soon be remedied, and I trust that when the regular and appropriate functions of each officer are in exercise, the objections that now arise will be allayed; and that the mountain torrent which threatens to overwhelm me, will pass away with the storm that gave it birth, and be succeeded by a placid stream, enriching and fertilizing a soil in which every generous plant will take root.

S. T. MASON.

Thursday, July 28, 1831.

To the editor of the Democratic Free Press:

I have read a memorial from certain citizens of Detroit, remonstrating against the appointment of the present secretary of the territory, and have observed, with equal regret and surprize, that my position in the secretary's office, has been seized upon as an argument against the qualifications and capacity of the present incumbent. I deem it a duty I owe the late secretary, and an act of duty to the present incumbent to state, that the inferences drawn from my being employed in the office, are both erroneous and unjust.

My being employed was originally occasioned by the necessary absence of the late secretary on other public duties, and has since continued from the same cause. I had always understood that the present incumbent intended embracing different pursuits, and that it was uncertain at what moment he might commence a different business; so that there was neither motive nor inclination to take the place that I occupied in the office.

During the last session of the legislative council, besides acting as clerk in the secretary's office, I also acted as private secretary for the governor, and was consequently absent from the office a greater part of the time: and at such times the duties of the office were discharged by Mr. S. T. Mason, in a manner which certainly did not lead me or any other person in my knowledge, to a conclusion detrimental either to his industry or ability. At the end of the session, during the greatest press of business in the secretary's office, I was confined to my room by ill health for several weeks, and after my recovery, I found that the present secretary had succeeded in transacting almost all the accumulation of labor then incident to the office; and the impression which I then received, and still retain, was, that it indicated an excellent capacity for business.

Having been in the habit, for the greater part of the last year, of daily mixing in company with the present secretary, among the citizens of Detroit, and observing the universal kindness and respect which they apparently entertained for him, I am surprised that they should have drawn a comparison so much to his disparagement, and can only attribute it to a sudden and momentary excitement; and I cannot but believe that they will yet do justice to his abilities, however they may regard the propriety of his appointment.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

☞The present number closes the fortieth volume of the Register.

FLOUR AND COTTON. Liverpool July 13. There have been sales of the canal flour received by the Geo. Canning, at 26*s.* 6*d.* per bbl. in bond. This is certainly a most miserable price, but to which holders must submit if they sell at all, and we see no reason to expect improvement for some time, and think it better to close sales of all bonded grain and flour. The weather is still very propitious for the crops, and we fully expect an early and plentiful harvest.

The slight improvement in the demand for cotton has passed off, and we are now as dull as ever. The new duty has not yet taken effect. In other articles no change to notice.

☞The duty on flour is now about $3 a barrel.

ELECTIONS. Joseph Duncan has been re-elected to congress from Illinois, and Spencer Pettis, from Missouri, by large majorities.

Messrs. Blair,* Polk, *Isaacs and Johnson have been re-elected from Tennessee; Mr. Arnold supplies the place of Mr. Lea, and Mr. Fitzgerald has beaten Mr. Crocket. William Hall is elected in the place of Mr. Desha, who declined a poll. General Carroll is re-elected governor without opposition.

We now have returns from Kentucky that, we think, may be fully relied on—Messrs. Daniel, Johnson, Lecompte, Gaither, Wickliffe and Lyon are re-elected, and Mr. Adair supercedes Mr. Kincaid—7 Jackson members. Messrs. Letcher and Chilton are re-elected, Mr. Marshall has beaten Mr. Coleman, Mr. Tompkins supercedes Mr. Yancey, and Mr. Allen comes in place of Mr. Clark, who declined a poll—5 Clay members. The senate consists of 21 Clay and 17 Jackson—two of the former are of the old "pledged men"—of the senators elected this year 6 are Clay and 3 Jackson. The house of representatives consists of 100 members—of these 56 are Clay and 44 Jackson—so that, it is said, a Clay senator will certainly be chosen, by a majority of at least 12. We expect to give some particulars hereafter, as the number of votes received by the adverse parties—shewing the strength of each. At the last election only two anti-Jackson members of congress were elected from Kentucky.

We have returns of votes for governor and lieutenant governor in Indiana. Mr. Noble is elected governor, and Mr. Wallace lieutenant governor. There were three candidates for governor, voted for as follows:

Mr. Noble	22,620 Clay.
Stapp	6,756 Clay.
	29,376
Reed	19,383 Jackson.

The vote of the state is decisive against the present administration—the returns as to members of congress are not full; but it seems that Mr. Law has beaten Mr. Boon, that Mr. Test is succeeded by Mr. McCarty, being also opposed by Mr. Smith, and Mr. Carr supplies the place of Mr. Jennings, by a small majority over Mr. Wick. In Mr. Test's late district a large majority of the votes were anti-Jackson—but their power was lost by the division of their strength. In losing Mr. Test, we lose one of the few real business-men of the last congress—a loss that will be much felt.

The election in Norfolk borough having resulted in giving a majority of only 31 votes against col. Newton, and the small county of Elizabeth City having yet only to vote, it is esteemed a moral certainty that he has beaten Mr. Loyall. Miles King is elected to the state legislature by 12 votes over William Maxwell. Loyall beat Newton 107 votes at the last election in Norfolk.

Gen. Charles F. Mercer is re-elected to congress in the Prince William district, Va. by a majority of 246 over his competitor col. Gibson.

☞The friends of gen. Jackson are designated by italics—those of Mr. Clay are printed in Roman characters.

BRITISH COLONIAL TRADE. The Canadians do not appear well pleased with the late arrangements concerning the colonial trade. The York, U. C. "Colonial Advocate" last received, under the head of "Montreal Prices," has the following remarks—

About ten days ago, as we learn from a commercial friend, the price of fine flour was nominally five dollars, but it would not fetch that price in any quantity. The very best superfine flour was very dull at five and a half dollars. American wheat and flour comes in free—that makes the chief difference between last year's prices and this. The credit price of wheat is 6*s.* 3*d.* to 6*s.* 6*d.* Perhaps wheat and flour equal to thirty thousand barrels flour have come into Canada from the States, within the last three months—as free as if they had been the produce of us Canadians who are freely importing and consuming those manufactures of England which the Americans contemn and despise. Are there those who doubt? Let them peruse carefully the following extracts from No. 1,033, volume 40, of Niles' Baltimore Register, one of the oldest and best circulated newspapers of the union.

[The editor then makes a very long extract from our "Politics for working men," and adds]—

And is it to enrich the northern states of the American union, a union which has a manufacturing interest sufficient to exclude British goods by a heavy protecting tariff in favor of its own domestic productions, that the Canadas are to be impoverished and our farmers ruined, and rendered unable to purchase English goods? Britain retains the power to regulate our foreign trade, and so regulates it as to prevent the growth of a manufacturing interest opposed to hers in these colonies. This we do not object to—we complain of the foolish policy which is sacrificing Canada to build up New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio.

Now—all this may be very well—for Canada; but the rule which is good for her, is also good for us! It is true, that, by the late arrangements, American flour may pass through Canada, to the British West Indies, free of duty—but the value of the whole of our supply of these islands would hardly pay for the Leghorn hats and bonnets that we used to import! We are speaking seriously, and strictly regarding the truth. Still the free admission of this small amount of American flour into Canada, has a mighty effect upon the interests of the agriculturalists of that important colony—because that we can make wheat and flour cheaper than they; and thus powerfully reduce the profits of the Canadian farmers. Our readers will recollect, that when we first heard of the arrangement, we suggested that Great Britain, to keep Canada in a state of subjection, had admitted our flour free of duty—but to secure herself in her navigating interests, had provided that American vessels should be virtually excluded from her West India ports, by a heavy duty on flour, unless imported through her colonies. What we anticipated seems realized. What Britain did to keep her colonies (which now are the United States) in subjection, by efforts to prevent even the "manufacture of a hob-nail," she is doing towards Canada—which is consistent with her whole colonial policy, and extends to her possessions in all parts of the world; and that she has monopolized the navigation of her West India Islands, we may observe, that though seventeen vessels cleared at Philadelphia in the month of July last, for the West Indies—only one of them departed for a British colony; and we see it stated in a Portland, Maine, paper, that only one vessel has loaded at that great navigating town for these islands ever since the arrangement, which was to accomplish such mighty things for MAINE! The fact just mentioned is admitted in the "Portland Argus," as good authority, in a case like this, as the Washington Globe would be.

* Messrs. Blair and Isaacs are by some called anti-Jackson.

The "Advocate" complains that American flour is admitted free of duty, though the people of Canada are compelled to consume British manufactures. May we not then, and on the same principle, resist the introduction of British goods, seeing that the British duty on our flour is prohibitory in its character?

The Penobscot Journal has the following highly interesting article which is well fitted to be added here:

The activity of trade in Bangor at the present time, is cheering to its citizens, and excites the admiration of strangers. A large share of our merchants are in the very comfortable condition of having as much as they can do. Our streets exhibit the bustle of a city, and a fleet of shipping is constantly in our harbor. Boats and rafts are passing on the river at all times, in all directions. A large number of buildings are in progress, including several blocks of stores. Six or seven brick-yards, within this village, are in constant operation. A spacious hotel, we believe the largest in the state, is well filled. Laboring men are in great demand, and at the highest wages. The country around finds a ready market for its productions.

What is the cause of the present activity of trade in this quarter?

The answer is plain and easy. The great staple of our market is lumber. This is carried out of our river in immense quantities. Where does it go? Does it go to the British West Indies? Does any one believe that the opening of the British ports has had the slightest effect on our trade? Does not every one know that we have not yet had any lumber of consequence that was fit for the West India market? And have all the British ports in the world received half a dozen cargoes of our lumber from our market, this season, or in any other season?

The demand for our staple product, comes from the manufacturing towns and villages of New England, and others in their vicinity—towns which have grown up, and are now living and thriving to the satisfaction of every body, under the influence of the American System; that system which sets all things in motion at home, which gives labor and a price for labor, to every man that will work. The influence of the American System is felt in every counting-room in our town; on every farm and on every stream in the whole region watered by the Penobscot.

WOOL AND WOOLLENS. The following articles possess considerable interest at the present time—

A London paper says—We are sorry to notice that the communications from the woollen-manufacturers show that considerable languor prevails in that branch of industry, and the market for the raw material is also dull. As regards the manufacture, the operation of the act of 1824 that repealed the old act of Elizabeth, which prohibited the export of raw wools, English growth, is now beginning to be felt. Seven years have elapsed since that act passed, and the Americans have been actively engaged during that period in preparing for the manufacture of woollens. During this course of preparation, they continued to purchase our manufactured goods. They are now in a condition to purchase the raw material, which they commenced to do freely last December, and thereby materially relieved the market, which was at that time very heavy. They have been large purchasers again within the last month, which has had a similar effect of lightening the raw market, but it has also had the effect of checking the manufacture of woollen goods. We are offering no opinion in this place as to the operation of the great principle connected with the free exportation of English wool—there were many, and cogent reasons, no doubt, for its adoption in this particular instance.

We are merely stating the dry fact, that the act in question is at this moment interfering with the woollen manufacture, insomuch as it has converted the Americans into the purchasers of English wool instead of English manufactured woollen articles. Notwithstanding the Americans have been large purchasers of the raw material within the last six months, still the market is very dull, and the price much lower than in the months of February and March. Foreign wool is also very dull of sale. The clip of the present year is short, owing to the extensive rot among the sheep; but as the foreign orders are limited, it is expected that the supply will be equal to the demand, according to present appearances. At a recent sale of 893 packs of foreign wool, not more than 40 were actually sold, notwithstanding the assertion of some of the evening papers of the same day that the sale went off at full prices.

From the Leeds Mercury.—We learn from a gentleman who has just returned from the wool fairs of Breslau, Stettin, and Berlin, that the lower and middle qualities of wool have advanced in the German market.—Wools below 20*d.* per lb. have sold 10 per cent. higher this year than last; from 20*d.* to 2*s.* 3*d.* per lb. they have been sold 5 per cent. higher; and above that price there is no advance. The supply is smaller than usual, and the wool is not well washed. A great number of foreigners were in the market—some from the United States, which is a new thing; the Netherland buyers are also again making their appearance, though their woollen manufacture has received so violent a shock; the Prussian buyers are numerous, and give larger prices than the English thought it prudent to give—the woollen manufactures of Prussia being now very brisk and flourishing. The English did not buy more than two-thirds the quantity they had intended to buy.

Wool sale.—The public sales of wool yesterday, were rather thinly attended. Nearly all the wool offered was not of the most desirable kinds, and purchasers consequently manifested but little spirit in bidding. Of 181 bales Buenos Ayres, advertised by Whitwell, Bond & Co. only 14 of inferior quality were sold at 8¾ and 9½ cents, the residue was withdrawn; 5 bales English fleece, brought 46 cts. advertised, not offered; 56 bales German, were represented on the catalogue, 24 of which were withdrawn, having been sold at private sale; 5 of the other 32 remaining bales were offered and sold at 75 cts. residue of the lot withdrawn; 5 bags inferior unwashed fleeces assorted, from common to ¾ blood, 45 to 50 cts.; 4 bales fine fleeces, 60 cents; 1,200 lbs. called superfine pulled, 58 cents, cash. The sales by Warren, Barry & Park, consisted of 2,500 lbs. American fleeces averaging ¾ blood at 59 cents; 2,500 lbs. limed Smyrna, 26 cents; 2,700 lbs. inferior English pulled, 24½ cents, 6 months; 140 bales (21,000 lbs.) American fleeces, advertised by them, were withdrawn, having been previously sold at private sale. [Boston Courier of Aug. 12.

☞The growth of wool in the United States is not yet nearly equal to the wants of our country, and the policy of importing wool rather than woollen cloth is manifest in the new employment which it gives to American labor, and of course the new demand that it makes for other products of the farmer, amply protected in the growth of wool. On the lower grades of wool—say such as cost 20*d.* sterling or 40 cents per lb. in Europe, the duty is 24 cents per lb. and on those costing 50 cents per lb. the duty is 29 cents—on those costing 100 cents, 54 cents per lb. and these duties are not to be evaded like the duties on cloths. Thus a vast field of profit is opened and secured to our farmers, and we may hope for a large increase of sheep in the United States—provided frauds on the revenue, in the importation of cloths, shall be prevented—the manufacture of these being very nearly as cheap in the United States as in England, notwithstanding the hordes of paupers hired out in the latter country, because of our more extended machinery.

FRENCH WOOLLENS. The New York Advocate says—We learn that the French government has lately given a bounty of 12½ per cent. on the exportation of the woollen manufactures of that country. If this measure is intended to be permanent, though it may give the French woollens some little advantage in foreign markets, it will be at the expense of the body of the people.

CALICOES. There has been a great turn-out among the English calico printers, because of a yet further proposed reduction of their wages—no doubt, in part caused by the competition of the American print-works, severely felt in the markets of the United States, of Mexico, South America, &c. In a little while, if the English shall be badly off for calicoes, we can supply them with 100,000 pieces a week, made out of American cotton, in lieu of their present supplies, made out of the weaker East India cotton!

ANTI-TARIFF CONVENTION. The scheme of an anti-tariff convention, to be held at Philadelphia, was a suggestion of the politicians, and does not seem to take well with the people. It is thus, even in the ancient dominion. The Richmond Whig thus describes the efforts made in that city to get up a meeting to appoint delegates, and the measure of success which attended those efforts:

The meeting—After five days notice, the meeting to depute delegates to the anti-tariff convention at Philadelphia, assembled yesterday, in the capitol. The Enquirer was eloquent in urging attendance, the celebrated Danforth looked important, the old bell at the barracks was twice rung backwards; but somehow, all these animated appliances failed to call out the people. It is a question of grave enquiry how many were present—the most liberal estimate reckons the number participating at 35—the most illiberal, at 22—a correspondent says 24 voted on some motion made by col. Rutherford! The meeting deputed seven delegates, but of these Messrs. Leigh, Robertson, Marx and Taylor, were not at it, and, however opposed to the tariff, will not, in all likelihood, (three of them), attend at Philadelphia.

☞Some of the high and honorable men appointed to this convention, we must needs believe, will not find themselves quite "comfortable," when seated beside a fellow delegate who is a subject of king William the 4th of England, and holds no allegiance to the United States—having also several pattern-card British agents in their company. One would think that these should be excused from acting on matters affecting the interests of the people of the United States—unless there is a "holy alliance" between our "free trade" folks and them, as, indeed, it would seem that there may be!

☞At a meeting held in Georgia, over which Mr. Crawford presided, for the purpose of sending delegates to the anti-tariff convention at Philadelphia, the following resolution was adopted among others:

Resolved, As this meeting entertains the most lively devotion to the union of the states, and to prevent a misunderstanding of its views, that our state delegates be instructed to confine their discussions and the result thereof, exclusively, to a removal of the oppression under which the country labors, in consequence of the system aforesaid, and that they refrain from all deliberations tending either directly or remotely to the dismemberment of the union.

NEW YORK AMERICAN ADVOCATE. This is the title of a new, high-spirited and beautifully printed newspaper, of the "first class," issued at New York, and edited by Mr. Redwood Fisher, well known as a faithful and able expounder of the "American System," to the support of which this paper will be, "heart and soul," devoted—being started for the very purpose of bearding the lion in his den; and the "royal beast," we trust, will quail before this "Advocate" for the rights and prosperity of the free laboring people of the United States. We heartily welcome Mr. Fisher into the "arena," and calculate upon much benefit from his exertions. A great interest is at stake, and we hope that he will be cheered by the substantial approbation of his countrymen, in performing the arduous duty that is imposed on him—which requires not only great industry and much talent, but no small degree of resolution and courage.

The Daily Advocate is 10 dollars a year—the semi-weekly, four dollars. Subscriptions will be received at this office.

THE CUSTOM-HOUSE BOND, AT CHARLESTON. The Southern Patriot of the 9th inst. says—"The statement has been going the rounds of the northern papers, that a merchant of this city has refused to pay his bond to the custom house, with the view of making a question before the federal court of the constitutionality of the tariff act of 1828. Such is not the fact. The gentleman who has refused payment of the bond in question is not a merchant, and has never engaged in mercantile concerns. We have been requested by respectable merchants to make this statement.

A BET. We meet with the following in the "Charleston Courier." We do not expect that any one will be rash enough to meet the proposition.—I will bet $1,000 play or pay—the money to be deposited in bank—with any cotton planter, that the tariff has not reduced the value of cotton one cent in the pound—and that if the duties were reduced to the rates of 1816, cotton would not thereby rise permanently, one cent in the pound—the decision to be made thus: two of the first merchants in London or Liverpool shall have the question submitted to them; if they agree, the decision to be final, if not, they shall refer their views to one of the most enlightened merchants of France, whose umpirage shall be final. Now let any of those who have so often deluded the people, by saying that the tariff has produced a ruinous fall in the prices of cotton, come forward, and try the sincerity of their assertions. NO GULL.

SCRAPS RELATING TO THE PROGRESS OF THE AMERICAN SYSTEM, INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS, &c.

It is well worthy of remark, that the proprietors of factories are always prompt to assist persons, of any religious persuasion, to erect places for public worship, and encourage that morality which is common to the principles of every Christian church. Several of the eastern manufacturing villages have Roman Catholic chapels—in the erection of which, perhaps, even Unitarians have liberally assisted. It is pleasant to notice such things.

Two or three factories have lately been destroyed by fire, in consequence of friction in some part of the machinery.

Beautiful articles, such as inkstands, sand boxes, &c. &c. are now manufactured out of anthracite coal. This material will be used for many ornamental things, as well as useful ones.

The design of making a rail road from Pittsburg to the great Ohio canal is maturing. It is important, as well to the city named, as to Philadelphia and Baltimore, that some such connection should be made.

The steam boat Enterprise made her passage through the late famous raft of the Red river, on the 16th June, and was the first vessel of her class that ever ascended the upper part of that great stream. The navigation was very difficult, because of the low stage of the water.

The Washington, North Carolina, Times says that a gentleman lately made his appearance in that place attired in a complete suit of silk, the whole produce of culture, spinning, weaving and making was performed on his own farm, by his own family. He wore a coat, vest, pantaloons and stockings—all the same;—resembling what is called Angola, but much softer, and a very superior description of goods. That man does not grumble about the tariff. He has too much practical good sense not to know, that domestic industry and household economy is the parent of wealth.

There is a comb manufactory in Philadelphia sufficiently extensive to manufacture combs to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars per annum. The British system would say "send this $100,000 out of the country and buy of foreign manufacturers, for manufactories corrupt the people!"

There were 42 arrivals from foreign ports more, at Boston, in the month of July this year, than in the month of July last year.

A traveller through Massachusetts thus describes the process and the results of the manufacture of the "Dunstables:" I stopped by the way to examine the manufacture of straw bonnets. The platting of straw is done in all the houses you see by the way side, and by all the females you meet. It is a beautiful employment for women, affording them good wages, with scarcely any exertion. They get 25 cents a yard for platting the present fashion. Some can earn $2 a day, but generally they make about $1. When platted, the straw is sold to other women, who sew it together and fashion the bonnets. The straw is cut from the field in its green state, about the time it is heading; when it is steeped in boiling water, and spread upon the green to dry and bleach. In this way it forms an important branch of household industry. The boys cut down the rye, steep it, and prepare it for bleaching, when it passes into the hands of the girls, who prepare it for sale, when the fathers of the family carry it to market and return with the money. [Nat. Int.

[Such proceedings in South Carolina would nullificate all discontent about the protection of the industry of the people.]

A project is on foot to run a steam boat on the Winnipiseogee lake in New Hampshire. This lake is about 20 miles long, its out-let is not navigable—but a canal has been talked of to connect its waters with those of Piscataqua river. It is thought that 75,000 dollars are annually paid for transportation from the "lake region." It is indented with many deep bays.

The Edgefield (South Carolina) cotton factory was lately destroyed by fire. The loss estimated at 20,000 dollars.

A southern paper says—Blankets of excellent quality, of cotton warp, filled with wool, are made at the cotton factory near Pendleton, S. C. This is the true remedy for hard times in the south; and will make the tariff policy a blessing to us on this side of Mason's and Dixon's line, as it has already been to our northern brethren, who, wiser than ourselves, have taken advantage of its provisions, instead of quarrelling about their coincidence with the doctrines laid down by certain writers who are enamored of a "free trade system" that never did, and we fear never will exist. [Lynchburg Virg.

A project is on foot to build a large cotton factory at Nashville, Tennessee.

About four years have elapsed since we first visited Lowell. It then contained, we think, about 3,000 inhabitants. Its population now is not far from 8,000, having increased more rapidly the last year than ever before. As frequent statements have been made in the public prints respecting the factories, &c. we shall only state a few things which have not been noticed.

The amount of manufacturing carried on here is immense—and yet the demand for goods cannot at present be supplied. There are five incorporated companies for manufacturing. In one of them, the Hamilton, were manufactured in six months, ending July 1, 1831, 1,800,000 yards of cotton goods. This corporation gives employment to about 900 males and females. The names of the other companies are Merrimack, Appleton and Lowell companies, and the proprietors of locks and canals. The Lowell company manufactures carpets exclusively. It gives employment to not far from 100 hands. They manufacture elegant rugs, and imitation Brussels, which we could not distinguish from the imported. In the calico works they print about twenty-four different figures of only one color to a piece. In all the establishments there are now manufactured per year from 12 to 14 millions of yards of various cotton cloths; about 44,000 per day—3,000 per hour—60 per minute—or a yard every second!

In the suburbs of Lowell, within a few rods of the canals, is a settlement called by some New Dublin, which occupies rather more than an acre of ground. It contains a population of not far from 500 Irish, who dwell in about 100 cabins, from 7 to 10 feet in height, built of slabs and rough boards, a fire place made of stones in one end, topped out with two or three flour barrels or lime casks. In a central situation is the school house, built in the same style of the dwelling houses, turfed up to the eaves, with a window in one end, and small holes in two sides for the admission of air and light. In this room are collected together perhaps 150 children.

[Portsmouth Journal.

A Pennsylvania paper states that a bed of bituminous coal has recently been discovered in Tioga county of that state. The stratum is said to be seven feet in thickness, and entirely free from slate.

Wheat, which 12 years since was worth but 31 cents per bushel on Lake Erie, now brings 75 cents, owing to the Erie and Welland canals. Other produce, land, &c. have similarly advanced. [Will some "free trade" and anti internal improvement man, give us his reason for these advances in price?]

The Rockland flour mill, eight miles from Baltimore, has been converted into an extensive calico printing establishment, by Mr. Mellier, and is already printing 250 pieces, or between 7 and 8,000 yards of calico, daily.

The Sodus canal from Big Sodus to Montezuma, N. Y. will soon be commenced. It will be 24 miles long, and afford an immense water-power, derived from the adjacent lakes. The fall to be overcome is 130 feet. Big Sodus harbor is said to be the best on lake Ontario. When this canal is finished, we believe that an entire voyage may be made from Quebec to Norfolk, Va. by water, descending the Susquehannah.

Mr. James P. Allaire, Cherry street, New York, employs two hundred hands, in the manufacture of steam engines and other heavy works of iron, the product of which, since the 1st January last, amounts to $140,000! He disburses 5,000 dollars in monthly wages! The same gentleman has also certain other factories of hollow ware, sad irons, "wood screws," &c. in which about 400 additional hands are employed!

The tenth sale of the N. E. society (says the Boston Patriot) was well attended, and the goods went off at high prices and with great spirit. The sales will amount to upwards of $400,000. We observed many southern purchasers present, more than at any previous sale. We understand that a very large lot of prints was offered for sale, amounting to nearly 220,000 dollars.

Speaking of the famous manufacturing town of Lowell, Massachusetts, the Salem Mercury says—Speculations in land, in this flourishing town, have been carried within a few weeks beyond all former example—Numbers who but recently were in moderate pecuniary circumstances, have amassed independent fortunes by this means. Real estate has risen within the last eighteen months, nearly one hundred per cent. Some lots of land well situated for business, which were sold within six months for two shillings per foot, have been sold within a few weeks for 75 cents a foot! Last Wednesday a lot of land was purchased by two gentlemen for twenty-five thousand dollars; and on the same day they sold one half of it at an advance of forty thousand dollars. Buildings, it is said, rent for a greater profit in Lowell than in any other town in New England, averaging fifteen or twenty per cent. per annum on the capital invested.

The population of Macon, one of the most flourishing inland towns in Georgia, by a late census, is 2,609. In all this population, there was said, a few months ago, not to have been a single schoolmaster.

There is a daily line of steam boats now running between Buffalo and Detroit!—seven valuable vessels being employed in it. The boat that leaves Buffalo starts on her return-voyage the 4th day after, from Detroit.

ANOTHER RIOT took place on the rail road, near New Market, Frederick county, on Sunday evening the 14th, by an altercation between the white and colored laborers. It was quelled for the time, without much injury to either party—but renewed, with great violence, on Monday afternoon, and the people of New Market were compelled to interfere—they succeeded in making prisoners of about 20 of the ringleaders, and dispersed the rest. But the Irish laborers rallied to the amount of 400 men, to rescue the prisoners of their party—threatening the town, and a dreadful affray appeared at hand—but the presence of the rev. Mr. McElroy, and C. W. Wever, esq. superintendent of the road, supported by the high-sheriff of the county and the military from the city of Frederick, succeeded in quieting the angry passions of the people, who marched off to their shantees, headed by the reverend gentlemen—and resumed their labor on the following day. He also gave bail for the persons arrested, and they were released.

ANTHRACITE COAL TRADE—1831. The season is now somewhat more than half advanced, and the quantity of coal sent to market from the several places of shipment, is 99,550 tons, viz:

From the Schuylkill region		38,304 tons.
Lehigh	do.	37,816
Lackawana	do. about	23,430
		99,550 tons.

The shipments in 1830, up to the present time, were:

Schuylkill	40,418 tons.
Lehigh	35,198
Lackawana about	23,000
	98,616 tons.

COPY-RIGHTS. The "National Intelligencer" says—An extraordinary suggestion is made in the Boston Gazette of looking to us for damages, for publishing Mr. Adams's anniversary oration! The author of it came into the world more than a century too late. We did not look to see whether the publisher had taken out a copy-right or not. But if he has done so, he will hardly subject himself to the ridicule of sueing us for a violation of his copy-right. What would be said if we were to take out a copy-right for each successive number of the National Intelligencer, and prosecute every one who dared to copy from it? Such a proceeding would be every bit as rational as to commence a law-suit against any one for copying a speech delivered before an assembly of the people.

☞We observed with regret, that a copy-right had been taken for this chaste and beautiful and patriotic production. We are sure that its author never contemplated such a proceding—any more than Mr. Wirt, whose masterly oration, at the celebration of the late French revolution in Baltimore, fell as if "still-born from the press" from the same cause.

RICHARD RUSH. This gentleman was addressed on the 9th instant, by a committee of gentlemen, acting in behalf of the anti-masons, in the vicinity of Lancaster, Pa. who desired to know whether he would allow himself to be considered among those from whom the candidate for the presidency is to be selected at the convention to be held in this city, in September: In Mr. Rush's reply, he says he "must unequivocally be considered as out of view for either the nomination for the presidency or that of the vice presidency, lest a doubt should be thrown upon his motives."

MR. DAVIS, who conducted with so much ability the Winchester Republican, has retired from the editorial chair. Mr. J. G. BROOKS, late of New York, is his successor. All we could wish the new editor is, that he may continue his paper with the same success which marked the course of Mr. Davis; and, like him, be able, after a season, to leave the cares of public life, with a competency earned from honest industry and perseverance. [Alex. Gaz.

[There are few men in the United States whose retirement from the editorial chair we should more regret than that of our valued friend, Mr. Davis. We have but few such men to redeem the press of the very general and too just censure that is now heaped upon it. But we wish him the fullest enjoyment of that honorable reputation, and easy competency, which he has so faithfully earned.]

GOVERNOR RAY. Of all the men in the world that ever was elected by the people to be governor of a state, we have thought that Mr. Ray, of Indiana, was the queerest—though another choice was almost as queer a one. The Danville, Kentucky, Olive Branch thus hits off gov. Ray—who was one of the candidates for congress from Indiana, and obtained a good many votes!

Governor Ray, of Indiana, addressed the people the other day at Salem. In the course of his speech he informed them that his enemies had resorted to every fabrication that ingenuity could invent, or calumny circulate, to injure his standing.

"Only think, fellow citizens, they have had the temerity to assert and publish to the world that I was ignorant of the appropriate functions either of a carpet or spit box. I have been informed that it has been asserted, that, at the time I visited Jeffersonville for the purpose of receiving general Lafayette, on being invited into the house of a respectable citizen, and seeing a carpet spread on the floor, I insisted on walking round it, and when the owner of the house pressed me to walk over it, I declared I would not for the world injure his quilt by treading on it—that I spit my tobacco juice on the floor outside of the carpet, and when a negro servant stared at me, and kept fixing his gaze first on me and then on the spit box—that I sung out, you black rascal, take that box away, or, by the powers, I'll spit in it! Now, fellow citizens, I can assure you that this is untrue—that, tho' I was roughly raised, I know now, and knew then, what was a carpet and what was a spit box."

"THE PENNSYLVANIA WHIG." This is the title of a new semi-weekly paper which has made its appearance in Philadelphia, edited and published by Mr. Stephen Simpson, at 5 dollars a year.

Mr. Simpson is, certainly, one of the keenest writers in the United States, and the following extract from the leading article in his first number is offered as a fine specimen of his manner:

"It will be said in order to divert the argument from things to persons, and from generals to particulars, that I am disappointed of an office from president Jackson. This is not true; but if it were, it could not invalidate the force of reason, or destroy the existence of facts. If I am disappointed, I have been disappointed by the friends of Mr. Clay, who rejected my appointment in the senate. The president did all that one man could do for another. He labored personally to procure my confirmation. It engrossed his waking thoughts, and disturbed his slumbers by dreams; so anxious, was he, that I might be confirmed! Surely personal feelings of evil are not compatible with such excess of friendship. Nay, he went further. Even after the rejection of the senate, he pursued means to commission me as a navy agent, by writing to the senators throughout the union, to procure their promises in anticipation, that, if nominated by him, they would yield their support. The affirmative answers of some of these senators I have seen, but in this laudable attempt to serve a friend, at the peril even of his constitutional functions—he failed. He could not command success, but surely he deserved to succeed!—I will not pause to ask, how he could venture to shake off his executive responsibility! Nay, he even went further than this. Judging that he could not procure a senatorial confirmation, the president proposed, through major Lewis, that I should receive an appointment in the custom house of $1,500 per annum for the time being, with a pledge of being appointed a commissioner under the treaty to adjust claims on France, so soon as that should be concluded and ratified. As far, then, as personal interest is concerned, every consideration led me to support gen. Jackson; and permit me to remark, that such offers are not often made by presidents now a days, to their friends!"

THE FRENCH CLAIMS, it may, we believe, now be stated with confidence, have been settled, or rather compromised, by our minister in France, Mr. Rives,—subject to the approbation of the president and senate.

The arrangement of these long outstanding claims has been effected mainly, we are disposed to think, by the untiring assiduity, perseverance and zeal of Mr. Rives; and though the sum secured falls much short of the just demands of the country against France, it goes far beyond what the French government expected, or intended originally to pay. Without saying, therefore, that under no possible future circumstance more might not be obtained from France, we think it only just to Mr. Rives to express the opinion, that, in the actual condition of things, he has done well in obtaining thus much.

The arrangement, as we understand it—and, as the French bureaux are sometimes leaky, we imagine our impressions are well founded—has taken the form of a treaty, which was expected to be executed and forwarded to Washington by the packet of July 10, now daily looked for. The sum stipulated to be paid is twenty-five millions of francs, with a supplement of interest which will make the whole sum twenty-eight and a half millions—payable in six years. The claims of France upon the United States, including that of Beaumarchais, which has been estimated at five millions, are brought down to, and are to be liquidated for, one and a half millions of francs. France, likewise, gives up her claim under the Louisiana treaty. A mutual reduction of duties upon certain articles of export from each country, is stipulated. On our sea island cotton, the present duty in France is to be reduced one half—from 40 to 20 fr. the 100 killograms. We in like manner are to reduce the duties upon French wines,—to six cents per gallon for red wine in casks, to 10 cents for white wine in casks, and to 22 cents on both kinds in bottles.

Such we believe to be substantially the arrangement negotiated by Mr. Rives—and closing as it does all points in dispute between this country and France, we cannot but look upon it as a satisfactory one. With how much reason it is thus to be looked upon may be gathered from the fact, that the commission appointed by the French government, of which M Laine was president, composed of six members, undertook to justify, on principle, the whole system of measures of the imperial government towards the United States, by the aggressions of Great Britain on the one hand, and the conduct of the United States themselves on the other. They said, that where this system was regularly applied, we are entitled to no redress, and that it is only in cases of abusive or irregular application, that indemnity is due; that but three classes of our claims are admissible, to wit: for vessels burnt at sea, captures made before notice of the existence of the decrees, and such as were made after the 1st of November, 1810, (the period fixed for their repeal), and they indicated the sum of ten millions of francs as the full extent of what we were entitled to claim. They decided unanimously the Louisiana question against us. Such was the state of the negotiation as late as last April. [N. Y. Amer.

Claims. The Newburyport Herald states that the amount of claims, in that vicinity, supposed to be included in the late adjustment with France, is $778,640. On Denwark they amounted to $655,700; or more than the whole amount allowed.

Population of Liverpool. The population of the borough of Liverpool, materially exceeds the estimate which had been formed of its probable increase since 1821. It amounts to 162,300, viz:—75,300 males and 87,000 females, being an increase of nearly 37 per cent. upon the census of 1821. The following table shows the increase during the last thirty years:

Years.	Houses.	Males.	Females.	Total.	Incr. per ct.
1801	11,784	34,367	43,286	77,653
1811	16,162	41,296	53,080	94,376	21½
1821	20,322	54,340	64,632	118,972	26
1831		75,309	87,009	162,318	36¾

This statement shows that the increase in twenty years was 53 per cent. and in thirty years is 100 per cent. If, to the population within the borough, be added the population of the suburbs, namely, Kirkdale, Everton, Low and Edgehills, and Toxtethpark, the total will exceed 200,000 souls.

The American census for 1830 has been completed and the result published. The population of the U. States, which was 9,637,000 in 1820, was last year 12,976,000, or, in round numbers, thirteen millions. What a prodigy is the growth of this republic! When the revolution commenced in 1776, it had less than three millions of inhabitants, and now it has thirteen! Then it was on a level with Switzerland or Denmark in political consideration; now it is the second naval power in the world! We rejoice in its progress, for its strength and its glory belong to the people, and to the cause of truth, justice and freedom all over the world. It is pleasant to observe that the states in which there are no slaves are advancing so much more rapidly than the others. The fact renders the evils of slavery more palpable, and holds out the prospect of its diminishing every year in relative importance. The population of Scotland and England, in 1811, was 12,353,000, or 600,000 less than the United States last year; and New York alone has very nearly as many inhabitants as Scotland had in 1821.

The Cherokee annuity. From the Cherokee Phœnix of July 30. We understand from good authority that but a small amount of the annuity (not more than $200 we presume) has been drawn by individuals, and that the agent is not likely to receive any more customers. We understand also this mode of paying the nation's money is quite profitable to whiskey dealers.

We should like to know, from the agent or from some other person who is capable of enlightening us on the subject, what will be done with the money when it is ascertained fully that the Cherokees will not receive it in the manner proposed? Congress has appropriated it for the use of the Cherokees, not as a boon, but as an instalment due to the Cherokee nation. The Cherokees have designated the manner in which they will receive this money. The agent has refused to comply. Now what will be done with the money? In what way will the design of Congress be complied with? A question to be answered.

Terrible death. Chambersburg, Pa. Aug. 16. We hear with shuddering, that at Mount Alto rolling mills, belonging to H. & S. Hughes, in this county, on Friday the 4th inst. a fine little boy about eight years old, the son of a man by the name of Evans, who a few days before had moved to the works, having strolled into the mill unobserved by the workmen, who were busily engaged, stretched his hand to the rolls when in full motion, which, dreadful to relate, caught hold of his fingers, and in a single instant, with one shriek, he passed through the rolls, and came out on the other side one mass of jelly, being literally crushed to pieces! His death was instantaneous. His fond mother, standing by, fainted at the shriek, and whilst in that situation was covered with the blood and bespattered brains of her unfortunate child!

There is some consolation in the reflection, that his sufferings were but momentary. No blame can be attached to any of the workmen. He was a stranger to the mill, and unnoticed until the accident occurred. The distress of the mother and family can readily be conceived. His shattered remains collected together were decently interred the next day, amidst a large assemblage of the workmen and neighbors, whose sighs and tears bore ample testimony of their feelings on the occasion, and their sympathy with the distressed family.

Revolutionary soldiers. From the New York Commercial Advertiser. There are still some veterans who fought and bled, and endured toil and privation, during the war for independence, whom the gratitude or rather the justice of the country has not reached, in the shape of pensions or allowances of any description. At the celebration of the late national anniversary, at Walden, Orange county, their claims were alluded to by the president of the festive board, Dr. Seth Capron, who is himself one of this neglected band of grey-headed patriots, in the following terms:

The chairman being called upon for a toast, rose and stated, that he regretted extremely the necessity he was under of staying for a few moments the festivities of the table; but he must repeat a sentiment he had felt it his duty to offer on a similar occasion, several years gone by, and which he then promised to repeat as often as this auspicious day should return, while time to him should remain, or until his country should redeem her pledge. He would explain: there yet remains, said he, a distinct and distinguished remnant of the army of the revolution, who, by repeated enlistments, saw much service, say (as ascertained) from 3 to 7 years, in our war for freedom; among them are to be found those who fought in all the most decisive battles, from Bunker Hill to Yorktown. Valley forge, prison ships, and sugar houses bear record of their sufferings; and they hold in their hands George Washington's certificates for faithful services. At the expense of the blood and sufferings of these aged veterans, this extended republic was purchased, and now teems with blessings innumerable, and our treasury filled to overflowing; but foul injustice has guarded the avenues to that treasury with a vigilance that to them has never slumbered, and to this day they have been left with but a pittance of their monthly pay. He would now drop the painful subject, and offer the following sentiment:

Those officers and soldiers of the army of the revolution, who were deprived of their pay by the poverty of their country, and of subsequent remuneration for more than 47 years of national prosperity, by the ingratitude of the republic. Music. Washington's march.

British reform bill. By a statement in the London Courier, it appears that the number of £10 voters in Scotland would be 58,219; in England 372,235, of which 116,047 are in the county of Middlesex; in Wales 7,970. The present number of voters in Scotland is, according to the same statement, 4,722 only. The number of £10 voters in Ireland is not given, but may be estimated at about 25,000, making the number of £10 votes in England and Wales, Scotland and Ireland 463,414. Add to these, persons having a right to vote by the new bill, on the old franchise, and the copyholders or the whole constituency of Great Britain would be about 600,000, about one-third of that of the United States. Ireland. We have an account of a dreadful affray near Castlebar, because of the attempt of many famishing people near Westport, to seize upon certain cart-loads of provisions intended for distribution among the yet more distressed people at Castlebar. The mob most violently attacked the police, that the oatmeal might be appropriated to their own use—the police, and the military escort, appear to have shewn a great degree of forbearance, but assailed with showers of stones and many of them badly wounded, they at last fired on the crowd and killed two women and one man, who were at the head of the mob—after which it dispersed. What a state of things is here presented!

The Siamese twins. A correspondent of the Boston Sentinel gives a detailed account of the fray into which the Siamese twins were lately driven at Lynnfield. The particulars, if true, are equally disgraceful to the Lynnfield people, and creditable to the Siamese. Upon the legal investigation which followed, an argument offered by one of the twins afforded much amusement to the court. It was nearly in this form, and was addressed to Mr. Prescott, the complainant: "You swear you fraid o'me; you fraid I kill you, shoot you—at same time you know I have guns—you see I shoot you if I choose—and you keep round me, following me about—I ask you civilly not to follow me—you wont let me go away—you call me and my brother hard name—and yet you swear you fraid I kill you. Now suppose I see a man in my country, in Siam—he goes out into woods, and sees a lion asleep—he say 'Oh! I fraid that lion kill me'—what I think of that man if he go up and give that lion a kick, and say 'get out you ugly beast!' I wish you'd answer me that."

Insurrection of the blacks.

We are indebted to the kindness of our friend Lyford for the following extract of a letter from the editors of the Norfolk Herald, containing the particulars of a most murderous insurrection among the blacks of Southampton county,* Virginia. [Gazette.

Norfolk, 24th Aug. 1831.

I have a horrible, a heart-rending tale to relate, and lest even its worst features might be distorted by rumor and exaggeration, I have thought it proper to give you all and the worst information, that has as yet reached us through the best sources of intelligence which the nature of the case will admit.

A gentleman arrived here yesterday express from Suffolk, with intelligence from the upper part of Southampton county, stating that a band of insurgent slaves (some of them believed to be runaways from the neighboring swamps), had turned out on Sunday night last, and murdered several whole families, amounting to 40 or 50 individuals. Some of the families were named, and among them was that of Mrs. Catharine Whitehead, sister of our worthy townsman, Dr. N. C. Whitehead, who, with her son and five daughters, fell a sacrifice to the savage ferocity of these demons in human shape.

The insurrection was represented as one of a most alarming character, though it is believed to have originated only in a design to plunder, and not with a view to a more important object—as Mrs. Whitehead, being a wealthy lady, was supposed to have had a large sum of money in her house. Unfortunately a large number of the effective male population was absent at camp meeting in Gates county, some miles off, a circumstance which gave a temporary security to the brigands in the perpetration of their butcheries; and the panic which they struck at the moment prevented the assembling of a force sufficient to check their career.

As soon as this intelligence was received, our authorities met, and decided on making an immediate application to col. Hoose, commanding at Fortress Monroe, who at 6 o'clock this morning embarked on board the steam boat Hampton, with three companies and a piece of artillery for Suffolk. These troops were re-inforced in the roads by detachments from the U. S. ships Warren and Natchez, the whole amounting to nearly 300 men.

To-day another express arrived from Suffolk; confirming the disastrous news of the preceding one, and adding still more to the number of the slain. The insurgents are believed to have from 100 to 150 mounted men, and about the same number on foot. They are armed with fowling pieces, clubs, &c. and have had a rencontre with a small number of the militia, who killed six and took eight of them prisoners. They are said to be on their way to South Quay, probably making their way for the Dismal Swamp, in which they will be able to remain for a short time in security. For my part, I have no fears of their doing much further mischief. There is very little disaffection in the slaves generally, and they cannot muster a force sufficient to effect any object of importance. The few who have thus rushed headlong into the arena, will be shot down like crows or captured and made examples of. The militia are col-

Besides these, a private letter adds the families of Mr. Barrow and Mr. Henry Bryant—numbers not mentioned.

Muskets, pistols, swords and ammunition have been forwarded to Suffolk to-day, by com. I trust the next news you hear will be that all is quiet again, In haste, yours.

Extract of another letter to the same gentleman, dated at Norfolk, 5 o'clock, P. M. "It is now 5 o'clock—Thompson's stage has just arrived—the above statement is confirmed; and in addition states, that 300 negroes, well mounted and armed, and headed by one or two white men, is the amount of the insurgent force."

Office of the Richmond Whig,
Tuesday, August 23,—10 A. M.

Disagreeable rumors having reached this city of an insurrection of the slaves in Southampton county, with loss of life; in order to correct exaggeration, and at the same time to induce all salutary caution, we state the following particulars:

An express from the hon. James Trezvant to the executive, states that an insurrection had broken out, that several families had been murdered, and that the negroes were embodied, requiring a considerable military force to reduce them. The names and precise numbers of the families are not mentioned. A letter to the postmaster corroborates the intelligence. Prompt and efficient measures are being taken by the governor, to call out a sufficient force to put down the insurrection, and place lower Virginia on its guard.

Serious danger of course, there is none. The deluded wretches have rushed on assured destruction.

Extract of a letter from a gentleman to his friend in Baltimore, dated Richmond, August 23d. An express reached the governor this morning, informing him that an insurrection had broken out in Southampton, and that, by the last accounts, there were seventy whites massacred and the militia retreating. Another express to Petersburg says that the blacks were continuing their destruction; that three hundred militia were retreating in a body, before six or eight hundred blacks. A shower of rain coming up as the militia were making an attack, wet the powder so much that they were compelled to retreat, being armed only with shot-guns. The negroes are armed with muskets, scythes, axes, &c. &c. Our volunteers are marching to the scene of action. A troop of cavalry left at four o'clock, P. M. The artillery, with four field pieces, start in the steamboat Norfolk at six o'clock, to land at Smithfield.—Southampton county lies 80 miles south of us below Petersburg.

BRIEF NOTICES.

Hydrophobia. A boy about 10 years old, bitten by a mad dog six or seven weeks since, died in New York a few days ago, with all the horrid and excruciating agonies of the hydrophobia. There was also one death from the same disease in Baltimore last week. Powerful efforts should be made every where to destroy at least nine-tenths of the dogs, for so many, at least, are perfect nuisances in our cities.

Small pox. People in the neighborhood of Fort Mitchell, Alabama, are much alarmed about the small pox—but a general vaccination was going on—the Indians earnestly seeking this safety against the disease—and a hope was entertained that its ravages would be speedily checked.

The late Alfred H. Powell. The public authorities of Frederick county, Virginia, and of the town of Winchester, have rendered public honors to the memory of Mr. Powell, and no man ever better deserved them, for he was a richly gifted and most amiable man. The suddenness of his death, happened as it were, in the moment when he seemed in the full possession of his health and the vigor of his intellect, has added much to the intensity of the public feeling which must have been entertained for his loss, had it happened in a much less awful manner.

A Mrs. Skinner lately died at Torringford, Conn. in the 100th year of his age; she lived at Wyoming, at the time of the massacre, but escaped with six children; two of her sons were slain.

Paganini, the great violinist, was lately invited to perform before the king and royal family of Great Britain, being graciously offered fifty guineas for his evening's work; but he demanded one hundred and fifty guineas, which being refused, in the most gracious manner, Paganini performed on his own account the same evening; and, probably, obtained more money for the exercise of his talents than the value which he had placed upon them, when tendering them to the use of the king.

Many robberies have lately been committed in New York—and the principal actors in them were persons pardoned for crimes which they had previously committed. It is hard, indeed, that this delicate and interesting power vested in the executive, should be thus made the agent of new offences against society.

Progress of Literature. By command of the pasha of Egypt, a periodical journal either has been published in the Isle of Candia, or is about to appear there. It is to be written in Turkish and Greek.

Population of Russia. By the official census, made up to the year 1829, it would seem that the human resources of this gigantic empire have been greatly overrated. The whole amount of this population is 49,000,000, including 17,558,898 serfs and free laborers, and 243,548 clergy; and, in that amount, Poland, Finland, the tribes beyond the Caucasus, the civil and military services, and some Siberian hordes are comprised. There are 315,809 families, and 18,771,812 individuals, who pay taxes to the state. Independently of the regular troops, we find 747,557 males liable to do duty in the field, namely 180, 870 peasants, attached to the military colonies, or regimental settlements, 262,105 Cossacks, 167,269 Bashkirks, 31,159 Metsherjacks, 28,344 Numadic Kalmuks, and 68,810 Kirghises.

Mr. Jefferson's celebrated mansion at Monticello, with 500 acres of land, has been sold for only seven thousand dollars! We presume it must have cost at least ten times as much.

John Murray Forbes, esq. charge d' affairs of the U. States at Buenos Ayres, died there on the 14th June last, aged about 60 years. He was a faithful public agent and a worthy man.

Price of North Carolina tobacco in Richmond. The following communication, appears in the last N. C. Oxford Examiner. A purchaser of this description will be the means of raising the character of our market, and inviting more of the North Carolina tobacco to Richmond.
[Richmond Compiler.

"If you think it would be any encouragement to tobacco growers, you may state in your paper the sale of a hogshead of tobacco, made in this county by Allen Williams, which was sold in Richmond, Va. the 23d ult. for $21 75 per 100 lbs. The tobacco was very fine, and sold privately to a manufacturer. It weighed 1,473, and brought $320 37. I think Granville cannot be beaten by the state."

Nicety of the law. At the Lancaster assizes in England, on the trial of three prisoners, who had obtained £100 upon a forged check, alleged in the indictment to be made in the name of Townend, because the name appeared to the jury to be written Tewnena, the judge decided the variance to be fatal, and the felons were acquitted.

A still more singular instance of legal nicety is reported, if we mistake not, in Leach's case of criminal law. A man was indicted for stealing a cow. It appeared in evidence that the animal had never had a calf, and several witnesses testified that until such an event should take place, the creature was a heifer and not a cow. The court considering this a fatal variance, directed the jury to acquit the prisoner, and he was accordingly discharged.

Boston auctioneers. Payments into the treasury for the last six months—by Coolidge and Haskell $4,501 42; John Tyler, 3,012 08; Whitwell, Bond, & Co. 2,506 99; E. F. White 763 19; Warren, Barry and Park 543 32. There were 13 other auctioneers—all returning less than 500 dollars—9 of them less than 100.

Female knights of the garter. There have been three female knights of this "most illustrious order." Lady Harcourt in the time of Edward III—Lady Gray, in the time of Henry V—and lady Suffolk in the time of Henry VI. The ladies wore the garter on their left arm.

Munificence. The treasurer of the Massachusetts general hospital has the pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of five thousand dollars, as a donation from a merchant, with a request that it "may be accepted for the benefit of that most useful and excellent institution."

A fatal mistake! A gentleman mistook a lady's arm for her waist, and in dancing a waltz seized the former instead of the latter. But he got well punished for so gross a blunder, for the lady, from that day forth, never forgave him for supposing her waist could possibly be as thick as her arm.

A sturgeon, weighing 186lbs. lately jumped into a small boat near Middletown, Con. to the great alarm of the boatman—who, however, soon made a good prize of his unceremonious visiter.

FOREIGN NEWS.

An arrival at Providence, R. I. brings Liverpool papers to the 9th July.

ENGLAND.

The weather in England had been intensely hot for ten days prior to the 9th July. The thermometer, in London, July 5, stood as high as 91 in the shade.

It is said that the majority in the house of lords against the reform bill, will be 8—the bishops constituting that majority.

The unsettled state of France, an expected explosion at Brussels, and the excitement consequent on the discussion of the reform bill, had caused a depression in the price of stocks.

Two vessels were loading in England with 25,000 stand of arms and 48 pieces of cannon, on account of the Poles. The Russians had entered a protest against the above cargoes, but the British government declined interfering.

The calico printers at Manchester and its vicinity have quit work, their employers having attempted to reduce their wages.

Ministers, it is said, will impose a tax upon steam-power, fixing it at the ratio of horse-power, and thus make up the deficiency of revenue. The tax on candles is to be taken off, that on beer, leather, cider and printed goods had already been repealed.

Cobbett was undergoing a trial for an alleged libel, tending to excite the farming laborers to destroy thrashing machines. He has summoned a great many witnesses, and among the rest the cabinet ministers. He conducts his own defence.

BELGIUM.

The national congress at Brussels, have not yet decided on the conditions of prince Leopold's accepting the throne. It is thought that a majority is in favor of them.

FRANCE.

The funds had fallen. The elections would not result favorably to the ministers unless they made certain concessions, which it was supposed they would do. Several persons had been arrested in the south of France, charged with being concerned in a conspiracy favorable to the ex-royal family.

POLAND.

The Russian army had dwindled down from 150,000 men to about 88,000, but the patriots in Lithuania were placed in a very critical situation, being pressed on all sides by the Russians.

LISBON.

A French squadron of 13 sail was in the Tagus and had captured 30 sail of Portuguese merchantmen, a corvette and a gun brig. It was said on the 7th July that Don Miguel had dismissed all his ministers but one, appointed new ones, and was preparing to defend the city of Lisbon. A French brig was going into the harbor, supposed to make new demands. Lisbon was in a great ferment and all the prisons full. Another account states that no one would accept the ministerial appointments, and that count de Barsto had charge of all the departments. The soldiers were murmuring and in an ill humor to fight.

BUENOS AYRES.

The value of goods exported from Buenos Ayres during the first quarter of the present year, was $3,088,365 of that currency, equal to about $500,000 in specie. The export of hides were: cattle hides 125,000, horse hides 1,020, nutria skins 7,178 dozen, Chinchilla, 2 doz. sheep skins 4,044.

Another arrival at New York brings Liverpool papers to the 12th ultimo, inclusive.

ENGLAND.

The jury which tried Cobbett being unable to agree on a verdict, were discharged, so that he was virtually acquitted. The duty on steam power had been abandoned. The reform bill is to be gone through previously to any other business.

FRANCE.

The affair of the duchess of Berri created no alarm in France. The elections thus far are favorable to the ministry. They have gained by manifesting a disposition to grant concessions, and, having thus far succeeded, it is supposed that the "glorious days" will pass over quietly.

POLAND AND RUSSIA.

Several persons had been arrested at Warsaw, charged with a conspiracy. The conspirators numbered among their ranks several generals of distinction, to the treachery of some of whom it is supposed the Russian army, under Rudiga, were enabled to make its escape. Three millions of florins were discovered at the house of one of the traitors, named Lessel. The papers discovered disclose a deep laid plot. The whole of general Skrzynecki's plans of operation had been put into the possession of the Russians, and it was intended also to deliver Warsaw into their hands. Generals Hartig, Satacki, Jackowski, and several others were implicated in these treacherous schemes, also a Russian lady by the name of madame Bazanon. This detection must prove highly advantageous to the cause of the brave and patriotic Poles. There are at Warsaw about 13,000 Russian prisoners, and a part of the arrangement was, that they were to have been provided with arms and to have risen in all parts of the town. General Janchowski communicated the facts to the authorities at Warsaw, in time to save that city from the horrid consequences of massacre and bloodshed.

The Poles under Chlapowski and Guilgud were defeated by the Russians, who took 600 prisoners.

The arch duke Constantine (late viceroy of Poland), is dead, and is supposed to have died by his own hands. The Russians are making a new levy, which will increase their force to 600,000 men.

BELGIUM.

The terms prescribed by the congress of the five powers have been acceded to by the national congress of Belgium, by a vote of 126 to 70, being a majority of 50, and a deputation appointed to inform prince Leopold thereof. His arrival in Brussels was impatiently looked for, and many of those who opposed him during the nine days' discussion in the congress, had since given in their adhesion.

"REGULARITY IN THE MARKET."

The old readers of this work cannot fail to have a thousand times observed, that one of our chief purposes in supporting the "American System" was to bring about "regularity in the market"——repeatedly saying that it was of less consequence to the people whether a capitalist made 6 or 16 per cent. on his money, than that some rate of profit might be reasonably calculated on, to induce or forbid investments, and so add to the general prosperity, or keep in check disastrous measures—for the diversion of persons from their usual employments, in a general diminution either of the quantity or value of labour performed, is always injurious, because of the time wasted in obtaining that degree of judgment and skill which is indispensable to build up and sustain a successful industry. The best and most intelligent farmer would cut a "sorry" figure among the types of our printing office—and, though we happen to know which end of the plough goes foremost, we are as ignorant of the management of it as any farmer can be of our types. And having thus reasoned for many years on the subject, we were prepared to give much consideration to some of the points made below—as well in the letter, as in the pertinent remarks upon it.

FROM THE CHARLESTON CITY GAZETTE.

Extract of a letter from a South Carolinian travelling in the north.

"I was suprised to find that among good society here (in Boston), the politics and leading men of South Carolina are so well understood. That our propensity against commercial restrictions is fully known and appreciated, and the old merchants of Boston most heartily unite with us.

"A large manufacturer said that he was ready to make one more compromise with the south. I asked him with some solicitude what it was. He replied—that the south should be permitted to arrange the tariff of duties entirely herself, but upon this condition, that she would agree not to change an item for thirty years, without the consent of the north. I was startled at this proposal, and at once said it would be accepted. My friend reminded me, not to accept it too hastily. We, said he, must work; it is our destiny: and we can conform our industry to any system, but a system of perpetual change. He reminded me of the speeches of our leading men—their entire tergiversation, and I confess I fear, that if the people should give us the right to fix the tariff, and to our brethren the right alone to permit a change, that we should soon be tired of our own work. You would be astonished at the accuracy of the information of the intelligent people of the place, as to the politics and men of our state. They read our papers, and know the characters of our leading men, as well as we ourselves. They rely greatly on the firmness and good sense of our state, now that her really great men have undertaken to disabuse the people of the idle and pernicious notions of nullification and disunion."

Remarks by the editors of the National Intelligencer.

Whoever has visited Boston, will bear witness to the fidelity with which this intelligent southerner sketches off the leading traits in the character of the people of that city. The politics and leading men of the south are no where better understood—no where more highly estimated, than by the intelligent "Yankees." The prejudice of the elder merchants against commercial restrictions, is quite as great as among rational Carolinians. They yet remember the embargoes of 1807—9, and they try to forgive the southern states for the pertinacity with which they persisted in it, against the almost unanimous voice of New England. The men of the present generation of Boston act in all things as if they had not only forgiven, but forgotten those things.

The "large manufacturer" referred to, expressed, we have no doubt, the general sentiment not of the manufacturers only, but of the merchants also, of the eastern states, when he said he was willing that the south should arrange the tariff of duties herself, if she would only agree to be satisfied with her own work after it was done. It is hardly so important to the industry of the country what the regulations of commerce by the general government are, as that they should be stable. The long embargo, and subsequent non-intercourse, followed by war, the whole filling up a space of more than seven consecutive years, forced the employment of the capital and industry of New England in manufactures: the return of peace broke down most of the manufacturers and staggered the rest. Recovering slowly from their prostrate condition, they are now doing well. A reduction of duties such as the South Carolinians appear to desire, and such as some of them demand as the alternative of revolution, would cut up manufactures by the roots, to the ruin of the interests of the south as well as of the north. But a moderate reduction of such duties as bear heaviest on the south would, we have no doubt, meet the ready assent of all the eastern states, if there could be an assurance of the stability of the duties after such modification. But this is what eastern statesmen and manufacturers and merchants doubt. In 1816, and up to 1824, the South Carolinians, who are now the "free trade" men, were the tariffites. What assurance can we have that in seven years more the views of the "free trade" party will not have undergone another revolution?

HEALTH OF SEAMEN.

U. S. ship Erie, at sea, June 30, 1831.

SIR: I have the satisfaction to make my quarterly return of the sick of the U. S. ship Erie, without recording a single death, and with only one instance of serious disease (a case of tetanus) which was the result of accident. The whole number of patients for the balance of the quarter, from the 14th of April, the time when I took charge of the medical department, has amounted to but fifty-nine, and chiefly trifling cases, originating in the unavoidable exposure of the service.

When it is considered that we have been actively employed during the whole of the time embraced by this report, under a tropical heat, and in that part of the Gulph of Mexico where disease is as much to be apprehended as in any part of the world, this ship will afford an example of exemption from disease which may challenge a parallel: and I trust it will not be viewed by the department as supererogatory in me to notice the causes which have combined to produce so desirable a result.

The grand object has been prevention; and the officers, under two successive commanders, have not only been impressed with its importance, but have actively and cordially entered into all measures necessaay to effectuate it.

The first and most essential operation, with this view, was that of breaking out, cleansing and purifying the hold, which was performed in March last, under the direction and superintendence of the then first lieutenant, now the commander, and my enlightened predecessor Dr. Sproston; and it is almost unnecessary for me to say, it was thoroughly executed. Every species of filth was exposed and removed, and, after a variety of fumigations, the crew were sent ashore, and the ship was subjected to the powerful effects of chlorine gas. In re-stowing the hold, spirit room, &c. care was taken to exclude filth in every article that came on board.

This vessel had thus the advantage of containing a pure atmosphere, and being without any materials for generating foul air; and this state of things has been preserved by the internal regulations and police to which the officers have been unremittingly devoted. The apartment of the men has been kept in a high state of cleanliness, and regularly and freely ventilated.—Their clothes and hammocks have been kept constantly clean, and their bodies frequently inspected to ensure the removal of dirt and secretion from the skin by bathing.

The chloride of lime has been used as often as twice or three times a week, in the quantity of 1½ to 2 lbs. each time, either sprinkled between the water casks, or dissolved and poured about the hold and spirit room, or thrown into the pump-well in solution. The most appreciable effect of this article, to correct the odor or bilge water (which is the only perceptible odor abroad), is that which follows its exhibition by sprinkling, in the form of the powder, about the main hold. It has been observed to remove all smell in a few minutes—an effect readily explained, I think, upon philosophical principles. It is here exposed, under circumstances favorable to its decomposition, by contact with those gases for which chlorine has so strong an affinity. Whereas, when thrown into the pump-well, it is immediately embodied in a state of mixture with the mass of water, containing various salts, and while its prevention of the disengagement of deleterious effluvia, from that source, is questionable, it is not left free to come in contact with those which emanate from other sources. Its agency in decomposing putrid miasmata has been sensibly and happily felt in the West India station, which will, I have no doubt, recommend it to the continued attention of the navy department.

I have had but little experience in its efficacy in restoring deteriorated water, and those who have experimented with it do not report favorably of its properties for this purpose. I would respectfully suggest the impropriety of too secure a reliance upon this justly celebrated and truly valuable article, the tendency of it would be to occasion a relaxation in the employment of other means for the preservation of health in the navy.

This ship has a bellows fitted on the birth deck with an exhausting tube terminating under the timbers, which is worked several times a day; its efficiency in exchanging the air of the lower parts of the vessel for a superincumbent and purer portion is proved, so far as it discharges offensive air, only at the commencement of its operations.

The last, though not the least source of health, is to be found in moral agency. An accurate discipline has been maintained by vigilance rather than coercion; occupation has prevented the commission of offences, and punishments are scarcely known. An air of contentment and happiness is visible in every countenance, the utmost good will prevails, and duty and exposure are on all occasions encountered with alacrity.

In conclusion, I will take the liberty to express my conviction, that with such precautions as those I have enumerated, the tropical climates may be disarmed of their horrors. No malignant diseases, under any exposure of heat, would originate on board—and if introduced from the shore, in the persons of some of the ship's company, they would be confined to their original subjects. It is therefore apparent, that the preventive system is consistent with sound policy as well as humanity, and the officers of the navy, who, upon such enlightened principles, guard the health of those who devote themselves to their country, render more essential service than those who combat disease with most consummate skill. I have the honor, &c.

To the hon. Levi Woodbury, secretary of the navy, Washington.

THE MISSISSIPPI.

The following article has been specially forwarded, that we might give it a place in the "REGISTER." With the facts stated, as to the benefits derivable from the operations of capt. Shreve—we cannot be held accountable: the article was copied as presenting some interesting information to the public, who would determine the merits of the matters stated—and elicit light and knowledge on a very important subject, of which we have one instance now about to be presented—and we think that the facts stated by "N" deserve the very serious consideration of the people of lower Louisiana—and of all who wish prosperity to them, among whom we beg leave to include ourselves.

From the Florida Gazette.

Mr. Editor—Permit me through the columns of your valuable Gazette, to call the attention of the public to a subject of deep interest to a large portion of the state. The effect of the changes which have been made, and of those which seem to be still in contemplation, in the current of the Mississippi. I have very recently seen in Niles' Register, 28th May, an article headed—"The Mississippi," transferred from the Louisville Public Advertiser; which contains an extravagant estimate of the advantages to result from the operations of captain Shreve, in cutting off two bends in this river, and thereby shortening the distance between New Orleans and Louisville, by forty-two miles. The high respect which I entertain for the REGISTER, and the weight deservedly attached to its opinions, caused me to regret that it should be the vehicle (unintentionally I am sure), of partial and mistaken views, of a subject so vitally important to an interesting portion of our country. The facts contained in the statement to which I refer, as well as the arithmetical calculations deduced from them, are I believe correct. But do not these operations instead of promising advantage, menace us with ruin? I shall attempt to shew sir, that they do.

From the mouth of Red river to the ocean, the country traversed by the Mississippi, is, with a very few exceptions, on the east bank of the river, uniformly low and flat, with a descent of 4¼ inches along the margin of the stream, for every league of its course. It is a well known peculiarity of this river, that its banks are higher than the surrounding country; a consequence I believe of the alluvial origin of the soil. This majestic stream, at certain periods, becomes an object of anxiety and terror to the country, and our only security against inundation, is found in the length of its course, and its serpentine meanderings.

The average current of the Mississippi, is four miles an hour; the distance saved by capt. Shreve's cut-off, at the mouth of Red river, is eighteen miles—the distance across is ninety-two feet: consequently there is a difference in the height of the bank in that short distance, of twenty-five and an half inches; and the mass of water, which before passed in four and an half hours, now passes in about as many minutes. Is it not then evident, that there must be a correspondent rise in the water at the lower part of the cut-off? Actual observation has proved this to be the fact. If the cut-off at the point Rascourci is made, by which twenty-eight miles will be saved, the rise of the river at the lower point will be about three feet nine inches, and the levee at New Orleans must be raised five feet higher. The river rises at New Orleans, fourteen feet during high water; twenty-eight feet at point Coupee, and fifty-two feet at Natchez. By shortening the river twenty leagues between fort Adams and New Orleans, you increase the rise of the water at New Orleans by seven feet and one inch. Capt. Shreve has therefore been tampering with a dangerous subject: and however laudable his enterprise and patriotic his intentions, it is to be hoped that no more such experiments will be tried. It is well known that the levee is a heavy burthen in lower Louisiana; in 1828, there was not, on an average, six inches of levee above the level of the river, from point Coupee to New Orleans. Another disadvantage of straightening the river, would be found in the increased velocity of its current. Before the application of steam in its navigation, its force could scarcely be resisted, and if much additional impetus is given to it, even this agent will become comparatively powerless.

There is one field in which the enterprise and ingenuity of capt. Shreve, might be exerted with great utility to our state and might be serviceable also, in a national point of view. I mean in removing the rafts and obstructions in the Atchalalaya, and thereby opening a fine navigation from the Mississippi through Opelousas and Attakapas, to the sea. This to capt. Shreve, would be a work of two months. It would reduce the Mississippi at Natchez two feet, and at New Orleans, four inches. It would open to market hundreds of thousands of acres of the most valuable lands belonging to the public domain—now only known to a few surveyors and hunters; and by facilitating the transportation of troops and munitions of war, would enable the government to defend with greater ease, an extensive and interesting frontier, which now utterly defenceless, may at no distant day, be peculiarly liable to attack. N.

THE CHOLERA MORBUS.

General account of an attack of cholera on board his majesty's ship Liffey, at Madras, in the year 1823.

We had been lying at anchor off Madras for, I think, between two and three weeks, when for several successive days there was no sea-breeze, the wind coming off from the land, parched with excessive heat, and apparently bearing with it minute particles of sand, the effect of which was to relax the animal system. When this had continued for some days, perhaps three or four, the weather changed, but not the wind, which still came from the land, accompanied by drizzling rain, cold, damp, and deadly, such as may occasionally have been felt or experienced amongst vaults or tombs. With this change came the cholera.

Its first operation was one evening about sunset, when a man, whose health had previously been injured by a fall from the main rigging, was attacked and died during the night. It happened that there had that day been a promotion on board, one of the midshipmen having received an acting order as lieutenant, and a supper was given on the occasion. Amongst those invited was a young man who had been on the African station, and was sent thence to England in the last stage of an African fever. Having apparently recovered, and being sent out to India on promotion, it was generally supposed he would receive the next appointment, and was congratulated accordingly; but the supper being somewhat later than the usual hours of a man-of-war, and no boat passing, he slept on board the Liffey. At daylight he returned to his own ship—at 8 A. M. he was dead.

The attack now proceeded in earnest, several men were knocked down—for it was literal knocking down—and the commodore, who, as commander-in-chief, had a house on shore, being informed of what was going on, ordered the ship to sea. We got under weigh, ran out a few leagues from the land, and cruised under easy sail.

It is not possible, and perhaps not desirable, for me to attempt a description of each particular case, but the general impression of such an occurrence is not likely soon to be forgotten. The attack generally came on about daylight and sunset, when there was probably the greatest change in the state of the atmosphere. Fortunately, we had three medical men, a surgeon and two assistants, who kept regular watch; and I have no doubt, from what I saw, that the promptness with which remedies were applied, added to the precautions taken to guard against attack, saved many lives.

The system adopted was, the instant a man was seized, the number of his mess was called, the hot bath, for which water was kept constantly boiling, got, and the man put in, when his veins were opened. If he bled, there was hope; but the blood frequently coagulated and would not flow, lumps or swellings, apparently produced by cramp, rising suddenly in different parts of the body, and again as suddenly disappearing from the part where they had first risen, and rising in some other part.

After the hot-bath and bleeding, the man was put into his hammock, and his messmates kept rubbing him with bottles filled with hot water. In about three or four hours the patient generally either died or the attack abated. There were, I believe, one or two cases in which patients died from a relapse, one of which was said to have been occasioned by neglect on the part of the man, and his messmates giving him spirits.

During the attack the pain appeared to be excessive: in a few moments the features become haggard and distorted, as of a person who had been long in a consumption. The men were all made to wear thick flannel, especially round the waist, and towards sunset the officers used to collect on the forecastle to smoke, as a preventive. When daylight was some time gone, and the attacks appeared to have abated, we used to congratulate each other on the blow being apparently struck for the night, and turn in; yet, on turning out in the morning, and coming up on the gun-deck, half asleep and half awake, the union jack spread over some body ready for burial, not untrequently told that some person was dead whom you had seen or spoken to just before going to sleep. Perhaps the worst part was the effect it produced on the minds of the men. In action, courage and excitement, added perhaps to the desire of distinction, tend to elevate the spirits, but in this case active courage was of no avail, and no one knew who was next to drop. The men herded together in knots, and when work was to be done, it was frequently necessary to penetrate these knots, and shake sensation into the person wanted, when others would follow almost mechanically.

To give an idea of the attack. One evening one of my messmates and myself were smoking on the break of the forecastle, when a man, who was sitting on the cable-bits immediately below us, dropped with a shriek, and was carried aft to the surgeon; we inquired who it was, and were told McCan. We finished the segars we were smoking, and went down to see him; he was in his hammock apparently in great pain, and he died in about three hours.

The morning after we were ordered to sea, shortly after daylight, two men were awoke out of their sleep by an attack of cholera. The first, who was an active and healthy man, was immediately put into the hot-bath, bled, and saved. The second, who was not so healthy a person, and who was awoke whilst the first man was in the bath, and therefore could not be put in so quickly, died.

I think it was the same morning, another man being attacked, his messmates were called to get the bath, and whilst doing so one of them who was assisting was attacked, put in, and his life saved; whilst the man, for whom the bath was originally ordered, died.

When we came in to the anchorage, and were furling sails, a man was seized whilst on the fore-top-sail-yard; I happened to be near him on duty, and at first thought he was drunk. It proved to be cholera; he was immediately lowered out of the top by a rope's end, and died.

On the whole, we lost about ten men in three or four days, which considering the vehemence of the attack, were not many out of a fifty-gun frigate ship's company, though quite enough. Had not great exertions been made by the medical men, and precautions taken to prevent attacks, we should in all probability have lost more.

When the weather cleared, and the sea breeze again blew regularly, the cholera disappeared.

This disease certainly did not appear to be infectious, though it appeared that those whose constitutions were previously had, were the soonest attacked, and had the least chance of recovery. Besides wearing flannel and smoking, in case of any apparent inclination to attack, brandy was recommended, with, sometimes, opium; but when an attack had passed, spirits were said to be bad. Without pretending to medical skill, I should say the desirable object was to prevent as much as possible the influence of the atmosphere, by keeping up a regular action in the blood and general system.

H. LISTER MAW.

GEORGIA MARTIAL LAW.

The following statement is taken from the quarterly report, published in the New York Christian Advocate, of the rev. Mr. McLeod, a missionary of the Methodist church, among the Cherokee Indians. Mr. McLeod, it will be observed, did not reside within the limits of the state of Georgia, and consequently was not liable to arrest, even by the laws of that state. It was upon this ground, doubtless that he was released when he arrived at head quarters.

Athens, E. Tenn. July 16, 1831.

DEAR BROTHER:—The present state of affairs in the bounds of the Cherokee mission makes it necessary to hasten on this my third quarterly report. Receiving the painful intelligence, while on a visit in East Tennessee, of the arrest and shameful treatment of the rev. J. J. Trott, the assistant preacher on Conasauga circuit, I hastened to the nation, in order, if possible, to make some efforts for his release from prison, and to adopt such measures as were in my power for the support of the mission in these perilous times. When I got into the nation, brother Trott had given bail, and returned home to attend to the duties of his charge. I then hurried on to Creek Path, to attend my quarterly meeting there, which was held on the 2d and 3d inst.

On the 7th inst. myself and the rev. Martin Wells, from the Chattooga station, reached the residence of brother Trott, when we were informed that he was again arrested by a detachment of the guards on the preceding day for the same offence, and had left word for me to come and see him. Early in the morning of the 8th, I and brother Wells started in quest of our captured brother, and about ten o'clock we met the guard, with the prisoner, on a line of march for head quarters, having in company with brother Trott the rev. Mr. Worcester, a Presbyterian missionary, arrested also for residing within the charter of the state, and dragged off from a sick family. These two brethren and an Indian, chained by the neck to the baggage wagon, were driven on foot before the mounted horsemen, as a part of their punishment inflicted on them for what the guard call their obstinacy. I rode up to col. Nelson, sub-commander of the Georgia guard, and politely asked permission to speak to the prisoners. He told me I could do so as they advanced, provided I talked loud enough to be heard by the guard.

In our conversation I asked brother Trott if he had been chained the preceding night. He answered in the affirmative. Said I, "Have they any law to chain a prisoner when they have sufficient reason to believe that he would not run away?" He said, "I suppose they have no law for it; but such are their orders," adding that the guard were more inclined to lenity than even their orders would allow them. I told him I had no doubt of that, but remarked, "It seems they act more from orders than from law, or that when they want a law they can make one," quoting in the last expression what I am informed was the language used by col. Sanford, the chief commander. Some of the guard then began to threaten me with an arrest, if I did not mind how I talked. I told them I had simply expressed my opinion as a freeman, without any design to reflect on the present guard, who were executing their orders; but that if I had said any thing criminal, I was in their power—they could arrest me. Col. Nelson and sergeant Brooks, hearing the guard talking largely galloped up from the rear with much apparent rage, and inquired what was the matter. On being informed what I had said, col. Nelson bitterly cursed me, and ordered me off immediately. I told him that I had said nothing but what I believed to be true, but had not designed to insult the guard. He in a more angry tone, ordered me "to flank off quickly," and backed his order with a severe threat. I then turned off, and told the colonel at his command I would go; but observed, as I rode off, (perhaps rather hastily), that he would "hear from me again," meaning that the public should have a statement of facts in relation to his conduct. Col. Nelson and Brooks then followed me up with much abusive language, and ordered me to stop. Nelson asked me where I lived. I told him, "in West Tennessee." I was then made to dismount—brother Wells was ordered off—Nelson and Brooks swearing that I was "the very fellow they had been wanting to get hold of." After going a few steps, my horse was taken from me, and sent back to brother Wells, while I was made to run on foot to get up with the other prisoners. A furious storm of human vengeance was beating upon me in all the violence of infuriate oaths and horrid imprecations. I was told if I opened my mouth, I should be run through with the bayonet; and Brooks urged that I should receive a hundred lashes! I was driven through mud holes and branches for some distance; but when their anger cooled a little, I was suffered to have equal privileges with the other prisoners.

Brother Wells met the rev. Mr. Thompson, a Presbyterian missionary, and turned back with him, leading my horse along. When col. Nelson saw them following, he ordered Wells to keep out of sight. He then fell back seventy or one hundred yards, but still kept moving on slowly. Nelson then got down, cut a large club, remounted, rode up to Wells, and asked him why he did not obey his orders, giving him a severe stroke on the head with the stick. Brother Wells then told him he was travelling on a public road as a freeman, which he should continue to do, and went on after the guard until he got as far as he designed to go that day. The colonel was armed with sword, pistols and a club, and thus displayed his bravery in striking a defenceless and unoffending man merely because he showed signs of friendship to me.

On the preceding day, Dr. Butler, another Presbyterian missionary, was arrested by the guards, chained around the neck, and made to walk by the side of a mounted soldier until it became so dark his life was in imminent danger every moment. He was then placed behind the soldier, the chain fastened around his neck with a padlock, and the other end locked to a rope around the horse's neck. In this situation the horse fell backwards on both his riders into a gully, which came very near killing them both. Two or three of the soldier's ribs were broken. On Friday night, the 8th, Dr. Butler joined us at Hightower; and he, Mr. Worcester and I were chained together for the night, and brother Trott was chained to the Indian prisoner. On Sunday evening, the 10th, after much abuse from Brooks, hard marching on foot until I and brother Trott both entirely failed, we were marched into head quarters, with drum and fife, in quite martial style, and immediately shut up in prison. As we were entering the miserable and filthy prison, Brooks followed us with his curses, saying, "into that place and into hell all the enemies of Georgia shall go!" On that holy evening we joined and held a prayer meeting in the prison, and felt that the God of Paul and Silas was with us.

On Tuesday, the 12th, I was called to appear before the haughty colonel, when he laid many heavy things to my charge, none of which he could prove. He used strong and sharp words to alarm me. He said if he had known that he could not have made "a case of me," he would have made the soldiers strip me, tie me to a tree, and give me fifty lashes! He even seemed to regret that he had not pursued this course with me. I was told by him that I should not preach within the charter of the state, and ordered to leave it as quickly as possible.

I left my brother prisoners in jail, without having the privilege of bidding them farewell. I have omitted many particulars which will yet be made public. I am prepared to prove, that in the present hostile measures of the state towards the missionaries in this nation and other white citizens, policy prevails over law. Colonel Nelson told me that their orders from the governor were to let the missionaries feel the heaviest weight of the law, and that they did not intend to show them any mercy. What will be the result of these measures is hard to foretel. Liberty of speech and of conscience, and religious toleration, are but empty names in the Cherokee country within "the sovereign limits" of Georgia. May the Lord sustain us until the storm blows over!

Your brother in the bonds of a persecuted gospel,
D. C. McLEOD.

GEORGIA AND THE MISSIONARIES.

From the Cherokee Phœnix.

In our last we had barely time to notice the arrest of the rev. John Thompson by the Georgia guard. A few particulars relating to this affair may be interesting.

It appears Mr. Thompson had removed his family to Brainerd previously, before the expiration of the ten days allowed him by col. Sanford, upon the authority of a letter from the governor of Georgia, which we published some time since. The health of Mrs. Thompson, and other circumstances made a change of residence, in the view of Mr. T. necessary; while at the same time he intended to pursue his missionary labors, in preaching from place to place. He had commenced his tour for that purpose, and had just arrived at the station in Hightower with an interpreter, to preach to the people there on the following day, when he was arrested. In relating the circumstances of his arrest, we cannot do better than to publish an extract of a letter from Miss Fuller, the teacher of the school at that station, to Mr. Worcester.

Hightower, June 23, 1831.

Rev. S. A. Worcester, New Echota.

Dear sir,—It falls to my lot to communicate to you a notice of Mr. Thompson's second arrest, together with the circumstances which led to it, so far as they have come under my observation. Last evening about 6 o'clock, col. Nelson called on me, inquired for Mr. Thompson, and also respecting my situation, and made a single remark respecting the loneliness of it. Mr. Thompson was absent, of course, I told him so. He then remarked that, as he found me here, situated as I am, he should not occupy this house last night, but with much assurance added, we shall occupy it to-morrow night. He further said, "You can go or stay as you please, if you stay you shall be protected." My reply was, "I must stay." "Very well," said he, and again repeated his promise of protection. He then remarked that they considered it their privilege to occupy these places, spoke of being somewhat troubled for forage for their horses, and intimated that what was now growing on these places belonged to them—that nothing of last year's growth would be required, but only the present; for, said he, we consider them as intrusions upon our state. However, much I might have felt disposed to remonstrate, I had not sufficient command of my feelings at the moment to permit me to do it. Supposing it must be so if Mr. Thompson did not return before the appointed time, and not being certain that he would, I asked col. Nelson what part of the house he should occupy? "One room will be sufficient, there are only ten of us, was the answer." Providentially, however, Mr. Thompson arrived in about an hour after col. Nelson's call. He felt it to be his plain duty, not positively to yield the possession of this house into col. Nelson's hand, and accordingly despatched a messenger to him, early this morning; with a letter of which the following is a copy:

Hightower Mission, June 23.

Col. Charles H. Nelson,

Sir—I have been informed that you design to occupy the mission house this evening with a detachment of the Georgia guard.

In regard to this subject, I can only say, that we have not the accommodation desirable for the entertainment of yourself and company, and for this, and other reasons, you will excuse me in saying that if your design is effected, it will be without my consent.

Permit me to add, that if an interview with me on this or any other subject is desired, it may be obtained at this place, at any time during the course of this day. I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant, JOHN THOMPSON.

Both Mr. Thompson and myself were expecting that it would result in his arrest, therefore, we were prepared to see armed men, (which we did), and to hear one of them say, "you may consider yourself a prisoner, sir." Mr. Thompson was all ready, and did not detain them five minutes. They told him he would have no use for his horse, so, of course, he walked. They have spent the day at major Dawson's about two miles distant. Mr. Sanders, who returned with him from Carmel last evening, has been to see him this afternoon. The company are to leave for head quarters tomorrow. This is all I can tell you respecting this affair.

They spent the day, as the letter states, at Dawson's and there that night. On the morning Mr. Thompson was marched off in company with five of the guard, and two other prisoners, one a white man and the other a Cherokee who had been arrested on the charge of digging gold. Mr. Thompson had begged of the colonel the favor of riding his horse, and gave as the reason of asking that favor his indisposition. The colonel refused and said he would not depart from his rule, and that if Mr. Thompson was not able to walk, he could have the privilege of riding in the baggage wagon. After walking a few miles, therefore, he was permitted to get into the wagon, in which he rode most of the way except when approaching or leaving their stopping places, when he was required to walk. Having but partly recovered from a recent indisposition, the severe exercise of walking and riding in a rough and uncomfortable wagon brought on an acute head ache, and otherwise rendered him very weak. In this condition he was brought to Mr. Lay's for the night. His indisposition increased. After a while one of the guard came with three chains for the purpose of fastening the prisoners for the night. Mr. Thompson requested that as he was unwell he might be permitted to lie down before the chain was put on him. This request was granted, after which a chain was put around one of his ancles. A short time after this the colonel who had taken a different route, arrived, through whose orders, we presume, the chains were taken off. The following morning they pursued their journey, and on that day arrived at camp Gilmer. The prisoners were conducted to the jail in which they were snugly lodged. Mr. Thompson had remained in jail but a few minutes, when the commander of the place, col. Sanford, went for him and after a short interview told him he was discharged, and that he could go wherever he pleased.

Thus was Mr. Thompson taken forty or fifty miles from the place where he intended to preach the gospel to the Cherokees, locked up in a jail, and then discharged with the privilege of walking home, and without an apology from those who had him in captivity. We have been thus particular because we think the public and the honor of the state of Georgia are concerned. We have endeavored to relate the material facts as we obtained them in conversation from Mr. Thompson himself.

NULLIFICATIONS IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

Having published the letter of the union party to the president of the United States, and his reply—the following succeeds, of course.

At a meeting of the state rights party at Edingsville, held on the 12th July, 1831, col. Jas. E. Jenkins was appointed chairman, Geo. W. Seabrook, secretary. The following preamble and resolutions, offered by the hon. W. B. Seabrook, were unanimously adopted:

In the letter from the union party of Charleston, to the president of the United States, allegations of no equivocal character are introduced, designed, it would seem, to disparage, if not to vilify the principles and acts of their political opponents: The obvious intent of that communication was, by eliciting the views of gen. Jackson on certain moot points, to array his name not merely against a party, but in opposition to the recorded opinion of the constituted authorities of the state. To the accusation thus gravely alleged against the people of South Carolina, the federal executive has responded, in a manner as unexpected, as it is revolting to the elevated feelings of freemen Proceeding on the assumption that the union is in peril, he has ventured, like his predecessor, to threaten the interposition of the national arm, to crush the supposed "plan of disorganization." At this solemn denunciation, levelled at a sovereign member of the confederacy, for daring to defend from pollution the sacred bequest of our fathers—the advocate of consolidation—the satellite of Clay and Webster—the modern unionist—the manufacturer—the disciple of Wilberforce—all may rejoice; but to the faithful supporter of the rights of the states, it arouses sensations only of deep and painful indignation. As a constituent portion of the body politic, it behooves this meeting to declare, and they do it in the spirit which becomes the solemnity of the occasion, that "by whatever patriotic name it may be decorated, or whatever high feelings may be arrayed for its support," any attempt to assail the sanctuary of state sovereignty, or to browbeat the citizens of South Carolina into submission to the lawless edicts of the general government, "must and will, at all hazards be resisted." That the representations of the union party have induced gen. Jackson to infer the correctness of the charge of disloyalty to our federal institutions, as applicable to the good people of South Carolina, is no longer questionable. To sustain that allegation, the agents of the manufacturers throughout the union, but especially in Charleston, have exhausted every device which human ingenuity could invent. They have succeeded—to us we regard it not. In defence of our alters, onward we will move, until hope shall be extinguished by the steel of hired soldiery. Influenced by these considerations, and with a view to repel the gross and unwarrantable imputation of a portion of our fellow-citizens.

Be it resolved, 1st. That in support of the constitution of the United States, on the condition ratified by South Carolina in 1788, "we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes and our sacred honor."

2d. That the only practicable mode of perpetuating the union of these states, is promptly and unceasingly to resist every encroachment on the federative principle of the government, however specious the guise under which it may appear.

3d. That the attempt by the union party of Charleston, to create an impression abroad, that their fellow citizens who differ with them on principle are conspiring against the liberties of their common country is derogatory to the chivalrous character of Carolinians, and bears in its every feature the impress of conculdation.

4th. That as much of the letter of the federal executive as was designed to intimidate our state councils, or to awe the people in the execution of their most sacred duty, has engendered feelings, which, from respect for his elevated station, we would desire to repress.

From the Macon, (Geo.) Telegraph, July 16.

"A rattle snake was, (says the Columbus Democrat), killed in the vicinity of Columbus a few evenings since, which measured in length, ten feet eight inches, and twenty-one inches in circumference."

This is the largest snake of the kind of which we have ever read an account, except one that is familiarly known by the name of nullification: its jaws hang over the Pedee, and the tip of its tail is laved by the Alabama, at Montgomery; one of its buttons, sometimes divides the air at Columbus, another sings in under tones at Macon, a third sounds like thunder at Milledgeville, a stout fold of its body is in Laurens county, and another at Athens, while a quantity of its slime pollutes the air in and about Augusta which Dr. McWhorter is endeavoring to correct by the chloride of lemon. Its coil covers almost every part of South Carolina, but presses most heavily on Barnwell, Colleton and Columbia. Several doughty blades are at work on its carcase—the Charleston Courier with his dressing knife, the Irishman with his shelalah, the Georgetown union with his rice-flail, the Camden Journal with his devil's claws, and the Greenville Mountaineer with his rifle, but the greatest tormentor that the reptile, has, is Dr. Landrum of Columbia. This gentleman has set every bee in his hive to sting the monster; and the effect is such, it is now writhing in agony, and trying to drink up the Pedee to soothe its sufferings. So certain is its dissolution, that Dr. Cooper is writing its elegy; and Hayne, Hamilton and McDuffie have suits of mourning at the tailor's. It is hinted that the Georgia Journal is shortly to order crape on the left arm for seven years.

From the Georgia Constitutionalist.

"We see that many of the papers express satisfaction at the pacific termination of the festivities of the late 4th July in Charleston. Fears of civil strife were evidently entertained by some; but the day passed without other conflicts than those of the rostrum and convivial oratory.—Nevertheless, the existence of bitter party resentments at home, giving rise abroad, to serious apprehensions of internal discord should, it seems to us, furnish an impressive lesson to South Carolina. Can the nullifying party succeed in its designs? Will they not be met at the threshold by their fellow-citizens muttering strongly in opposition to their views? They would contend against the general government—must not their first battle be with their own people? Considering the strength of parties in our sister state it is clear enough, that if ever the theories of the nullifiers be acted upon, the state will be shaken to its own centre by a civil war—a consequence much more terrible than the rigors of the tariff—Now—we do not expect at any time, to witness such a deplorable calamity—but what we mean to say is, the incessant cry of "nullification!" is mere vanity, so long as a strong party in South Carolina is equally vociferous for "union"—and so long as with that strong party, the whole south—saving and excepting the aforesaid nullifiers—is most strongly sympathising."

"It is said Mr. Adams delivered a very fine oration—in the course of which he pointed the arrows of his satire against South Carolina nullification. Surely that creed cannot be right, which Andrew Jackson—Henry Clay, James Madison, Wm. H. Crawford and John Q. Adams unite in condemning."

Nullification, flourishing. The Columbia Telescope, (the bell wether of nullification), has been discontinued, and the establishment offered at auction!

NOMINATION OF JOHN C. CALHOUN,

For the presidency of the United States.

The meeting of the friends of Mr. Calhoun, at the Broadway House on the evening of the 9th August, was numerous and highly respectable. The room was filled. The chair was taken by John Woodward, esq. one of the delegates to the last Herkimer convention, assisted by col. Alexander Hamilton. David Brush and George Bruce, esquires, were appointed secretaries. The subjoined resolutions, with the exception of the two last, were presented by col. Alexander Hamilton, and unanimously adopted. The two last, which were offered by other persons present, were also adopted unanimously.

It was unanimously resolved, in consideration of the commanding talents, the unblemished reputation, the consistent republicanism and the enlightened patriotism of John C. Calhoun, to nominate him as a candidate for the chief magistracy of the United States, and to invite the earnest co-operation of our fellow-citizens to promote and ensure the election of this distinguished individual.

It was further resolved, to bestow our best efforts and exert every honorable means to advance the political influence of John C. Calhoun, as essentially important, to give permanency to our republican institutions, and dignity and intelligence to the administration of our public affairs, which most desirable results we confidently anticipate from his profound and extensive knowledge of our general interests, his tried worth and long experience in our national councils, and his uniform and able support of every energetic measure, calculated to elevate and sustain the true honor and permanent prosperity of the American confederation.

It was further resolved, that we contemplate with deep regret the unfortunate entanglements and discreditable embarrassments in which the presidential independence and dignity have become involved and degraded; the more especially, that, as the early friends of gen. Jackson, we imagined there was substantial reason to hope, that his elevation would secure to the national cabinet, undoubted talents, purity of motive, enlarged political views, to the entire exclusion of every species of favoritism, temporising expedients, and proscriptive changes in official stations.

It was further resolved, that we have contemplated with serious alarm, the recent efforts of the executive to procure the repeal of the 25th section of the judiciary act, as a dangerous and impolitic attempt to subvert the supervisory usefulness of the supreme court of the United States, in effect, tending to produce an entire annihilation of this important chain of judicial decisions on constitutional questions, thus rendering all acts of state legislation independent of a salutary federal control, essential to an intelligent understanding of state rights and the prerogatives and powers of the union.

It was further resolved, that we consider the prosperity of commerce, the improvement of agriculture, and the encouragement of manufactures, as inseparably blended in one common cause, extended and contributing the means of success reciprocally to each other.

It was further resolved, that every attempt to produce sectional distinctions, or the exclusive advancement of any particular interest, ought to be deprecated, as creative of paralyzing and baneful influences in the national councils; and inasmuch as our confederative government was established on principles of mutual concessions and general compromise, it ought, consequently, to be administered in a spirit of conciliation, ever mindful of the general welfare, and never regardless of the feelings and prejudices of any essential portion of the American people.

It was further resolved, that we duly appreciate the honorable and victorious achievements of the hero of New Orleans, and sincerely hope that he may weather the present storm, and enjoy in retirement the pleasing contemplation of his unfading military laurels, free from the contamination of a jaundiced civic wreath, unwisely aspired to, and for meritorious distinction, most unhappily acquired.

Resolved, That the practice adopted by gen. Andrew Jackson, of removing from office, efficient and honorable men during the recess of the senate, and filling the vacancies thus created, without the advice and consent of that body, is a dangerous exercise of the appointing power.

Resolved, That the constitution of the United States ought to be so amended, that a person elected president for one term, should not be again eligible; and that the practice of appointing members of congress to offices under the control of the president, interferes with the expressed will of the people, creates an executive influence of corrupting tendency, and ought therefore to be abandoned.

Resolved, That the proceedings of the meeting be signed by the chairman and secretaries, and published.

RELATIONS WITH AUSTRIA.

The following extract of a letter, received at this department from Vienna, contains information that may possibly be of use to the commerce of the United States, and is published with that view. [Globe.

Department of state, July 19th, 1831.

"The political affairs have been too precarious and uncertain for the merchants to direct their attention to new points of foreign commerce. It would therefore, be desirable for American citizens, to lay hold of the sea trade on our Mediterranean coast, and bring colonial produce from the West Indies and South America, for which they will find a good market at Trieste. Great quantities of cotton, coffee, and sugar were last year bought in this port, under the expectation that not only the Austrian dominions, but also many parts of Germany and Poland would supply themselves from thence.

"It would be advisable to pay some attention to improve by fine seeds some of the United States' cottons, as the sale of them has been affected by the new produce of the pacha of Egypt. His cotton was preferred to several qualities produced in the union, and he begins to supply our wants on a larger scale than hitherto, and may eventually considerably injure this trade with the United States and the countries on the Mediterranean sea.

"It would be, also, of some interest to the United States, I conceive, to take into consideration the metallic produce of Austria—particularly the article of quicksilver, for which Idria is known to be the most productive in the world. In the beginning, I think, one vessel, annually, might be tried to take it to China, and bring in return some produce from thence. The Austrian government once made the experiment, but failed in it, owing to the expensive way in which the outfit was made, and the entire want of knowledge of the China market. The manufacturers in the Austrian empire being quite ignorant of the foreign trade, it would be necessary for the Americans, to bring samples with them, by which they should give their orders. The wages being very low in the Austrian empire, the manufacturers are enabled to compete with those of other countries with much advantage as to price, and it is only their want of knowledge of the sea trade that prevents their productions being better known."

NEW DANISH CONSTITUTION.

The following is the plan of the constitution which we lately stated to have been granted by the king of Denmark to his subjects:—

We, Frederick the sixth, by the grace of God king of Denmark, &c. make known that we, in order to enable us and our successors on the throne, always to obtain the most certain information respecting every thing that may promote our dear and faithful people's welfare, and, at the same time, to knit those ties the closer, which unite the royal house with the people, and give animation to the public spirit, we have resolved to establish deliberative provincial states in our kingdom of Denmark, as well as in our duchies of Sleswig and Holstein. In order to prepare the fulfilment of this our paternal determination, we have previously had the case examined, and although it has not yet attained that degree of perfection which is necessary previous to its being passed into a complete law, we have still found it proper now to notify the general bases, which will be the foundation of the organization on which we are about to confer on the provincial states in our kingdom of Denmark.

With respect to the above, we have most graciously ordained as follows:—

1. There are to be in our kingdom of Denmark two assemblies of provincial consultative states, one for the district of Z aland Funen and Lolland Falster, together with Iceland, and another for the provinces in Jutland Jutland.

2. In each of these assemblies are admitted such a number of members elected by their fellow burghers as we further shall determine. The right of election is to be exercised on the condition and in the manner which we shall prescribe by a separate ordinance, by the proprietors in towns and in the country: in consideration also of the established right of possession which our laws grant to lease-holders, we will likewise give them access to a participation in the elections. In like manner the possession of landed property is to be a requisite condition to eligibility; and although, generally speaking, we are not willing to preclude those of our subjects holding official situations, who are at the same time landed proprietors, from having a seat in the assemblies of the states, when they are elected thereto, no person in office who is provided with a commission, or charge, or confirmation subscribed by us, is allowed to accept of such appointment, without having first obtained our supreme sanction.

3. It is our determination to appoint members of the university and of the clergy to a seat in the assemblies of provincial states, and, according to circumstances, some few others whom we, in consideration of their situations and merits, might consider particularly adapt d for it.

4. Before we give out any law to alter either the personal or possessive rights of our subjects, or the taxes and public imposts, we will cause the plan of such a law to be laid before the assemblies of both states, or, if it should only relate to one or more of the provinces, then before the provisional states to which it belongs, that the states may be enabled to take the law into consideration, and submissively communicate the result of their deliberations.

5. If the provincial states should find occasion to wish for any change in the general laws or institutions of the country, or those immediately affecting the province, or if they should find it requisite to bring forward any complaint of the manner in which the laws are conducted, they may represent the same to us and make their proposals: whereupon we will take such proposition into consideration, and then make known our determination.

6. As we consider it useful to allow the provincial states to take a part in the affairs of the parishes (communes), we will take into consideration how this may be executed, and then further determine respecting it.

7. The provincial states will assemble when we summon them. This will take place every second year, but when it may be found necessary, we will also appoint extraordinary meetings of the states. With respect to the duration of the sittings, we will each time, according to circumstances, determine how long they are to last, after which we will have the dissolution of the meeting proclaimed.

8. We will make known the necessary further determinations, not only respecting the number of those persons who are to be elected as members of each of the provincial assemblies, but also the distribution of the number in each of the districts, and of the further stipulations for the right of election and eligibility, together with the manner of proceeding at the elections, and in the assemblies of the states. But previously to the plan for these legal arrangements being laid before us, we will assemble some enlightened men, from different parts of the kingdom, for the purpose of taking into consideration those objects which will be laid before them and acquaint us with their opinions, founded upon knowledge of place and legal circumstances. If it in time should be found requisite to make any change in these ultimate decisions, such will, however, not take place until we, in accordance with paragraph four, have obtained the opinions of the states.

ROBERT FULTON, secretary.

PROGRESS OF CRIME.

[From the London Morning Herald.]

There is just printed, for the house of lords, an interesting "summary statement of the number of criminal offenders committed to the several goals in England and Wales during the last seven years"—namely, from 1824 to 1830 inclusive.

The number of commitments in England and Wales was as follows:—

In 1824 number of persons (amongst them being 2,223 females)	13,698
1825 (females 2,548)	14,487
1826 (females 2,692)	16,164
1827 (females 2,770)	17,924
1828 (females 2,732)	16,564
1829 (females 3,119)	18,675
1830 (females 2,972)	18,107

[The prisoners for trial at the special assizes, commencing in December, upon the home circuit, and under the special commission, are not included in this return for 1830.]

By the above returns, making allowance for the special commission omissions of 1830, the increase of crime in seven years, if not one-third, is as 13 to 18!!

The next division classes the convictions and sentences. Thus those sentenced to death were as follows:

In 1824 sentences of death		1,066
1825	do.	1,036
1826	do.	1,203
1827	do.	1,529
1828	do.	1,165
1829	do.	1,385
1830	do.	1,397

Their crimes and the number executed are given in subsequent returns. Here again is a frightful increase in the number sentenced, namely, nearly one-fourth in seven years! The total number on whom sentence of death was passed in the seven years is 8,781.

According to the enumeration of the crimes for which those persons were sentenced to die, it appears that the greatest increase has been in "breaking into dwelling houses and larceny," the number in 1824 being 128, and having gradually advanced till 1830, when the numbers were 527; and next for "sheep stealing, and killing with intent to steal," the number in 1824 being 105, and in 1830 it being 243—more than doubled; total for seven years, 977.

[The executions which took place on Wednesday were for offences under these heads.]

In other convictions there are increases, but not so considerable. The number for "horse stealing" in 1824 was 104, in 1830 it was 139. "Murders" seem to have maintained their average: in 1824 there were 17; in 1830 there were 16—the total in the seven years being 103—"Shooting at, stabbing, wounding, and administering poison with intent to murder, &c." have increased: in 1824, the number was 21; in 1827, 35; in 1829, 65; and in 1830, 28; the total being 200.

The number executed in the seven years was 407; the number sentenced to die having been 8,781: so that on 8,374, the sentence of the law was not carried into effect. Further, of the 407 executed, 117 were for "murders," and "shooting at," &c. Now, there were convicted of "murder," and sentenced to die, 103; there were executed 90—thirteen murderers having had their sentences commuted. There were two hundred convicted of "shooting at, administering poison, stabbing, &c. with intent to murder," twenty-seven executed—one hundred and seventy-three escaping with commutations of their sentences.

Then as to the executions for the crime of "burglary," and that of "breaking into a dwelling house, and larceny," the conviction under the first head of crime diminished amazingly, for, in 1824 the number was 302, in 1830 it was 104, being a diminution of two thirds; but the executions were, for the first four years, 13, 12, and 10 a year; while for those same four years, although the second head of crime was yearly increasing, there was not one execution. When, however, the executions for "burglary" in 1828 dwindled down to three (and in 1830 to two) the executions for "breaking into a dwelling house and larceny" rose from none to eleven. As to the executions for "sheep stealing," they have averaged between two and three each year; the convictions being on the average one hundred and forty each year.

The sentences to die, and the executions for "forgeries," display remarkable contrasts, especially as compared with former severities. In the seven years there were 205 convictions and sentences, but only twenty executions; or, about one was executed out of every twenty sentenced to be hanged. Of those sentences 72 were for forging and uttering bank notes:—out of the 72 there were six executed, but none last year.

The number executed in the seven years, as already stated, was 406 (out of 8,781 sentences of death), which gives an average of upwards of fifty-eight executions in England and Wales in each year.

These interesting returns (of which, as they occupy nearly twenty pages, we can only give the results), also state the convictions, acquittals, and the ignorings of bills, or non-prosecutions, without detailing each year, we shall notice the results on the seven years; which stand thus:—

Total convicted from 1824 to 1830 inclusive,	80,852
Total acquitted,	22,330
No bills found, and not prosecuted,	12,387
Total commitments in those seven years,	115,569

It hence appears, after all the examinations before magistrates and grand juries, after all the expenses incurred by parties and counties; and after, in many instances, several months imprisonment, with felons, and in felons' gaols—of those actually tried one out of every four or five were presumed to be innocent: but adding the number where there were not even bills found, notwithstanding the magistrates' commitments, which were twelve thousand three hundred and eighty-seven, to the number of acquittals, there were 33,717 individuals thrown back upon society, after the associations and imprisonments already adverted to!

Taking another, and a last view, for the present, of these materials for most serious reflection and investigation, it is found that, out of the one hundred and fifteen thousand persons committed to felons' gaols charged with crimes, nearly thirty-five thousand of the number were wholly cleared and acquitted of all crime, or, almost one-third of the number committed; and that, out of eight thousand seven hundred and eighty-one sentenced to death both by the laws and the judges, four hundred and seven (or one selected out of every twenty-two!) were executed!

The object here has been to give the results of afflictingly interesting and important official returns and documents; and they cannot fail, we should think, to startle and to grieve the public.

A PROCLAMATION.

We copy from the Nashville Banner the following genuine proclamation of ex-governor Houston of Tennessee. The editor of that paper says that it is published "as a matter of business."

A proclamation!!!

Whereas, I have recently seen a publication originating in the Cherokee nation, east of the Mississippi, dated "18th May, 1831," and signed 'I. S." which said publication, or letter, has been republished in several newspapers, such as the Kentucky Reporter, United States Telegraph, &c. and as I presume it will find a general circulation, notwithstanding the absord personalities which it contains; and as it is not the first which has found its way into the public prints, containing ridiculous and unfounded abuse of me:—Now know all men by these presents, that I, Sam. Houston, "late governor of the state of Tennessee," do hereby declare to all scoundrels whomsoever, that they are authorised to accuse, defame, calumniate, traduce, slander, or vilify and libel me, to any extent in personal or private abuse. And I do further proclaim to whomsoever it may concern, that they are hereby permitted and authorised to write, indite, print, publish and circulate the same, and that I will in nowise hold them responsible to me in law, nor honor, for either the use of the "raw material," or the fabrication of any or all, of the above named articles, connected with the "American System," nor will I have recourse to nullification, in any case whatsoever, where a conviction would secure to the culprit the dignity of a penitentiary residence. And as some ingenuity has already been displayed in the exhibition of specimens, and others may be induced to invest a small capital in the business, from feelings of emulation and an itching after experiment: be it known for the especial encouragement of all scoundrels hereafter, as well as those who have already been engaged, that I do solemnly propose on the first day of April next, to give to the author of the most elegant, refined ingenious lie or calumny, a handsome gilt copy, (bound in sheep), of the Kentucky Reporter, or a snug plain copy of the United States Telegraph, (bound in dog), since its commencement.

Given under my hand and private seal, (having no seal of office), at Nashville, in the state of Tennessee, 13th July, 1831. SAM. HOUSTON, (L. S.)
